MÂCON, COUNCILS OF (Matisconensia Concilia). Three councils of Mâcon are recorded; the two first being held by command of king Guntram.

1. A.D. 581, when 21 bishops subscribed to 19 canons: Priscus of Lyons first, and Evantius of Vienne next. In their preface they declare they are not going to make new canons so much as sanction the old. Yet their 6th canon is novel, as well in speaking of archbishops at all, as in ordering that they shall not say mass without their palls. So is the 7th, which threatens civil judges with excommunication if they proceed against any clerk, except on criminal charges. So is the 9th, which orders Mondays, Wednesdays, and Fridays from Nov. 11 to Dec. 25 to be kept as fasts. Others relating to married priests and bishops, and to the Jews in general, are remarkable for their severity. Nine more canons are cited by Burchard and others as having been passed at this council. (Mansi, ix. 931–940.) [E. S. Ff.]

2. A.D. 585, when 43 present and 20 absent bishops, through their deputies, subscribed to 20 canons. In their preface Priscus, bishop of Lyons, is styled patriarch. The first canon is a short homily for the better observance of Sunday. By the second, no work may be done for six days at Easter. In the sixth, the 41st African canon is quoted with approval, which orders that the Eucharist shall be celebrated on all days of the year but one fasting; and further provision is made for what remains after celebration, by directing that it shall be consumed by persons of unblemished character, brought to church for that purpose, and enjoined to come fasting, on Wednesdays and Fridays, having been first sprinkled with wine. By the seventh, slaves that have been set free by the church are not to be molested before the magistrate. By the eighth, none that have taken sanctuary may be touched till the priest has been consulted. By the ninth and tenth, the civil power may not proceed against any bishop, except through his metropolitan; nor against any priest, deacon, or sub-deacon, except through their bishop. By the sixteenth, no relict of a sub-deacon, exorcist, or acolyth may marry again. By the nineteenth, clerks may not frequent courts where capital causes are tried. The twentieth orders the holding of councils every three years, and charges the bishop of Lyons with assembling them, subject to the assent of the king, who is to fix where they shall meet. King Guntram, in a dignified ordinance, published at the close of this council, intimates that the civil authority will not hesitate to step in, if the canons are not enforced with due rigour. (Mansi, ix. 947–64.)

3. A.D. 624, or four or five years earlier, according to Mansi, when the rule of St. Colum ban, which a monk named Agrestinus had attacked. was vindicated by Eustasius, abbat of Luxeuil, his successor. [E. S. Ff.]

MACRA (1) Virgin, martyr at Rheims, about A.D. 303, under the praeses Rictiovarus; commemorated Jan. 6 (Usuard. Mart.; Vet. Rom. Mart.; Bed. Mart. Auct.; Boll. Acta SS. Jan. i. 324).

(2) Virgin, martyr, in Mauritania Caesariensis; commemorated Jan. 9 (Vet. Rom. Mart.). The name occurs as Martiana in Ado. [C. H.]

MACRIANA, COUNCIL OF (Macrianum Concilium), held at Macriana in Africa, A.D. 418, according to some, the only evidence for it being two canons in the collection of Ferrandus (n. 11 and 24), each attributed to a council of that name (Mansi, iv. 439, and see AFRICAN COUNCILS). [E. S. Ff.]

MACRINA (1) Grandmother of St. Basil, at Neocaesarea in Pontus; commemorated Jan. 14. (Boll. Acta SS. Jan. i. 952).

(2) Sister of Basil the Great; commemorated July 19 (Basil, Menol.; Cal. Byzant.; Daniel, Cod. Liturg. iv. 264).

(3) Commemorated at Rome July 20 (Hieron. Mart.). [C. H.]

MACRINUS, martyr with Valerianus and Gordianus; commemorated at Nivedunum, or Nyon, Sept. 17 (Usuard. Mart.; Bed. Mart. Auct.). [C. H.]

MACROBIUS (1) Martyr; commemorated at Milan, May 7 (Hieron. Mart.).

(2) Martyr; commemorated at Alexandria, July 13 (Hieron. Mart.).

(3) Martyr; commemorated at Damascus, July 20 (Usuard. Mart.; Bed. Mart. Auct.); called Magrobius in Hieron. Mart.

(4) Of Cappadocia, martyr with Gordianus and others, under Licinius; commemorated Sept. 13 (Basil, Menol.; Boll. Acta SS. Sept. iv. 55). [C. H.]

MACULUS, martyr; commemorated at Perusia in Etruria, Ap. 29 (Hieron. Mart.). [C. H.]

MADELBERTA virgin, abbess of Maubeuge, about A.D. 705; commemorated Sept. 7 (Boll. Acta SS. Sept. iii. 103). [C. H.]

MADELGISILUS, hermit at Centulum (St. Riquier) in Picardy, in the 7th century; commemorated May 30 (Boll. Acta SS. May, vii. 264). [C. H.]

MADIARIA, martyr; commemorated at Antioch March 26 (Hieron. Mart.). [C. H.]

MAFORS (or Mavors; sometimes Mafora; Μαφόριον or μαφόριον) was a short veil covering the head and neck, and flowing down upon the shoulders.

I. It was originally an article of female dress: a cloak or veil. St. Athanasius mentions that the maforium of the Virgin Mary was believed in his time to be preserved in the palace of the Blachernal at Constantinople—Τὸ δὲ ἅγιον μαφόριον θεοτόκου ἐν Βλαχέρναις κεῖ. It is defined in a MS. Greek Glossary, quoted by Du Cange, as πέπλον, γυναίκειον ἱμάτιον. Another calls it distinctly a veil, τὸ τῆς κεφαλῆς περίβλημα, and Suidas (Lexicon) treats it as synonymous with ricinium, a band for the head.

II. The term was also applied to a large coarse cape or hood, worn by monks in the Eastern church: the monkish scapular. Cassian (de Habitu Monachor. i. c. 7) describes it thus: "Post haec angusto pallio tam amictus humilitatem, quam vilitatem pretii, compendiumque sectantes, colla pariter atque humeros tegunt; quod mafortes tam ipsorum quam nostro nuncupatur eloquio." It was the working dress of monks, and a passage in Fortunatus (Vita S. Hilarii, c. ii. n. 2) seems rather to shew that the habit of a monk of peculiar sanctity would sometimes be folded or draped around his tomb; for he calls it "pepium seu velum quo sepulcra et tumbae sanctorum obvolvebantur." That, at all events, is the apparent meaning of the passage.

III. Some writers reckon mafortes among the vestments used in the services of the church, i.e. as a cope or amice. "Mafortem tramosericum rodomelinum aquilatum; item mafortem e teleoporphyro tramosericum opus marinum" (Charta Cornutiana, quoted by Ducange).

Cassian states that this habit was not generally used by monks in the West. [S. J.-E.]

MAGI, adoration of; commemorated Dec. 25 (Basil, Menol.). Compare MAGI IN ART. [C. H.]

MAGI (IN ART) (1) BEFORE HEROD. Two instances of this rare subject have been discovered by the industry of M. Rohault de Fleury, and are figured in his beautiful work l'Évangile (Tours, 1875), which is illustrated entirely from early art. One is from a rude fresco in the catacomb of St. Agnes, of which we subjoin a woodcut, without being able to speak with any certainty as to its date, though De Fleury attributes it to the 2nd century. The magi bear their gifts, and the star is very prominent. In the original Herod's face has a look of anger and suspicion, but this may possibly have been inserted or enhanced by some ingenious copyist or other workman, nothing being easier than sinister expression, especially in the large-headed and large-eyed drawings of the Roman decadence. The second example is from the mosaics of Sta. Maria Maggiore at Rome, and is one of the original mosaics of the 5th century. Herod bears the nimbus, a rather singular instance of its occurrence so early. Hebrew elders are with him unfolding their rolls of prophecy, and gazing upon him in a manner which appears to disquiet him, as though the text of St. Matt. ii. 3 was in the mind of the artist, and could not have been more graphically expressed by Raffaelle himself. Of the three kings, or magi, two wear the Phrygian bonnet or helmet, the third, who is of very youthful appearance, having long curled hair. They all wear long close-fitting hose, apparently much ornamented down the front of the leg, with short tunics, altogether presenting a rather mediaeval appearance. Martigny refers to the painting in St. Agnes (see woodcut), and says that Herod is supposed in it to be protesting with hand on heart his good intentions towards the Holy Child. See also Perret, vol. ii. pl. xlviii. He mentions a sarcophagus at Ancona, for which he refers to Bartoli, Sopra un' area marmorea, etc., Torino, 1768, which contains the same subject, with many figures. It will be found among Mr. Parker's Photographs, No. 2677, vol. xviii. Another at Arles bears the first scene of the history, the magi in the act of observing the star, two pointing it out to the third. Figured in Rohault de Fleury, L'Évangile, vol. i. p. 62.

(2) ADORATION OF. A special interest is attached to the subject of the Wise Men in the primitive ages. It seems to have retained its hold more strongly on the Christian imagination than many others, and has always been a favourite of graphic artists.

The number of magi is almost always three. Two or four sometimes occur, and Martigny attributes such changes of treatment to artistic motives. But a very different account is given by Mr. Hemans (Historical and Monumental Rome, p. 661) of the appearance of two instead of three in the celebrated 5th century mosaics of Sta. Maria Maggiore. "The Divine Child," he says, "is here seated on an ample throne, while another personage is seated on a lower chair beside Him. In the original composition that personage was an elderly male figure, no doubt intended for one of the magi, only two of whom are seen in the mosaic now before us, whereas in another of the groups (the three before Herod) we see three magi. A most unjustifiable alteration of this group was ordered when the church was restored by Benedict XIV. Instead of the male figure seated beside the Child was substituted that of Mary with a nimbus-crowned head and purple vestments. Among other innovations then made, one of the magi was omitted, and the mother's figure, originally standing behind the throne of the Child, was changed into that of an angel, adding a third to the group of celestial ministers in the background." The mosaic in its present state is figured in Rohault de Fleury, L'Évangile, i. p. 6, xxi. See also ANGELS AND ARCHANGELS, §§ 3, 15, I. 84.

Adoration of the Shepherds and Magi. Bas relief, Lateran, on Staircase. Rohault de Fleury, 'Les Evangiles,' vol. i. pl. xix.

There can be little doubt that this subject belonged to the earlier cycle of the catacomb frescoes. It is found in the cemeteries of St. Nereo with four Magi, in that of SS. Marcellinus and Peter with two. They appear for the most part to have been more or less rudely restored at various times. Their actual appearance may be understood from Parker's Photograph, No. 1613; St. Nereo (A.D. 523?), and No. 2116 (St. Marcellinus, A.D. 772). It is figured by Aringhi (vol. i. p. 587), from the walls of the Callixtine Catacomb: the Magi wearing the Phrygian cap and tunic, with modern boots, and rowelled spurs with spur-leathers; an addition in itself sufficient to cast a suspicion of restoration or reconstruction, even as early as Bosio's time, over all the paintings in the catacomb. At p. 615, on a Callixtine sarcophagus, they appear leading their horses, or perhaps camels. They are bearing their offerings, and guided by the star to the Holy Infant, who is wrapped in swaddling-clothes, and outstretched on a cradle under the shed with the ox and the ass. The Blessed Virgin sits apart, and Joseph stands by her side. Figured again from the catacomb of SS. Marcellinus and Peter "inter duas lauros," at vol. ii. p. 117: with clavi or stripes on the tunics and on the robe of the Virgin mother. Again, with horses at ii. 159, and at 355, 395, from unknown sarcophagi; ten times in all.

The Magi and Virgin. Tomb of Exarch Isaac. Ravenna, 5th century. Rohault de Fleury, 'Les Evangiles,' vol. i. pl. xx.

Two highly interesting 6th-century examples from Ravenna are given by De Fleury (vol. i. plates xxi. and xxii.). One from the tomb of the exarch Isaac is here reproduced in wood-cut; the other is the well-known mosaic of Sant'Apollinare nella Città. The latter is perhaps the earliest type of the Byzantine Madonna of the earlier middle ages, found at Torcello and Murano, still retained in the unchanging art of the modern Greek church, and reproduced most signally, perhaps, in the celebrated Borgo Allegri picture of Cimabue, now in Sta. Maria Novella in Florence. The attendant angels are thoroughly Byzantine, and may stand as examples for the severer ecclesiasticism of Justinian's day. The magi wear the traditional hose, with somewhat mediaeval crowns, cloaks, and tunics. Their ages are carefully distinguished, and their appearance curiously Gothic. Their names, SS. Gaspar, Melchior, and Balthazar, are given in the mosaic, perhaps for the first time. The Infant raises His hand in benediction, and the Blessed Virgin also. The group forms the end of the celebrated Procession of Female Saints.

A curious bas-relief from the French crypt of St. Maximin is given by De Fleury (v. i. pl. xx.), which he assigns with possible truth to the 3rd century, and which we reproduce.

The Magi and Virgin, &c. (Latin rite.) Rohault de Fleury, 'Les Evangiles,' vol. i. pl. xviii.

Perhaps the most interesting example of this subject which is left us is a carving made on the bone of a whale, now in the British Museum. It is among Prof. Westwood's fictile copies, and is figured in his Catalogue of Fictile Ivories, p. 234; in Stephens's Old Runic Monuments, vol. i. pp. 470 sqq.; and in Mr. Maskell's Ivories, Ancient and Mediaeval, p. 54. It was described by

Old English Casket, made of the bone of a whale. Brit. Mus., from Maskell's 'Ivories.'

Mr. Franks in the 2nd Series of Papers of the Society of Antiquaries, vol. iii. p. 382. It forms part of a square coffer, incised with subjects in broad outline relief, the magi sharing the cover with a curious carving, which Dr. Westwood is apparently right in considering meant for Wayland Smith, as the hammer and pincers are unmistakeable, though Mr. Maskell thinks it is a beheading of St. John. The three magi have round massive fells of hair, which might almost pass for a remembrance of the Phrygian caps, except that other figures on the chest have the same. Their boots and braccae are unmistakeable; they are offering their treasures in covers and paterae apparently, and are attended by an ornamental duck or swan. This bird is repeated to fill up space. The star is very large, and of many rays; there is a broad Runic border, and an inscription "Magi" in runes above the carving. The quasi-symbolic figures of the Virgin Mother and Child are extraordinary, the former ends at the waist in waving flourishes, perhaps typical of drapery, but ornamented with dots like an Irish initial letter; the Child consists entirely of a larger face or medallion held as usual before His Mother; the writer feels little doubt of its having been copied or adapted from some MS. of Durrow or Iona; and, as Mr. Maskell observes, following Mr. Stephens, it is one of the costliest treasures of English art; and, as a specimen of Northumbrian art and Northumbrian folk-speech, it is doubly precious.

The distinctively Persian dress of the magi, as represented on all the monuments, certainly deserves attention, as it indicates the connexion, in the Christian imagination, between the religion of Zoroaster and the coming of the Lord, which Zoroaster was supposed to have foretold. See Hyde, de Religione veterum Persarum, c. 31, p. 384, ed. Oxon. 1700), and Magi in DICT. OF THE BIBLE, ii. 190. F. Nork (Mythen der alten Perser als Quellen Christlicher Glaubenslehren, p. 82) considers that many representations of the Adoration of the Magi bear a decidedly Mithraic character. [R. St. J. T.]

MAGIC (Ars Magica, from magus, Persian مغ, mugh). "Among the Persians," says Porphyry, "they who are wise respecting the Deity and are His servants are called Magi" (de Abst. Anim. iv. 16, p. 165, cited by Rose (in Parkhurst), who also refers to Justin, i. ix. 7, xii. 13; Curtius, v. 1; and others). Xenophon distinctly ascribes to them the office of priests: "Then were the magi first appointed to sing hymns in honour of the gods at the dawn of every day, and to sacrifice daily to those gods to whom they, the magi, should declare sacrifice due" (Cyrop. p. 279; ed. Hutch.). The name (μάγος) is not used as a reproach in the Septuagint. See Dan. i. 20; ii. 2, 10, 27; iv. 7. The prophet Daniel was the head of the "Magi" in Babylon (Dan. v. 11). It is also the title given to those who were led by the star to Bethlehem (Matt. ii. 1, 7, 16). Nevertheless it had already acquired a bad sense among the Jews. Thus Simon (Acts viii. 9) is said μαγεύειν and to use μαγεία (11); while Elymas, a Jew, is expressly called a μάγος (xiii. 6, 8). This was the popular usage and at length it prevailed entirely. "Custom and common speech," says St. Jerome, "have taken magi for malefici—who are regarded in a different light in their own nation; for they are the philosophers of the Chaldeans" (Comm. in Dan. ii.). It is probable, however, that Magism had long greatly altered for the worse, even in the practice of its best professors in its original home; for Origen, speaking of the magi of Persia, says, "From them the magical art of their nation takes its name, and has travelled into other nations to the corruption and destruction of those who use it" (c. Cels. vi. 80). Philostratus is also speaking of these Persian adepts, when he makes the strange statement, that they invoke God when they are working unseen; but subvert the public belief in the Deity, because they do not wish to appear to receive their power from Him. (de Vit. Sophist. in Protag. 498.)

The "curious arts" (τὰ περίεργα) renounced by the converts at Ephesus (Acts xix. 19) were, according to the common meaning of the term employed, the several branches of magic. What these were in the opinion of the early Christians we learn from many authors. Magicians, it was believed, could raise phantoms resembling persons deceased, could extract oracles from children, whom they entranced; nay, from goats and tables (Tertull. Apol. 23). In a book written a little before the end of the 2nd century, Simon Magus is represented boasting:—"I can make myself invisible to those who desire to seize me, and again visible when I wish to be seen. If I desire to flee, I can pierce mountains and pass through rocks, as if they were mud. If I were to cast myself down from a high mountain, I should be borne uninjured to the ground. If I were bound, I could release myself and bind those who had chained me. If imprisoned, I could make the bars open of themselves. I could make statues live, so that they were thought to be men by those who saw them. I could cause new trees to spring up suddenly, and produce boughs at once. If I flung myself into the fire, I should not burn. I change my face, so as not to be known; nay, I can shew men that I possess two faces. I can become an ewe or a she-goat. I can give a beard to little boys. I can shew gold in abundance. I can make and unmake kings" (Recognit. Clement. ii. 9. Comp. Pseudo-Clem. Hom. ii. 32; Gesta Petri, § 33). The supposed narrator is made to say that he saw a rod with which Simon was beaten "pass through his body as through smoke" (Recog. ii. 11; Ps.-Cl. Hom. ii. 24), and that a woman, his confederate, was seen, by a vast multitude surrounding a tower in which she was, to look out of every window on each side at the same moment (Recog. u.s. § 12); that he caused another to look like himself (Gesta Petri, 136), and "spectres and figures to be seen daily in the market place, statues to move as he walked out, and many shadows, which he affirmed to be the souls of persons departed, to go before him" (Hom. iv. 4; Gesta Petri, 45). Simon's fatal attempt to fly is related or alluded to by several early writers; as by the author of the Apostolical Constitutions (vi. 9), Arnobius (adv. Gent. ii. prope init.), Epiphanius (Haeres. xxi. 5), St. Ambrose or Hegesippus (de Excid. Hieros. iii. 2), Sulpicius Severus (Sacr. Hist. ii. 41), Maximus (Serm. 39), Pseudo-Augustine (contra Fulgent. Don. 23), etc. Many of the Gnostics, as Menander (Iren. Haer. i. 23, § 5), Basilides (24, § 5), and Carpocrates (25, § 3), with their disciples, were accused of "using magic and (mystic) images, and incantations, and all other curious arts (perierga)." See also Euseb. Hist. Eccles. iv. 7. St. Irenaeus relates two stories of Marcus (about 160), which shew how these arts were still brought into the service of heresy. He caused wine mixed with water, which he consecrated in the Eucharist, to appear purple and red (i.e. we presume, like venous and arterial blood); and again handing a small cup of wine and water to a woman, he ordered her to consecrate it; which done, he filled from it to overflowing a much larger cup (ibid. i. 13, § 2; Epiphan. Haer. 34, § 2). Magic, under one name or another, professed to heal by various means. It was represented to the sick, "If you would send for that praecantator, you would be well at once; if you were willing to hang such written charms (characters) on you, you could soon recover health. . . Send to that diviner; forward him your girdle or stomacher. Let it be measured, and let him look at it; and he will tell you what you are to do, and whether you can get over it. . . Such an one is good at fumigating: every one to whom he has done it, has become better at once. . . Come secretly to such a place, and I will raise up a person, who will tell you who stole your silver or your money; but if you wish to know it, take care not to cross yourself when you come to the spot. . . Women are wont to persuade each other that they ought to apply some charm (fascinum) to their sick children" (Caesarius, A.D. 502, Serm. 79, § 4). As we proceed, we shall see that astrology, storm-raising, sortilegy, etc. all come under the same general head of Magic.

II. The belief that there was something real in these arts was apparently universal. Even Celsus alleged them as a set-off against the miracles of Christ (Orig. c. Cels. i. 68). St. Peter was accused by the heathen of magic (August. de Civ. Dei, xix. 23). The Christian regarded it as evidence of the power and intervention of evil spirits in league with the wonder-worker. "By visions in dreams," says Justin Martyr, A.D. 140, "and by magic tricks do they lay hold of all those who do not strive at all for their salvation" (Apol. i. 14). It was said that they could be made to "obey mortals by certain arts, i.e. by magical incantations" (Recog. Clem. iv. 26). The truth of this is assumed both by Celsus and Origen, A.D. 230 (c. Cels. vi. 39; viii. 60–64); and it is a first principle with Tertullian (de Animâ, 56). Lactantius, A.D. 303, says, "Astrology, the arts of the aruspex and augur, and what are called oracles themselves, and necromancy and the magic art are their inventions" (Div. Instit. ii. 16). Minutius Felix, A.D. 220: "The Magi also not only know the demons, but whatever of the marvellous they pretend to perform, they do it by the aid of demons" (Octav. viii.). St. Augustine affirms the same thing: "All such arts, whether of a trifling or of a noxious superstition, from a certain pernicious association of men and demons . . . are to be altogether renounced and eschewed by the Christian" (de Doctr. Christ. ii. 23, § 36; see de Civ. Dei, viii. 19). He distinguishes between "miracles of human and magic arts jointly (that is, of arts of demons working through men)" and miracles "of the demons themselves wrought by themselves" (de Civ. Dei, xxi. 6, § 1). His theory was that there were certain things which attracted and gave pleasure to evil spirits according to their several natures, as animals are pleased by the food proper to their kinds. As spirits, they took delight in certain properties "in the various kinds of stones, herbs, woods, animals, in charms, and rites" (ibid.). He thought that they made their peculiar tastes known to their followers: "For if they did not teach it themselves, how could men learn what each of them craved, what he loathed, by what name he was to be invited, by what compelled" (ibid.). Some affirmed that human souls served the magician: "They are invoked who have died an untimely or violent death,[a] on the ground that it seems probable that those souls will be most helpful to violence and injury, whom a cruel and untimely end hath by violence and injury torn from life" (Tertull. de Animâ, 57; Apol. 23; comp. St. Chrysostom, de Lazaro Conc. ii. 1). Simon, in the spurious Clementine books, is made to confess that he murdered a young boy, and by terrible adjurations bound his soul to assist him in his magic practices (Recog. ii. 13; Hom. Clem. ii. 26; Gest. Petr. xxvii.). Justin Martyr speaks of "necromancies and the inspection (of the entrails) of uncorrupted boys (see Dionysius Al. in Euseb. Hist. Eccl. vii. 10; so Eus. of Maxentius, viii. 14; Vit. Const. i. 36; Aug. de Civ. Dei, xviii. 53) and the invocations of human souls (Apol. i. 18). It was denied, however, that a departed soul could be brought up, and alleged that the magician was deceived by the demons who really came to his call (Recog. iii. 49). St. Chrysostom: "This is a pretence and deceit of the devil: it is not the soul of the dead man that cries out, but the demon who makes those answers, so as to deceive the hearers" (Hom. 28 in Matt. viii. 29).

A particular spirit (δαίμων πάρεδρος) was in many cases supposed to attach himself to the sorcerer. Thus Justin M. (u. s.), "They who among magicians are called dream-senders and πάρεδροι." Irenaeus says of Marcus, "It is probable that he has also a familiar (δαίμονά τινα πάρεδρον), through whom he appears to prophesy himself, and causes those women to prophesy whom he deems worthy to partake of his grace" (Haer. i. 13, § 3). Elsewhere he speaks of "paredri and dream-senders" (ibid. 23, § 4; Sim. Euseb. Hist. Eccl. iv. 7). Tertullian: "We know that magicians, to explore secret things, call up (the dead) with the help of catabolici (spirits that seize and cast men down) and paredri and pythonic spirits" (de Animâ, 28).

III. An opinion prevailed widely in the early church, derived from Jewish sources, that magic was first cultivated when the children of Seth intermarried with those of Cain;[b] and that Ham, who had addicted himself to it, dreading its loss at the deluge, engraved the secrets of his art "on plates of various metals, such as could not be spoilt by the flood of waters, and on very hard stones" (Cassian. Collat. viii. 21). It is elsewhere affirmed that Ham practised and taught magic (Recog. Clem. iv. 27; Hom. ix. 3–7); but not by writers of credit. The story of the engraved plates is evidently imitated from a tradition in Josephus (Antiq. i. 2, § 3) that the children of Seth engraved an account of their more lawful discoveries on "two pillars, one of brick and the other of stone." Another opinion was held by Justin Martyr (Apol. ii. 5) and Tertullian (de Idol. 9). These authors, supposing that "the sons of God" in Gen. vi. 2 were angels, make them the instructors of man in the art of magic.

[a] Biaeothanati. He uses the word twice in the same chapter. Cassian (Instit. vii. 14; Collat. ii. 5) and others (Lamprid. in Heliog.; Bede in Martyrol. June 27; Passio S. Andr. in Surius, Nov. 30; Julius Firmicus, very often. See Gazaeus, note d, on Cass. Instit. u.s. and Rocca note e, on Sacram. Greg. Opp. Greg. v. 275, ed. 1615) use the less correct form biothanatus. Another occurs in the preface of a "Salis et Aquae Benedictio" in the Vatican Ins. of the Gregorian Sacramentary, published by Angelo Rocca, in which the water is adjured to drive away "omnem umbram, omnem satanam, et omnes machinationes spirituum, immundorum, sive bithonatum sive errantium ex invocatione magicae artis" (Opp. Greg. u.s. 239). [BIOTHANATOS, I. 207; FAITHFUL, I. 658.]

IV. For more than three centuries after Christ there was no tampering with magic on the part of Christians. Though believing in the reality of the art, they ridiculed it as delusive and worse than useless. Thus Tertullian: "What then shall we say that magic is? That which nearly all call it, deception. But the nature of the deception is known to us Christians only" (de Anim. 57). Minutius Felix (Octav. viii.), copied by St. Cyprian (de Idol. Van. p. 14; ed. 1690): "These spirits lie concealed under consecrated statues and images. They inspire the breasts of the soothsayers by breathing on them; they quicken the fibres of entrails, they govern the flights of birds, they rule lots, they give out oracles; they are always confounding false things with true; for they are deceived and they also deceive" (Cypr.). St. Cyprian adds that they send diseases and obtain credit for a cure by simply ceasing to afflict (ibid.; so Lactantius, Div. Inst. ii. 15). "They fill all things with snares, cheats, wiles, errors" (Lact. u. s. 14). "Skill in the art of magic is good for nothing but to cheat the eyes" (id. u. s. iv. 15).

V. The early Christians further believed that the demons, who were the real agents in the wonders of magic, could be controlled by the strong faith of any true Christian acting and speaking in his Master's name. Even of astrology, it was said, "until baptism that which is decreed holds: after it astrologers no longer speak the truth" (Clem. Alex. Fragm. § 78). The failure of the powers of evil began when Christ came. Tertullian: "We know the connexion between magic and astrology. . . The latter science was permitted until the gospel, that when Christ was born no one should thenceforth cast a person's nativity from the sky. . . So also the other kind of magic which works by miracles. . . . spun out the patience of God even to the gospel. . . . After the gospel, thou wilt nowhere find either wise men (sophistas) or Chaldeans, or enchanters or interpreters of dreams, or magicians, except such as are notoriously punished" (de Idol. 9). Origen held that "magicians having intercourse with demons, and invoking them as they have learnt and for their needs, can only succeed until something more divine and powerful than the demons and the charm (ἐπῳδῆς) which calls them, appears or is uttered" (c. Cels. i. 60). He suggests that the magi of St. Matthew ii. 1, finding that the spirits who served them had "become weak and strengthless, that their tricks were exposed and their power brought to nought," and remembering the prophecy of Balaam, were led to think that, He to whom the star guided them, "must be stronger than all demons, even those who were wont to appear to them and inspire them" (ibid.). Hence it was said that magic had been destroyed by the star of Bethlehem. So St. Ignatius A.D. 101, ὅθεν ἐλύετο πᾶσα Μαγεία (Epist. ad Ephes. 19). Compare St. Peter Chrysologus, A.D. 433 (Serm. 156). St. Basil, 370 (de Hum. Christi Genev. i. 591); St. Ambrose (Expos. Ev. S. Luc. ii. 48), etc. Of astrology especially, Clemens Al.: "For this reason a strange and new star arose that put an end to the ancient astrology" (ἀστροθεσίαν) (Fragm. § 74); Sim. Greg. Naz. (Carm. de Provid. Autom. v. l. 64). All this was by some understood in the command that the magi should depart into their own country another way (St. Matt. ii. 12). Thus Tertullian (u. s.): "They were not to walk in the ways of their former sect." St. Augustine more generally, but therefore inclusively, "Via mutata, vita mutata" (Serm. 202, § 4); Sim. Chrysol. (Serm. 159); St. Ambr. (Exp. Ev. S. Luc. i. 46); St. Leo (Serm. 32, § 4); Greg. M. (in Evang. Hom. x. sub fin.).

VI. When after the conversion of Constantine such practices were found among professed Christians, the most strenuous efforts were made to suppress them by the teachers of the church, and by legislators, both civil and ecclesiastical. They were denounced as remnants of idolatry, and a practical return to it. Thus Gregory Nazianzen, 370: "For this did the star lead, and the wise men fall down and offer gifts,—that idolatry might be destroyed" (Orat. i. tom. i. p. 12, compare with last paragraph). "Branches of idolatry," says Gaudentius of Brescia, A.D. 387, "are witchcrafts (veneficia), precantations, ligatures, phylacteries (vanitates), auguries, lots, the observing of omens, parental obsequies" (Tract. iv. in Pasch. ad Neoph.). St. Augustine: "It is a superstitious thing whatever hath been ordained of men towards the making and worshipping of idols, whether it pertain to the worship of a creature or any part of a creature as God, or to consultations and certain covenants by means of signs settled and agreed on with demons, such as are the essays of the magic art" (de Doctr. Christ. ii. 20, § 30).

The canons and laws which we shall now cite will shew that the church and the state prohibited every kind of magic on the grounds above mentioned. They will at the same time give an opportunity of explaining some details, which would be hardly worthy of a separate notice.

(1.) Ecclesiastical legislation.—The first conciliar decree against any branch of magic was that of Ancyra in Galatia, A.D. 315, which condemns to five years' penance "those who profess soothsaying (καταμαντευόμενοι) and follow the customs of the Gentiles, or bring certain men into their houses to discover remedies or perform lustrations" (can. 24). The version of this decree in the old Roman Code expands the first clause thus: "Qui auguria, auspiciaque, sive somnia, vel divinationes quaslibet secundum morem Gentilium observant" (in App. Opp. Leonis, p. 18). Here augurium and auspicium may be understood generally of the observation of omens: originally and strictly they were modes of di-vination from the cry, flight, and manners of feeding of birds. Later on, when the evil had increased, the council of Laodicea, probably about 365, with more details, forbad, under pain of excommunication, "priests and clerks to be magicians or enchanters (ἐπαοιδούς), or mathematici or astrologers, or to make what are called phylacteries, which are bonds for their own souls" (can. 36). The mathematici were astrologers according to the usage of that age; but a distinction appears to be made here, of which no satisfactory account has been given. The fourth council of Carthage, 398: "He who is enthralled to auguries and incantations is to be driven from the assembly of the Church" (can. 89). In 569, Martin, bishop of Braga, a Greek by birth, sent to a council held at Lugo, a collection of canons drawn chiefly from Greek sources. In this, beside the canons of Ancyra and Laodicea we find one (72; Labbe, v. 913), forbidding men to "observe or worship the elements, or the course of the moon or stars, or the vain deceit of omens (signorum), for building a house or planting crops or trees, or contracting marriages" (the reading of Gratian, P. ii. c. 26, qu. v. 3). In the same series (c. 74) rites and incantations are forbidden at the gathering of medicinal herbs. Only the Creed or the Lord's Prayer might be said, or simply, "Let God the creator of all things and their Lord be honoured." Women are told to use no charms in working wool; but only to "invoke God as their helper, who has given them skill in weaving" (75). This may be illustrated from St. Eligius, 640: "Let no woman presume to hang amber beads (sucinos) on her neck, or when weaving or dyeing, or at any work whatever, name Minerva or other ill-omened persons, but desire that the grace of Christ may be present at every work, and to trust with their whole heart in the virtue of His name" (de Rect. Christ. Conv. § 5). The Council of Auxerre, 578, forbids, among other practices of the kind, resort to carapii (can. 4). This word occurs again in can. 14, Conc. Narbon. A.D. 589. It is used by Eligius (ib. § 5 bis); by Bede, 701 (de Remed. Peccat. 11), and earlier than these, by Caesarius of Arles, 502 (if those sermons are his) who spells the word caraqus (Serm. 65, § 4; 78, §§ 1, 3, 5). It is also found in an Anjou Penitential, printed by Morinus (de Discipl. Poenit. App. 586), where for "cararios coriocos" read with Ducange "caragios curiosos." Pirminius, A.D. 750, spells it Karagius (Scaraps. in Mabill. Anal. 72). The word is derived from "character" in the sense of a talisman or amulet on which mystic characters were written or engraved. The fourth council of Toledo, 633, deposed and condemned to perpetual penance in a monastery any of the clergy from a bishop downwards, who should be found to have consulted magi, aruspices, arioli, augurs, sortilegi, or those who professed the art of magic or practised such things (can. 29). The council in Trullo, A.D. 691, subjects to six years of penance all who "give themselves over to soothsayers or to those who are called centurions (ἑκατόνταρχοι), or any such, with a view to learn from them what they wish to have revealed to them" (can. 61). "Centurion" in the sense of a "leading man" was a title conventionally given, like "wise man" or "wizard," to the professors of such arts. See HECATONTARCHAE. The same punishment was awarded to those who "led about shebears or other like animals to the delusion and injury of the more simple, and who talked of fortune and fate and genealogy, and used a heap of words of that kind, ... and to those who are called cloud-chasers (νεφοδίωκται), to enchanters, makers of phylacteries, and soothsayers;" whose practices the council declares to be "pernicious and heathen" (Ἑλληνικά). According to Balsamon and Zonaras, it was the custom to give hairs plucked from, and dyes (βάμματα) that had been hung about, bears and other animals as charms against disease and the evil eye. See AMULETS, LIGATURES, PHYLACTERIES. These dyes are probably the same as the succi (herbas et succos[c]), which Caesarius (Serm. 66, § 5) forbids Christians to "hang about themselves or their friends," though we are not told that these were supposed to derive virtue from an animal. Balsamon explains that the cloud chasers were those who drew omens from the forms and grouping of the clouds, especially at sunset. He adds that the canon condemns in intention those who wore a child's caul or employed secret things, as e.g. the gospels, for ligaturae or practised the sortes Davidicae (see SORTILEGY), or divined with barley. The last method he ascribes to women who used to "spend their time in the churches, and by the holy icons, and declared that they learned the future from them." In Clemens Al. (Protrept. ii. 11), we read of "flour-prophets and barley-prophets." Ecclesiastical prohibition occurs in a brief canon (12) of the synod of Rome, A.D. 721. In 789 the canon of Laodicea was inserted by name in Charlemagne's capitulary of that year (c. 18); but in an abstract which heads it the word μάγοι is represented by "coclearii." So Capit. Reg. Franc. i. 21; v. 69. "Cocle-arius" is a corruption of "Cauculator," which is from καῦκος, a cup used by diviners (see Gen. xliv. 5), or by makers of philtres. [CALCULATORES, p. 255.] And another chapter (63) of the same capitulary: "We command that none become either cauculatores (see again Capit. i. inc. an. c. 40; Baluz. i. 518; Cap. R. Fr. i. 62; vi. 374), and enchanters, or storm-raisers (tempestarii), or obligatores (see LIGATURES), and that where there are such, they be reformed or condemned." Storm-raisers are also condemned by a law of 805 (Capit. ii. 25) de Incantatoribus et Tempestariis. The word is written "tempestuarius" in a decree of Herard, A.D. 856 (cap. 2). Agobard, archbishop of Lyons, who had been an adviser of Charlemagne, wrote a treatise of some length against this offence. See TEMPESTARIUS. In 813 the Council of Tours, under that prince, directed priests to warn the people that "magic arts and incantations are altogether unavailing to the cure of any human diseases, and to the healing of sick, lame, or dying animals; and that ligatures of bones or herbs applied to any mortal thing are useless" (can. 42).

[c] "Sucinos" would seem a probable amendment. See Eligius in text above. Pirminius joins herbs with amber: "Karacharer (Characteras), herbas, succino (succinos) nolite vobis [illegible]stris appendere" (Scaraps. u. s. 69).

(2.) Imperial legislation.—The first edict of Constantine that has any bearing on our subject appeared at the end of October 312, nine months before the defeat of Maxentius. It was directed against the aruspices, and as it only mentions the exercise of their art in houses its probable object was to check inquiry by divination into the destinies of the empire and its rulers. The aruspex was to be burnt alive, and his employers banished (Cod. ix. 18, l. 3; de Arusp.). His next (de Magis), in 321, went further, but was far from being thorough. It declared generally the most severe punishment to be due to those who were "found, armed with magic arts, to have made attempts against the health of men, or to have turned chaste minds aside to lust," but it adds that "remedies sought for the bodies of men or helps innocently used in country places," against unseasonable weather were not to be treated as offences (ib. 4). Constantine and Julian in 357: "Let no one consult an aruspex or a mathematicus . . . . No one a hariolus. Let the wicked profession of the augurs and diviners be silenced. Let not the Chaldeans and the magi, and the rest, whom the people call maleici for the greatness of their crimes, make even a partial attempt. Let curiosity of divination for ever cease with all" (ib. 5). The penalty was death by the sword. Another law not a year later threatened death by fire to those who, "using magic arts, dared to disturb the elements, undermine the life of the innocent, and calling up the dead by wicked practices to kill their enemies" (ib. 6). In July 358, the same princes published an edict condemning every kind of divination, avowedly on the ground that it was employed in a spirit hostile to themselves (ib. 7). The penalty was death with torture, and no rank was to plead exemption. The crime had been common under heathen emperors, and it is probable that most of the offenders under Constantius were heathen. Long before Tertullian had spoken of those who publicly honoured Caesar, but privately "consulted astrologers and aruspices. and augurs, and magi respecting his life" (Apol. 35, where in notes to the translation in the Library of the Fathers Dr. Pusey refers to Tacitus, Ann. xii. 52; xvi. 30, and Spartianus apud Gothofred, Prol. ad Lib. ad Nat. p. 11). Firmicus Maternus, in his treatise on astrology written between 335 and 360, cautions his disciples thus: "Take care never to answer one who questions you respecting the state of the republic or the life of the Roman emperor; for it is neither right nor lawful that we should by a wicked curiosity say anything of the state of the republic. . . . But no mathematicus has been able to define anything true respecting the fate of the emperor" (Matheseos, ii. 33). The necessity of this caution appears from several stories in Ammianus (Hist. xix. 12), and others. In the reign of Valens, for example, A.D. 373, Theodorus was supposed to be indicated as his successor by a tripod of laurel wood duly prepared, which by some means spelt out his name to the fourth letter (θεοδ). The death of Theodorus and his partisans did not appease the emperor, who caused many innocent persons to be murdered because their names began with the same letters, or on grounds equally frivolous (Sozom. Hist. vi. 35). Julian himself professed to believe in such arts. He acknowledged that the oracles had failed; but alleged that Zeus, "lest men should be altogether deprived of intercourse with the gods, gave them a means of observation through the sacred arts, from which they might derive sufficient help in their need" (in Cyrill. Al. c. Jul. vi. p. 198; ed. Spanh.). In 364 Valentinian condemned "magicos apparatus" in connexion with heathen rites performed by night (Codex Theodos. ix. xvi. 7), and in 370 (probably) made the art of the mathematicus, exercised by night or day, punishable by death (ib. 8); but in 371 he declared that the aruspex was not guilty of witchcraft. "We do not blame the art of the aruspex, but forbid it to be exercised injuriously" (ib. 9). He regarded it as a necessary part of the heathen worship then tolerated; but its secret exercise was still prohibited under the law of Constantine. In 389 Valentinian, Theodosius, and Arcadius decreed that every maleficus should be denounced as an "enemy of the public safety;" but chariot-drivers in the public races were forbidden to inform under pain of death (ib. 11). They were excepted, because many of them lay under suspicion of using magic to give speed to their own or to injure their rival's horses. See on this among Christian writers, Arnob. adv. Gent. i. cir. med.; Jerome, Vita Hilarionis, c. 15; St. Chrysost. Hom. xii. in Ep. i. ad Cor. (iv. 11, 12); Greg. Naz. ad Seleuc. Iamb. iii.; Cassiodorus, Variar. iii. 51. It should be mentioned in conclusion that the exception of Constantine in favour of charms against bad weather was repealed by Leo VI. who became emperor in 886 (Constit. 65, de Incantatorum Poena).

MAGIGNUS, martyr, with Nabor and Faustinus, according to the Bollandists' reading of Hier. n. Mart., where Migne reads Migignus; commemorated Sept. 26 (Boll. Acta SS. Sept. vii. 264). [C. H.]

MAGINUS, called by others MAXIMUS, martyr in Tarragona under Maximinus; commemorated Aug. 25 (Boll. Acta SS. Aug. v. 118). [C. H.]

MAGISTER. (1) Magister disciplinae or infantum. A custom grew up in Spain towards the end of the fifth century, that parents should dedicate their children, while yet very young, to the service of the church, and in this case they were educated and brought up in the house of the bishop, by some "discreet and grave" presbyter, who was deputed by the bishop for that duty. He was called praepositus or magister disciplinae. The second council of Toledo (A.D. 633), held under Amalric, one of the Gothic kings, says in its first capitulum, of such young persons, "in domo ecclesiae sub episcopali praesentia a praeposito sibi debeant eruditi." Similarly, the fourth council in the same place (A.D. 633), cap. 23 [al. 24], "si qui in clero puberes aut adolescentes existunt, omnes in uno conclavi atrii commorentur, ut in disciplinis ecclesiasticis agant, deputati probatissimo seniore, quem et magistrum disciplinae et testem vitae habeant."

Also in monasteries, he who had charge of the children who were commonly educated in them was so called; as in Ordericus Vitalis, lib. iii. p. 462, "ad infantum magisterium promovit." [SCHOOLS.] [S. J. E.]

(2) Magister infirmarius, the chief of the brethren in a monastery deputed to visit and attend to the sick. [INFIRMARY, I. 837.]

(3) Magister major, a title sometimes given to the chief of the magistri infantum. See (1) above.

(4) Magister novitiorum, the officer in a monastery to whom the charge of the novices was especially committed.

Cassian (de Instit. Coenob. iv. 7) tells us that a candidate for admission to a monastery is not at once to be admitted into the general body of the brethren, but given for a time into the charge of an elder monk, who has his station for that purpose not far from the entrance of the monastery. During this period the novice had no separate cell, and was not allowed to quit the master's cell without his permission (d. s. iv. 10). Similarly the Rule of St. Benedict (c. 58) provides that the novice shall be taken to the cell of the novices, where he is to meditate, eat, and sleep; and that a senior monk shall be assigned to him, who shall give all possible pains to raise his spiritual state. It seems from this that St. Benedict designed to give a separate magister to each novice; but the practice of later times was to have one room and one master for all the novices. Compare (1) above.

Cassian tells us (Coll. xi. 20, c. 1) that he himself acted as "magister" to Pinufius, who (though he had fled from another monastery) was treated as a novice. Euphrosyne, in man's dress, was committed to the charge of a senior by the abbat of a monastery to which she had fled (Life in Rosweyd's Vitae Patrum, c. 8, p. 365); and a man like Joannes Damascenus, already of distinguished piety, was placed by the head of the monastery of St. Sabas under the charge of a senior. (Life in Surius, c. 18, v. p. 159, ed. Turin, 1876.) See Alteserrae Asceticon, lib. ii. c. 10. [C.]

MAGISTRATES. [JURISDICTION; LAW.]

MAGISTRATUS. Pelliccia (i. 27, quoted by Augusti, Handbuch, i. 170) states that "magistratus nomine primo episcopus, secundo presbyter in usum veniunt;" that is, that the two higher orders, bishop and presbyter, are admitted to the title of magistri, while the inferior orders which subserved them were ministri. [MINISTER.] This distinction seems to correspond with that elsewhere made between ἱερούμενοι and ὑπηρέται (Cave, Prim. Christianity, pt. i. ch. 8.) [C.]

MAGITA, martyr; commemorated at Alexandria Sept. 8 (Hieron. Mart.). [C. H.]

MAGLORIUS [ST. MAGLOIRE], bishop of Dol, circ. A.D. 575; commemorated Oct. 24 (Mabill. Acta SS. O. S. B. saec. i. p. 209). [C. H.]

MAGNA, martyr in Africa; commemorated Dec. 3 (Hieron. Mart.; Bed. Mart. Auct.). [C. H.]

MAGNERICUS, archbishop of Treves in the 6th century, confessor; commemorated July 25 (Boll. Acta SS. July, vi. 168). [C. H.]

MAGNIFICAT. [CANTICLE.]

MAGNILIS, martyr; commemorated at Capua Aquaria Sept. 1 (Hieron. Mart.). [C. H.]

MAGNILUS (1) Martyr in Africa; commemorated July 30 (Hieron. Mart.).

(2) Martyr; commemorated at Rome Aug. 23 (Hieron. Mart.).

(3) Martyr in Mauritania; commemorated Oct. 17 (Hieron. Mart.).

(4) Martyr in Macedonia; commemorated Oct. 31 (Hieron. Mart.). [C. H.]

MAGNOBODUS, commemorated Oct. 16 (Boll. Acta SS. Oct. vii. 2, 940). [C. H.]

MAGNUS (1) Martyr; commemorated Jan. 1 (Boll. Acta SS. Jan. i. 21).

(2) Martyr at Rome in the Forum Sempronii; commemorated on Feb. 4 (Usuard. Mart.; Hieron. Mart.; Bed. Mart. Auct.).

(3) Martyr; commemorated at Rome on the Via Flaminia Feb. 14 (Hieron. Mart.).

(4) Martyr at Interamna; commemorated Feb. 15 (Hieron. Mart.; Bed. Mart. Auct.).

(5) Martyr at Thessalonica; commemorated April 2 (Hieron. Mart.).

(6) Martyr with eight others at Cyzicus; commemorated April 29 (Basil. Menol.).

(7) Martyr in Africa; commemorated May 26 (Hieron. Mart.).

(8) Martyr; commemorated at Rome on the Via Tiburtina July 18 (Hieron. Mart.).

(9) Martyr at Corinth; commemorated July 20 (Hieron. Mart.).

(10) Martyr; commemorated at Rome on the Via Portuensis July 29 (Hieron. Mart.).

(11) One of four subdeacons beheaded at Rome with Xystus; commemorated Aug. 6 (Usuard, Mart.; Bed. Mart.).

(12) Martyr; commemorated at Alexandria Aug. 9 (Hieron. Mart.).

(13) Otherwise ANDREAS, martyr with 250 companions; commemorated Aug. 19 (Usuard. Mart.; Bed. Mart.; Hieron. Mart.). A bishop and martyr of this name in Italy, and likewise a bishop of Avignon, confessor, were commemorated on this day (Boll. Acta SS. Aug. iii. 704, 779).

(14) Martyr; commemorated at Capua Aug. 27 (Hieron. Mart.).

(15) Martyr; commemorated at Rome "ad Sanctam Felicitatem," Sept. 4 (Hieron. Mart.; Bed. Mart. Auct.). Another of this name was commemorated on the same day, apparently at Ancyra in Galatia (Hieron. Mart.; Usuard. Mart.).

(16) Martyr; commemorated at Capua Sept. 5 (Hieron. Mart.).

(17) Abbat of Fuessa; commemorated Sept. 6 (Boll. Acta SS. Sept. ii. 735).

(18) Martyr in Sicily; commemorated Sept. 10 (Hieron. Mart.).

(19) Martyr; commemorated at Rome Sept. 16 (Hieron. Mart.).

(20) Bishop of Opitergium (Oderzo), afterwards of Heraclea, confessor; commemorated Oct. 6 (Boll. Acta SS. Oct. iii. 416).

(21) Martyr; commemorated at Caesarea in Cappadocia, Oct. 25 (Hieron. Mart.).

(22) Martyr; commemorated Nov. 1; and on the same day another at Terracina (Hieron. Mart.).

(23) Martyr; commemorated Nov. 8 at Nicomedia (Hieron. Mart.).

(24) Martyr; commemorated at Bononia in Gaul (Boulogne), Nov. 27 (Hier. Mart.). [C. H.]

MAGORIANUS, of Trent, confessor in the 5th century; commemorated March 15 (Boll. Acta SS. March, ii. 403). [C. H.]

MAGRINUS, martyr at Nevedunum (Nyon); commemorated Sept. 17 (Hieron. Mart.). [C. H.]

MAGROBIUS, martyr. [MACROBIUS, July 20.] [C. H.]

MAIANUS or MEVENNUS, abbat in Brittany, in the 6th century, commemorated June 21 (Boll. Acta SS. June, iv. 101). [C. H.]

MAJESTAS. An ancient rubric given by Martene (de Rit. Ant. I. v. 2, Ordo 36) runs as follows: "Hic libri majestatem deosculetur." Here the majestas which the priest is to kiss is the representation of the Holy Trinity prefixed to the altar-book or tablet. [C.]

MAJOLUS. [MAJULUS.]

MAJOR (1) Soldier, martyr at Gaza under Diocletian; commemorated Feb. 15 (Basil. Menol.; Boll. Acta SS. Feb. ii. 901).

(2) Confessor; commemorated at Rome in the cemetery of Praetextatus May 10 (Hieron. Mart.). [C. H.]

MAJORICA, martyr; commemorated in Afrodiris Ap. 30 (Hieron. Mart.) [C. H.]

MAJUSA, martyr; commemorated at Thessalonica June 1 (Hieron. Mart.). [C. H.]

MAJULINUS (1) Martyr at Tarragona, commemorated Jan. 21 (Hieron. Mart.).

(2) Martyr, at Militana in Armenia; commemorated Ap. 19 (Hieron. Mart.).

(3) Martyr; commemorated Nov. 16 (Hieron. Mart.). [C. H.]

MAJULUS (1) Martyr; commemorated in Africa Jan 18 (Hieron. Mart.).

(2) Martyr; commemorated in Africa Jan. 19 (Hieron. Mart.).

MALACHI the Prophet; commemorated by the Greeks Jan. 3 (Cal. Byzant.; Cal. Aethiop.; Daniel, Cod. Liturg. iv. 250; Basil. Menol.); by the Latins on Jan. 14 (Boll. Acta SS. Jan. i. 931). [C. H.]

MALARDUS or MALEHARDUS, bishop of Carnot circ. A.D. 660; commemorated Jan. 19 (Boll. Acta SS. Jan. ii. 235). [C. H.]

MALCHUS (1) Martyr; commemorated at Caesarea in Palestine March 28 (Vet. Rom. Mart.; Bed. Mart. Auct.).

(2) Martyr; commemorated at Rome in the cemetery of Praetextatus May 10 (Hieron. Mart.).

(3) Commemorated at Thessalonica June 1 (Hieron. Mart.).

(4) Commemorated at Ephesus with Maximianus and Martianus and four others July 27 (Usuard. Mart.).

(5) Monk and confessor at Maronia, near Antioch, 4th century; commemorated Oct. 21 (Boll. Acta SS. Oct. ix. 59). [C. H.]

MALEDICTION (Maledictio). Maledictions [compare ANATHEMA] were used on various occasions, as (for instance) in EXCOMMUNICATION [I. 641], and in the DEGRADATION [I. 542]. An early example of the latter is the curse of Silverius on his rival Vigilius (Binius, Concilia, iv. 143): "Habeto ergo cum his qui tibi consentiunt paenae damnationis sententiam, sublatumque tibi nomen et munus ministerii sacerdotalis agnosce, S. Spiritus judicio et apostolica a nobis auctoritate damnatus." Another is that mentioned by Gregory of Tours (Hist. Franc. v. 19), where, in the case of Praetextatus, bishop of Rouen, king Chilperic demanded that either his tunic [ALB] should be rent, or the 108th [109th A.V.] psalm, which contains the curses on Iscariot (qui maledictiones Scarioticas continet), should be said over his head, or at any rate judgment of perpetual excommunication recorded against him [MARANATHA].

A specimen of a curse denounced against those who took possession of the lands of a monastery is given by Martene (de Rit. Antiq. III. iii. Ordo 3): "May their portion and their inheritance be the torments of everlasting fire, with Korah, Dathan, and Abiram, who went down quick into hell, with Judas and Pilate, with Annas and Caiaphas, with Simon Magus and Nero; with whom may they be tormented in everlasting torment without end, so as to have no fellowship with Christ or His saints in the rest of heaven, but have fellowship with the devil and his companions, being appointed to the torments of hell, and perish everlastingly. So be it! So be it!" [C.]

MALEFICUS, the name popularly given to one supposed able to bewitch a person or his property. "Quos vere Maleficos vulgus appellat," says Lactantius (Div. Instit. ii. 16), and similarly Constantius (Leges, 4, 6 de Malef. in Codex Theodos. ix. 16), and St. Augustine (de Civ. Dei, x. 9). The crime was itself called Maleficium, as if pre-eminently a deed of wickedness. A law of Constantius, A.D. 357, after reference to aruspices and others, proceeds to condemn "the Chaldeans and Magi, and the rest whom the common people call Malefici, from the greatness of their misdoing" (l. 4, u. s.). They were believed to obtain their power to injure others from evil spirits, either demons properly so called, or the souls of the dead. Thus Lactantius (u. s.), speaking of the demons, says that the Malefici, "when they exercise their execrable arts, call them up by their true names" (not by those of the ancient heroes, etc., which they assumed to deceive). These spirits were invoked with bloody sacrifices and other pagan rites. St. Jerome, distinguishing between Malefici and other professors of occult arts, says that the former "use blood and victims, and often touch the bodies of the dead" (Comm. in Dan. ii.). They corresponded to the γόητες of the Greeks, who were so called from the peculiar howl in which they intoned their incantations: "Illicitis artibus deditos . . . quos et Maleficos vulgus appellat . . . ad goetiam pertinere dicunt" (August. u. s.). Γοητεία, as Zonaras explains, "is the doing aught to the injury of others by means of incantations and invocation of demons" (Comm. in St. Bas. Epist. ad Amphil. ad can. 65; sim. Balsamon, ibid.). See MAGIC. [W. E. S.]

MANASCHIERT, COUNCIL OF (Manaschiertense Concilium), held at Manaschert in Armenia A.D. 687, according to Mansi, by command of Omar the Saracen leader, under the Armenian patriarch John. Its decrees on doctrine seem framed in opposition to the sixth council, where Monothelism was condemned; while several of its decrees on discipline seem condemned professedly by the 32nd and 56th of the Trullan canons (Mansi, xi. 1099. MANDRA. A favourite appellation for monastic establishments in the East was mandra, μάνδρα, a fold, used both alone, ἐν μοναστηρίοις ὑπάρχοντες εἴτουν μάνδραις (Epiphan. Haeres. 80), or with distinctive epithets ἁγία, θεία, ἱερά, πνευματικὴ μάνδρα. The sacred precinct, or cloistered atrium in front of the church of St. Simeon Stylites, surrounding the pillar on which he stood, was popularly known as Mandra, taking the name of the enclosed plot in the midst of which the column was erected (Evagr. H. E. i. 13, 14). [ARCHIMANDRITE.] [E. V.]

MANDUTIUS; commemorated Aug. 16 (Cal. Byzant.). [C. H.]

MANDYAS (μανδύας, μανδύη, μανδίον). This name is now given in the Greek church to the outer garment worn by monks, which is also used on some occasions by bishops, who are, as a rule, drawn from the monastic orders. In shape it is, on the whole, similar to a cope, being a long cloak, reaching almost to the feet, and fastened at the throat.

It seems originally to have been borrowed from the Persians, and is defined by Hesychius as εἶδος ἱματίου Περσῶν, πολεμικὸν ἱμάτιον. In the West we find it frequently spoken of as a dress worn by emperors and kings. The earliest instance of the use of the word in its ecclesiastical sense is apparently in Germanus, patriarch of Constantinople (Hist. Eccles. et Mystica Theoria; Patrol. Gr. xcviii. 396). For later instances reference may be made to Ducange, Glossarium Graecum, s.v., and Goar's Euchologion, pp. 113, 495. [R. S.]

MANGER (Praesepe). In the crypt beneath the altar of the Sixtine chapel which forms part of the Liberian basilica (S. Maria Maggiore) at Rome is preserved the sacred culla, which forms the object of a solemn ceremony and procession on Christmas Eve. The culla is supposed to consist of five boards of the manger in which the infant Saviour was laid at the Nativity [MAGI; NATIVITY]. This manger was visited by Jerome and his disciple Paula (Hieron. Epist. 108, ad Eustochium, § 10). The boards were brought to Rome from Bethlehem, together with some fragments of rock from the cave which is the traditional scene of the Nativity, when the remains of St. Jerome were translated in the middle of the seventh century by pope Theodore I. [Not A.D. 352, as is maintained by Benedict XIV., de Canoniz. Sanct. l. iv. pt. 2.] They are now enclosed in an urn of silver and crystal, with a gilt figure of the Holy Child on the top. (Wetzer and Welte, Kirchenlexicon, xii. 698, s. v. Krippe; Murray, Handbook of Rome, p. 128, 9th ed.) The modern practice of setting up in churches representations of the manger or cradle is said to have originated with St. Francis of Assisi. [C.]

MANIPLE (Pallium Linostimum [?], Mappula, Manipulus [to be referred, like the other uses of the word, to the primary notion of handful; see Ducange, s.v.], Manipula, Sudarium, Phanon, Fanon [cf. German Fahne and Latin pannus, which are doubtlessly allied: see Grimm, Deutsches Wörterbuch, s. v.; the English pennon also is apparently derived from pannus], Mantile, Manutergium: ἐγχείριον).

This vestment in its primary form appears to have been merely a handkerchief or napkin held in the hand, but in later times it became an ornamental vestment pendent from the left wrist. It perhaps furnishes us with another illustration of what we have already spoken of in the case of the dalmatic (see the article), of the gradual extension of what was in its origin a peculiar use of the local Roman church throughout the whole of the West; an extension at first jealously resisted by the Roman clergy. The Eastern church has nothing answering to the maniple, but apparently the ἐγχείριον spoken of by Germanus, to which we shall refer below, was in its time a real, though accidental, parallel.

Possibly the earliest trace of the original use of the maniple is to be found in the order of Silvester I. (ob. A.D. 335) that deacons should wear dalmatics in church, and that their left hand should be covered with a cloth of linen warp (pallium linostimum: see Walafrid Strabo, de Rebus Eccles. c. 24; Patrol. cxiv. 952; Anastasius Bibliothecarius, de Vitis Rom. Pont., Patrol. cxxvii. 1513). Marriott, who is disposed to connect this with the later maniple, suggests (Vestiarium Christianum, p. 108 n.) that the order may have had reference primarily to the handling of the eucharistic vessels. The same order as to the use of this cloth was made by Zosimus (ob. A.D. 418) (Anastasius, op. cit. 59; Patrol. cxxviii. 174).

Others have argued that this pallium linostinum is rather to be associated with the stole (see esp. Macer, Hierole cicon, s. v. Linostima).

In the time of Gregory the Great, we meet with the mappula as a jealously guarded vestment or ornament of the Roman clergy, which had been in use among them for some time. The clergy of the church of Ravenna having ventured to make use of this vestment, the Roman clergy loudly maintained that it was a peculiar right of their own, and protested against the clergy of Ravenna wearing the mappula either there or at Rome. Gregory, writing to John, bishop of Ravenna, settled the matter by giving permission to the chief deacons of Ravenna (primis diaconibus vestris) to wear the mappulæ when in attendance on the bishop; permission, however, being absolutely refused (vehementissime prohibemus) for other times and to other persons (Epist. lib. iii. 56; vol. iii. 668). Bishop John, in his answer, remarks that in the time of Gregory's predecessors, whenever a bishop of Ravenna had been consecrated at Rome, the attendant priests and deacons had openly used mappulæ without any fault being found, and that this had been the case when he was himself consecrated bishop.

The above instance has generally been supposed to belong to the early history of the maniple, as by Bona (de Rebus Liturgicis, i. 24. 5), Binterim (Denkwürdigkeiten, vol. iv. part 1, pp. 203 sqq.). At a later period, however, the latter writer (op. cit. vol. vii. part 3, pp. 359 sqq.), followed by Hefele (Beiträge zu Kirchengeschichte, Archäologie, und Liturgik, ii. 180), argued that it is here rather to be understood of a kind of moveable canopy (see Durandus, Rat. Div. Off. iv. 6. 11, and Ducange, s.v.); and it may fairly be admitted that the terms in which both the contest and the concession are described are on the whole more applicable to this latter view. It is interesting to add here, in face of this conflict of theories, that, so far as appears, there is no trace of a maniple in the famous mosaic in the church of St. Vitalis at Ravenna, which is assigned to the end of the 6th century. (Figured above, s.v. DALMATIC, from Gally Knight's Ecclesiastical Architecture of Italy, plate x.)

It is not till the 8th or 9th century that we meet with distinct allusions to the maniple as a sacred vestment. Mabillon notices a donation bequeathed to a monastery in the year A.D. 781, in which, with numerous other church ornaments, "quinque manipuli" (the earliest instance we have been able to find of the name maniple) are mentioned (Annales Ordinis S. Benedicti, lib. 25, c. 53). Martene again refers (de Antiquis Ecclesiæ Ritibus, iii. 187; ed. Venice, 1783) to an ancient missal in the monastery of St. Denis and assigned by him to about the time of Charlemagne, in which was given a prayer at the putting on of the maniple: "præcinge me, Domine, virtute, et pone immaculatam vitam meam."[a]

We may next cite Rabanus Maurus (de Cler. Inst. i. 18; Patrol. cvii. 18), who, writing early in the 9th century, speaks of the maniple as the "mappula sive mantile . . . quod vulgo phanonem vocant," which is held in the hand at the celebration of mass by the "sacerdotes et ministri altaris." About the same time we find Amalarius (de Eccl. Off. ii. 24; Patrol. cv. 1099) commenting on the maniple under the name sudarium, and entering at length into the symbolism of it. We also find a reference to it in the treatise de Divinis Officiis, once referred to Alcuin (c. 39; Patrol. ci. 1243). This work is now, however, assigned to the 10th or 11th century. In the homily de Cura Pastorali, ascribed to Leo IV. (ob. A.D. 855), the injunction is given that the maniple (fanon) is to be among the vestments invariably to be made use of when mass is sung (Patrol. cxv. 675), the others specified being amice, alb, stole, and planeta; and we find the same command repeated in the following century by Ratherius, bishop of Verona (Patrol. cxxxvi. 559).

To add one more illustration, the order is made in the year A.D. 889 by bishop Riculfus of Soissons, that each church should possess at least "duo cinctoria et totidem mappulas mitidas" (Statuta, c. 7; Patrol. cxxxi. 17).

In Rabanus Maurus and the other liturgiologists cited above, the maniple is spoken of as carried in the hand, the left being sometimes specially mentioned; but, in course of time, it was worn pendent from the wrist (see e. g. Hugo de St. Victore, Serm. 14; Patrol. clxxvii. 928; Honorius Augustodunensis, Gemma Animæ, i. 208; Patrol. clxxii. 606).

It ought to be added here that the maniple does not appear to have been universally employed as a sacred vestment in the 9th century, for e. g. in the illustrations in the Pontifical of Landulfus, which is assigned to that period, none of the priests wear maniples (see Marriott, plates 34–36). Conversely also, it may be remarked, we find, and that at quite a later period, traces of the maniple being worn by lay monks. Thus e. g. Lanfranc of Canterbury, speaking with reference to the ordering of subdeacons, says, "in coenobiis monachorum etiam laici albis induuntur et antiqua patrum institutione solent ferre manipulum" (Epist. 13; Patrol. cl. 520). A council of Poitiers (A.D. 1100) forbids monks, unless they are subdeacons, to assume the maniple (Concil. Pictav. can. 5; Labbe, vii. 725).

With the growth of the church's wealth and power in the 9th century, the general character of vestments was considerably modified into a more costly and elaborate form. As a curious example of this in the case of the maniple, we may cite the will of Riculfus, bishop of Helena, (ob. A.D. 915), who in a long list of valuable articles mentions "manipulos sex cum auro, unum sex (leg. ex) iis cum tintinnabulis"[b] (Patrol. cxxxii. 468). Into the later notices, however, of the maniple it is not our province to enter.

The Eastern church, as we have said, does not use the maniple, but probably the ἐγχείριον, mentioned by Germanus, is practically a parallel. It is spoken of by him as worn by deacons attached to the girdle, and as symbolising the towel on which our Lord dried His hands after washing His disciples' feet (Hist. Eccles. et Mystica Theoria; Patrol. Gr. xcviii. 394). The epimanikion, however (ἐπιμανίκιον, μανίκιον, ὑπομανίκιον), while presenting an apparent similarity to the maniple, is utterly different from it in fact. The word (a barbarous compound of Latin and Greek) denotes a cuff, as being worn upon the sleeves of both arms, and is now one of the actual ornaments of bishops (to whom it was long restricted) and priests (and latterly also of deacons, Neale, l. c.) in the Greek church (Goar, Euchologion, p. 111; Neale, Eastern Church, Introd. p. 307).

[a] A curious error has been here made by Hefele, who (op. cit. p. 181) has inadvertently cited as given by Martene from a "copy of the Ambrosian Liturgy made by command of Charlemagne," a form which is really from a copy of that liturgy printed in 1560 by the command of St. Charles [Borromeo], archbishop of Milan. (Martene, op. cit. p. 173.)

Finally, we may give a passing remark as to one or two other ecclesiastical uses of some of the Latin names of the maniple. Thus fanon is also used for the name of the cloth in which is wrapped up the bread for use in the Eucharist:—so in an Ordo Romanus "fanonibus puris oblationes tenent" (Amalarius, Ecloga de Officio Missae, c. 19; in Menard's Greg. Sacr. 554)—and also for the cloth which enwraps the chalice (ibid. c. 20). It is used again for a kind of veil worn on the head of the pope beneath the mitre (Ordo Romanus, xiv. 43; op. cit. 270; cf. also 281, 357, 537 [even in death, ib. 527]; it is also styled simply mappa). The word mappula is used in the Regula Monachorum of Isidore (c. 12, Patrol. lxxxiii. 882) for a garment worn over the shoulders by a monk who has not a pallium. In the Regula Fructuosi (c. 4; Patrol. lxxxvii. 1101), mappula is used apparently in the sense of a towel or napkin, as a part of the equipment of a monk's cell. See also Reg. S. Benedicti, c. 55. [R. S.]

MANNA (IN ART). Two examples from Bosio's plates (see Bottari, tav. clxiv. and tab. lvii.) are supposed by Aringhi to represent Moses pointing to four or seven baskets of the manna of the wilderness. Bottari expresses some doubt in both cases, thinking that, at all events in the example which contains seven baskets, the figure must be intended for Our Lord. This may be the case, but the contents of the baskets may still be intended for manna, in reference to St. John vi. 41. Millin (Voyages dans le Midi de France, etc. xxxviii. 8, lix. 3), gives two sarcophagi, in which a personage who may pass for Moses stands pointing to three jars or "omers," probably meant for manna, the more so as two figures bearing a bunch of grapes are near them (Num. xiii. 24). Compare LOAVES, II. 1038.

There is besides a newly discovered fresco, of which Martigny gives a woodcut, which clearly represents the gathering of the manna; but, if it be correctly copied, the drapery of the figures has a somewhat mediaeval-Italian appearance. It represents the falling manna, with four figures spreading their garments to catch it. (See woodcut.) It was discovered in 1863 in the catacomb of St. Cyriaca. It occupies the whole side of a crypt, and the manna is represented like snow or hail. Our Lord's mention of the manna, and open appeal to it as the symbol of His body best suited, before His death, to the understanding of His Jewish hearers, may very probably invest these pictures of the bread of the wilderness with eucharistic meaning. They may be supposed to be pictorial repetitions of the text "I am that Bread of Life." And this is yet more probable, where, as in Bottari lvii., Moses is represented in the act of striking the rock, as an accompanying sculpture.

As was observed before, it may be our Lord rather than Moses, who is represented with the seven baskets, though it was the miracle of the Five Loaves which preceded His discourse at Capernaum, and twelve baskets would therefore be more correct. Nevertheless, His words connect the manna of the Mosaic dispensation both with His miracle, and with the institution of the Holy Communion, and the pictures seem clearly meant for the same purpose. MANSE. (Mansis, mansa, mansum, mansus; also, especially in Italy, masa, masagium (whence messuage), masata, massa, massus, &c. Fr. mas, Norm. mois. Burgund. meix. The most common form is mansus.) Strictly, the mansus seems to have been a piece of arable land of twelve acres (jugera, bunnaria), which suggests mensus as the original form; but it was not restricted to pieces of that precise extent. When it is not so used, the quantity is mentioned (see Ducange in v.). Mansus dominicatus or indominicatus was the homestead attached to the residence of the lord and occupied by him (Kar. Calv. Exact. Normannis Constit. A.D. 877, Capit. Reg. Fr. ii. 257, 258. Sim. Formulae Marculfi (Lindenbr.), c. 79, ibid. 534, etc.). Charlemagne, 813 (Capit. ii.), speaks of the "mansum regale" in his forests, i.e. the clearing, or field, on which the coloni dwelt (cap. 19). By a like usage, a piece of land by which a church was wholly or partially endowed (= the "glebe") was called the "mansus ecclesiae." A law of Louis the Godly, 816 ("De Mansis uniuscujusque Ecclesiæ"), decrees that to every church be allotted one whole mansus free of service, and that the priests settled in them should "do no service on account of the aforewritten mansus, except that due to the church" (Capit. Aquisgr. 19; also in Capit. Reg. Franc. i. 85, v. 214). Charlemagne seems to have desired a larger provision, for in legislating for the Saxons, he says, "All of the lesser chapters have agreed that the country people who go to a church give to every church a court (curtem) and two mansi of land" (cap. 15). The Lombardic laws (iii. i. 46), 824 (Ludov. P.), provide that "if a church happen to be built in any place which was wanted, and yet had no endowment," "one mansus consisting of twelve bunnaria of arable land be given there, and two serfs by the freemen who are to hear office in the said church, that there may be priests there, and that divine worship may be held; but that if the people will not do this it be pulled down" (v. Espen, ii. iv. iv. 23). Hincmar of Rheims in 852 asked of each parish priest in his diocese "whether he had a mansus of twelve bunnaria, beside a cemetery and a court (cortem) in which the church and his house stood, or if he had four serfs" (Labbe, Conc. viii. 573).

Mansi were given to churches to provide them with lights (Capit. Reg. Fr. ii. 5), and an ancient gloss on the canon law says, "Mansus appellatur undé percipitur frumentum et vinum ad Eucharistiam consecrandam" (from Chron. Wormat. apud Ludewig. ii. Reliq. MSS.—Ducange).

By a law in the Fourth Book of the Capitularies of the French Kings (iv. 28), compiled in 827, courts of justice are to be held "neque in ecclesia neque in atrio ejus." When this was republished by Charles the Bald in 853 (tit. x. c. 7), and again in 868 (tit. xxxviii. c. 7), he altered it thus, "Ne malla vel placita in exitibus et atriis ecclesiarum et presbyterorum mansionibus . . . tenere presumant." In 870 (tit. xlv. 12) he worded the prohibition thus, "Mallus neque in ecclesia neque in porticibus aut atrio ecclesiæ neque in mansione presbyteri juxtà ecclesiam habeatur." We infer progress in the settlement of the clergy, and that near their churches, through the provision of a curtis [see MANSA] on which a house might be built; but it does not appear that "mansio" was used in a conventional and special sense to denote the residence (or "manse") of the priest. It meant a dwelling-house of any kind, and is the original form of the common word maison. [W. E. S.]

MANSIONARII. [Compare PROSMANARIUS.] Officers discharging certain duties in connexion with the fabric and services of the church. Ducange (Gloss.) makes the word synonymous with "aedituus" and "matricularius," and explains it as deriving its meaning from the fact that a residence ("mansio") near the church was attached to the office. Dionysius Exiguus, in his Codex Canonum, gives "Mansionarius" as a rendering of the word προσμανάριοι, who are reckoned by the Council of Chalcedon (c. 2) among the clerical officers who are strictly forbidden to obtain their situations by bribery. (See Bruns, Canones, i. 26.) Bingham, however (Eccl. Ant. iii. 13, § 1), quotes Justellus, Beveridge, and other authorities to prove that the προσμανάριοι were in reality the stewards or administrators of the property of the church. That the "mansionarii" were clergy is evident from the words of Anastasius the librarian, who in his lives of John 4th and Benedict 2nd expressly reckons them among the clergy to whom legacies were left: "Hic dimisit omni clero . . . . diaconibus et mansionariis solidos mille." Gregory the Great (Dialog. III. 25) applies the title "custos ecclesiae" and "mansionarius" indiscriminately to one Abundius. Their special functions appear to have been connected with the lighting and general care of the lamps of the church to which they belonged. Gregory the Great (Dialog. i. 5) speaks of a certain Constantius who was "mansionarius," and had charge of the lamps, and in (Dialog. iii. 24) the same duties are allotted to one Theodosius, who is called "custos" in the text and "mansionarius" in the heading. See also John the Deacon (Vita Greg. III. 58). In the Ordo Romanus, i. § 4) the mansionarius of a titular church in Rome is to go forth, with a presbyter, bearing a thurible to meet the pope when he came to celebrate a pontifical mass. Again (§ 32) he carries the taper solemnly kindled on Maundy Thursday. Mabillon (Comm. Praevius, p. xxvii) notes that during the first nine centuries in the "patriarchal" churches there were employed "mansionarii seu custodes ecclesiarum ad eas ornandas emundandas alaique praestanda quae necessaria erant." Except the above-mentioned passage in the Council of Chalcedon, there is no trace of the existence of the office in the Eastern church.

2. Hincmar, of Rheims (Epist. ad Proceres Regni, c. 21, opp. ed. Paris. II. p. 209) numbers among the officials of the royal household a "mansionarius," whose duty it was to take care that those who were obliged to provide lodgings for the king when on a journey should be properly warned of his approach. [P. O.]

INSCRIPTIONS. — An inscription given by Marini (Papiri Diplom. 301) is as follows: LOCUS FAUSTINI QUEM COMPARAVIT A JULIO MANSIONARIO. In this case the mansionarius from whom Faustinus acquired his place of sepulture must have had the same control over the spot which the FOSSOR commonly had. The mansio was, in fact, the cemetery, though it does not appear independently that mansio is used in the sense of κοιμητήριον. Compare MANSE (Martigny, Dict. des Antiq. Chrét. s. v.). [C.]

MANSLAUGHTER. [HOMICIDE.]

MANSOLACUM, COUNCIL OF (Mansolacense Concilium), said to have been held at Malay-le-roi, near Sens, A.D. 659. "On y fit quelques règlemens sur la discipline," say the authors of L'Art de vérifier les Dates (i. 156), in describing it, and refer to Mabillon, Act. Sanct. Ord. Ben. saec. iii. pt. ii. 614; in other words, to a charter of privilege granted by the then archbishop of Sens and his suffragans to the monastery of St. Peter at Sens, and intended for the benefit of that convent alone. It is also dated by Mabillon two years earlier. (Mansi, xi. 121.) [E. S. Ff.]

MANSUETUS (1) Bishop of Milan; commemorated Feb. 19 (Boll. Acta SS. Feb. iii. 135).

(2) Martyr; commemorated Feb. 28 (Hieron. Mart.).

(3) Bishop and confessor at Toul; commemorated Sept. 3 (Boll. Acta SS. Sept. i. 615).

(4) Bishop; commemorated in Africa Nov. 28 (Vet. Rom. Mart.).

(5) Martyr with ten others; commemorated at Alexandria Dec. 30 (Usuard. Mart.; Bed. Mart. Auct.). [C. H.]

MANTIUS, martyr in Lusitania 5th century; commemorated May 21 (Boll. Acta SS. May, v. 31). [C. H.]

MANUAEUS, bishop of Bayeux, circ. A.D. 480; commemorated May 28 (Florus, ap. Bed. Mart.; Boll. Acta SS. May, vi. 767). [C. H.]

MANUAL LABOUR. It appears to have been contemplated by the earlier councils that the clergy should, in part at least, maintain themselves by the work of their hands. The Apostolical Constitutions (ii. 63) exhort the younger clergy to provide for their own necessities by the work of their own hands, while not neglecting the work of the ministry. Some of us, it is added, are fishermen, some tentmakers, some husbandmen, for no worshipper of God should be idle. The fourth council of Carthage (Statut. Eccles. Antiqua, cc. 51, 52) enjoins that all clergy, however learned, should provide themselves with food and clothing by some handicraft (artificiolo) or agricultural labour, yet so as not to neglect their proper duties; and (c. 53) that all clergy who were sufficiently strong in body should be instructed both in some handicraft and in letters. These canons are evidently referred to by the second Council of Tours, A.D. 567 (c. 10), where it is laid down, with somewhat curious reasoning, that there could be no justification for any of the clergy who employed a woman not belonging to the house (extraneam mulierem) for the alleged purpose of making his clothes, since there was a general order that they should procure both food and clothing by their own industry, and as the work of their own hands. Thomassin (Vet. et Nov. Eccl. Discip. iii. 3; c. 8, §§ 2–5) thinks that these canons were permissive rather than obligatory, and only applied to the inferior clergy, noting the fact that St. Paul is the only one of the apostles who is said to have worked with his own hands. Thus the first council of Orleans, A.D. 511 (c. 5), provides that certain lands and revenues which Clovis had given to the church should be employed in repairing churches in the redemption of captives, and in paying the stipends (alimoniis) of the priests and poor, while the clergy (clerici) or, as another reading is, the clergy of lower degree (junioris officii) (see Bruns, Canones, ii. 162) should be compelled to help in the labour of the church (ad adjutorium ecclesiastici operis constringantur), probably on the lands so given.

Among ecclesiastical writers manual labour is evidently considered honourable and meritorious for the clergy, and in some cases habitually resorted to, but never enjoined as a positive obligation. Epiphanius (Haeres. 80; nn. 5, 6) says that many clergy, while they might live by the altar, prefer from excess of zeal (abundantiâ quâdam virtutis) to support themselves by the work of their own hands; and (Haeres. 70, n. 2) speaks of a certain sect named Audiani, in whose fellowship bishops, presbyters, and all clergy lived by their own toil. The very mention of such a fact seemingly proved that this was out of the common course. Chrysostom (Hom. 45, on Acts) speaks of four different grades of excellence set before the clergy, the second of which consists in labouring for their own food, the third is also labouring to assist the poor. Augustine (de Op. Monach. c. 29) asserts that the professional labours of the bishops and clergy are sufficiently onerous to exempt them from the obligation of toiling with their hands. Many instances, however, are to be found in which the most zealous attention to spiritual duties was combined with hard and habitual work at a trade or on a farm. Socrates (H. E. i. 12) says that Spiridon, bishop of Cyprus, was originally a shepherd, and through his great humility continued to feed his flock even after being made a bishop. Sozomen (H. E. vii. 28) speaks of one Zeno, bishop of Maiuma, who provided for his own wants, and for the poor of his flock, by weaving linen. Gennadius of Marseilles (de Scriptor. Eccl. c. 69) says that Hilary of Arles toiled with his own hands, not only for his own support, but that he might be able to help the poor. From Gregory the Great (Dialog. iii. 1) we learn that Paulinus of Nola was an excellent gardener, and (Dialog. iii. 12) that one Severus, a priest of great sanctity, was occupied on a certain occasion in pruning his vines. Gregory of Tours, in his Life of Nicetius (c. 8), says that when a bishop he continued to live among his servants, and work on his farm. It would be easy to multiply examples of this kind, they all point the same way; the very fact of their being recorded seems to shew that they must be considered as instances of exceptional excellence, which was held in honour and esteem, but not illustrative of the general practice, or of conduct which was reckoned obligatory upon either bishops or clergy. Hincmar of Rheims indeed, A.D. 845, appears to have endeavoured to make some measure of manual labour compulsory in his diocese, since (Capit. ad Presbyteros, c. 9, opp. i. p. 712) he orders all his clergy to go out fasting to work on their farms; but the general sense of the church in this matter appears to be represented by the words of Epiphanius, already quoted, that those who serve the altar have a right to live by the altar. MANUEL (1) Martyr under the Bulgarians at Debeltus, A.D. 812; commemorated Jan. 22 (Cal. Byzant.; Basil. Menol.; Boll. Acta SS.; Jan. ii. 441).

(2) Martyr with Theodosius; commemorated March 27 (Basil. Menol.).

(3) A Persian martyr with two brothers at Constantinople, A.D. 362; commemorated June 17 (Cal. Byzant.; Boll. Acta SS. June, iii. 290; Daniel, Cod. Liturg. iv. 261; Basil. Menol.). [C. H.]

MANUMISSION. [SLAVERY.]

MANUS MORTUA. [MORTMAIN.]

MAPHRIAN ("Fruit-bearing"). In the 6th century Jacobus Zanzalus, bishop of Edessa, the leading spirit among the Jacobites, finding that the whole of Asia was more than the patriarch of Antioch could possibly superintend, ordained Achudemes as chief bishop of the East beyond Tigris, with the title of Maphrian. This dignitary now resides in the convent of Mar Mattai [St. Matthew], near Mosul. (Neale, Eastern Church, Introd. 152; Germann, Kirche der Thomaschristen, 524.) [C.]

MAPPA. Under the Roman empire a mappa, or handkerchief, carried in the hand seems to have been regarded as distinctive of high rank. The dropping of his mappa by the person who presided was, as is well known, the signal for the commencement of the games of the amphitheatre (Tertullian, de Spectaculis, 16). It was among the insignia of the emperors of the East, especially from the time that they became perpetual consuls. An object resembling a mappa is sometimes found on Christian tombs, in company with the clavus which denotes rank (Bottari, i. 73). In those diptychs in which, on their passing into the service of the church, the consul was transformed by certain modifications into a saint or dignitary of the church, the mappa of the imperial official sometimes appears. It is, however, in some cases doubtful whether the supposed mappa is not rather a volumen, or roll of a book (Martigny, Dict. des Antiq. Chrét. s. v.). [C.]

MAPPALICUS (1) Martyr; commemorated Feb. 21 (Hieron. Mart.).

(2) Martyr, after A.D. 250; commemorated in Africa Apr. 17 (Hieron. Mart.; Vet. Rom. Mart.; Usuard. Mart.; Bed. Mart. Auct.; Boll. Acta SS. Apr. ii. 480).

(3) Martyr; commemorated at Rome Apr. 18 (Hieron. Mart.). [C. H.]

MAR (Syriac, ܡܪ). A title of dignity among the Syrian Christians, signifying Lord, and applied to various ecclesiastical persons. Compare LORD. [C.]

MARA, abbat in Syria; commemorated Jan. 25 (Boll. Acta SS. Jan. ii. 627). [C. H.]

MARANA, hermitess with Cyra or Cirrha at Beroea, Berrhoea, or Aleppo, in Syria; commemorated by the Greeks Feb. 28 (Basil. Menol.); by the Latins Aug. 3 (Boll. Acta SS. Aug. i. 226). [C. H.]

MARANATHA (מָרָן אָתָא, "The Lord cometh;" see DICTIONARY OF THE BIBLE, ii. 233), is an expression used (1 Cor. xvi. 22) seemingly to give greater force to a solemn denunciation by a reference to the expected coming of the Lord. In ecclesiastical usage it is sometimes found as part of the formula which designates the most extreme and solemn form of excommunication, that "until the coming of the Lord." In a Spanish canon (iv. Conc. Tolet. c. 75, A.D. 633) the expression is plainly interpreted: "qui contra hanc nostram definitionem praesumpserit, anathema maranatha, hoc est, perditio in adventu Domini sit, et cum Juda Iscariote partem habeant et ipsi et socii." Compare xvi. Conc. Tolet. c. 10 (A.D. 693), and the Charta S. Amandi Tungr. Episc. quoted by Ducange, s. v. Similar forms of anathema are not uncommonly found in the statutes of Foundations against those who violate them. [MALEDICTION.] In all these cases the effect of the use of the word Maranatha seems to be, to exclude the offender from the communion of the church during his whole life, and to reserve him for the judgment of the Lord at His coming (Benedict XIV. de Synodo Diocc. x. 1, § 7). Suarez, however (de Censuris, Disp. viii. c. 2), holds that such a sentence is in all cases conditional on the continued impenitence of the sinner. [EXCOMMUNICATION, I. 639.]

(Ducange, s. v. Maranatha; Bingham, Antiquities, xvi. ii. 16; Wetzer and Welte, Kirchenlexicon, xii. 761.) [C.]

MARANDUS, martyr; commemorated at Antioch Oct. 28 (Hieron. Mart.). [C. H.]

MARANO, COUNCIL OF (Maranense Concilium), a council, or rather a meeting of ten schismatic bishops at Marano in Istria, A.D. 590, when Severus, bishop of Aquileia, recanted his condemnation of the three chapters. (Mansi, ix. 1019. Comp. ISTRIAN COUNCIL.) [E. S. Ff.]

MARCA, martyr; commemorated in Africa Apr. 25 (Hieron. Mart.). [C. H.]

MARCELLA (1) Roman widow, ob. A.D. 410; commemorated Jan. 31 (Boll. Acta SS. Jan. ii. 1106).

(2) Martyr; commemorated Feb. 17 (Hieron. Mart.).

(3) Martyr; commemorated in Africa May 7 (Hieron. Mart.).

(4) Martyr; commemorated at Rome at the cemetery of Praetextatus, May 10 (Hieron. Mart.).

(5) Martyr; commemorated at Rome June 2 (Hieron. Mart.).

(6) Martyr; commemorated June 28 at Alexandria (Usuard, Mart.; Vet. Rom. Mart.). [C. H.]

MARCELLIANUS (1) Bishop, his depositio and translatio commemorated at Auxerre May 13 (Hieron. Mart.).

(2) Commemorated at Thessalonica June 1 (Hieron. Mart.).

(3) Martyr with his brother Marcus; commemorated at Rome on the Via Ardeatina June 18 (Hieron. Mart.; Vet. Rom. Mart.; Bed. Mart.; Usuard. Mart.); their natalis observed on June 18 in the Sacramentary of Gregory, their names being mentioned in the collect for the day (Greg. Mag. Lib. Sacr. 105).

(4) Martyr; commemorated July 18 at Rome on the Via Tiburtina (Hieron. Mart.).

(5) Martyr at Rome with Secundianus and Verianus, in the reign of Decius; commemorated Aug. 9 (Usuard. Mart.). [C. H.]

MARCELLINA (1) Martyr; commemorated at Nicomedia Feb. 24 (Hieron. Mart.).

(2) Martyr; commemorated at Thessalonica June 1 (Hieron. Mart.).

(3) Martyr; commemorated at Rome June 2 (Hieron. Mart.). [C. H.]

Rom. Mart.; Bed. Mart. Auct.), but on Jan. 3 in Hieron. Mart.

(2) Martyr at Nicomedia; commemorated Feb. 22 (Hieron. Mart.).

(3) Martyr; commemorated Mar. 30 (Hieron. Mart.).

(4) Martyr; commemorated Ap. 2 (Hieron. Mart.; Bed. Mart. Auct.).

(5) Bishop and confessor; his depositio commemorated at Rome Ap. 20 (Hieron. Mart.).

(6) Pope and martyr; commemorated at Rome Ap. 26 (Usuard. Mart.; Vet. Rom. Mart.).

(7) Martyr; commemorated at Milan May 6 (Hieron. Mart.).

(8) Two martyrs of this name commemorated at Milan May 7 (Hieron. Mart.); one at Nicomedia on the same day (Bed. Mart. Auct.).

(9) Presbyter, with Peter the Exorcist; commemorated at Rome on June 2 (Hieron. Mart.; Usuard. Mart.; Vet. Rom. Mart.; Bed. Mart.). His natalis with that of Peter is commemorated on this day in Gregory's Sacramentary, their names being mentioned in the collect (Greg. Mag. Lib. Sacr. 104). A basilica was said to have been erected in their honour by Constantine on the Via Lairana, and his mother, Helena, was said to have been buried there (Ciampini, de Sac. Aedif. 122, 123).

(10) Martyr; commemorated at Rome June 27 (Hieron. Mart.).

(11) Martyr; commemorated at Cologne Aug. 9 (Hieron. Mart.; Florus ap. Bed. Mart.).

(12) Tribune, martyr with Mannea or Mannis his wife; commemorated at Tomi Aug. 27 (Hieron. Mart.; Usuard. Mart.; Vet. Rom. Mart.).

(13) Martyr; commemorated at Capua Oct. 7 (Hieron. Mart.; Bed. Mart. Auct.).

(14) Martyr; commemorated Oct. 20 (Hieron. Mart.; Bed. Mart. Auct.).

(15) Martyr; commemorated in Africa Nov. 26 (Hieron. Mart.). [C. H.]

MARCELLINUS, presbyter and confessor at Deventer circ. A.D. 800; commemorated July 14 (Acta SS. Jul. iii. 702). [C. H.]

MARCELLOSA, martyr; commemorated in Africa May 20 (Hieron. Mart.; Bed. Mart. Auct.) [C. H.]

MARCELLUS (1) Youthful martyr; commemorated with his brothers Argeus and Marcellinus Jan. 2, at Tomi (Usuard. Mart.); but Hieron. Mart. calls him Narcissus, and assigns Jan. 3 to the three brothers.

(2) Bishop of Rome and confessor; his depositio at Rome in the cemetery of Priscilla, on the Via Salaria, commemorated Jan. 16 (Hieron. Mart.); the same day given to his natalis by Usuard and Bede. The sacramentary of Gregory celebrates his natalis on this day, and mentions his name in the special collect (Greg. Mag. Lib. Sacr. 18). His natalis is also observed in the Antiphonary (Greg. Mag. Lib. Sac. 662). The Vet. Rom. Mart. assigns Jan. 17 to him, on which day also Hieron. Mart. gives his depositio commemorated at Langres.

(3) Martyr; commemorated at Nicomedia Feb. 16 (Hieron. Mart.).

(4) Martyr; commemorated in Africa Feb. 18 (Hieron. Mart.).

(5) Martyr; commemorated in Africa Feb. 19 (Hieron. Mart.; Bed. Mart. Auct.).

(27) Deacon, martyr; suffered Dec. 7; his burial commemorated at Spoletum Dec. 30 (Vet. Rom. Mart.) In Bed. Mart. Auct. his passio is on Dec. 30. [C. H.]

MARCIA. [MARTIA.]

MARCIALIS. [MARTIALIS.]

MARCIANA. [MARTIANA.]

MARCIANE, queen; commemorated Jan. 26 (Cal. Byzant.). [C. H.]

MARCIANUS. [MARTIANUS.]

MARCILUS, martyr; commemorated at Rome, on Via Nomentana, May 28 (Hieron. Mart.). [C. H.]

MARCOPUS, martyr; commemorated at Nicomedia Feb. 16 (Hieron. Mart.). [C. H.]

MARCULFUS, abbat of Nantes, circ. A.D. 558; commemorated May 1 (Boll. Acta SS. May, i. 70). [C. H.]

MARCUS (1), the Evangelist, was very generally commemorated, and his name occurs in the Greek, Latin, and Coptic fasti, but not always on the same day. Sept. 23 is assigned to his natalis at Alexandria in Hieron. Mart., but one MS. omits natalis (Acta SS. infra). The Cal. Byzant. commemorates Mark, "the apostle," on Jan. 11, and the Bollandists identify him with the evangelist, who is called in the same calendar, under Ap. 25, "evangelist and apostle," and in Basil. Menol., under the same day, "apostle and evangelist." April 25 is the day more usually assigned to him (Usuard. Mart.; Bed. Mart.; Vet. Rom. Mart.; Daniel, Cod. Liturg. iv. 258; Boll. Acta SS. Apr. iii. 344). The Sacramentary of Gregory observes his natalis on April 25, mentioning him in the collect for the day (Greg. Mag. Lib. Sacr. 84). His natalis is also observed in the Antiphonary (ibid. 711). The reason of his not being mentioned in the canon at the prayer Communicantes is believed to be, as in the case of St. Luke, that the fact of his martyrdom is uncertain (Krazer, de Apost. Eccles. Liturg. 497). There was a church at Constantinople dedicated to him, erected by Theodosius the Great, near the district or ward named Taurus, at which his festival was observed (Georg. Codinus, de Antiq. Constant. 61; Boll. Acta SS. ut sup.). There was a church at Rome dedicated to St. Mark by pope Marcus, A.D. 337, restored and adorned by Hadrian I. and Gregory IV. (Ciampini, Vet. Mon. t. ii. 119), and there was a chapel in the Basilica Vaticana dedicated to him by Marcus Barbus, patriarch of Aquileia (Ciampini, de Sac. Aedif. 68).

(2) Martyr; commemorated at Bononia Jan. 4 (Hieron. Mart.).

(3) Martyr; commemorated in Africa Jan. 5 (Hieron. Mart.).

(4) Martyr; commemorated in Africa Jan. 6 (Hieron. Mart.).

(5) Martyr; commemorated Jan. 8 (Hieron. Mart.).

(6) Martyr; commemorated in Africa Feb. 16 (Hieron. Mart.).

(7) ST., "our holy father;" commemorated March 4 (Basil. Menol.).

(8) Egyptian monk, circ. A.D. 400; commemorated March 5 (Boll. Acta SS. Mar. i. 367).

(9) Martyr with others; commemorated at Nicæa March 13 (Usuard. Mart.; Hieron. Mart.). This day is given in Menol. Basil. to the bishop of the Arethusians; see March 29 infra.

(10) Martyr with others; commemorated at Surrentum March 19 (Hieron. Mart.; Usuard. Mart.; Ado, Mart.). The name is Martia in Vet. Rom. Mart.

(11) Martyr at Rome with Timotheus in the 2nd century; commemorated Mar. 24 (Boll. Acta SS. Mar. iii. 477).

(12) The Athenian, hermit in Libya; commemorated Mar. 29 (Boll. Acta SS. Mar. iii. 779).

(13) Bishop of the Arethusians, martyr in the reign of Julian; commemorated March 29 (Boll. Acta SS. Mar. iii. 774; Daniel, Cod. Liturg. iv. 256). The Menology of Basil assigns March 30 to him.

(14) Two of this name were commemorated on April 12 (Hieron. Mart.).

(15) Bishop of Atinum in Campania, martyr with two presbyters A.D. 82; commemorated April 28 (Boll. Acta SS. Apr. iii. 548).

(16) Martyr; commemorated at Thessalonica June 1 (Hieron. Mart.).

(17) Martyr; commemorated at Byzantium June 7 (Hieron. Mart.).

(18) Martyr with Julius, at Dorostorum in Moesia; commemorated June 8 (Hieron. Mart.; Boll. Acta SS. June, ii. 56).

(19) Bishop of Luceria in Apulia, circ. A.D. 328; commemorated June 14 (Boll. Acta SS. Jun. ii. 800).

(20) Martyr with Marcellinus at Rome on the Via Ardeatina, circ. A.D. 287; commemorated June 18 (Usuard. Mart.; Hieron. Mart.; Boll. Acta SS. Jun. iii. 568). Their natalis is observed on this day in the Sacramentary of Gregory, and their names mentioned in the collect (Greg. Mag. Lib. Sacr. 105).

(21) Martyr with Mocianus; commemorated July 3 (Basil. Menol.; Boll. Acta SS. July, i. 641).

(22) Confessor; commemorated July 4 (Boll Acta SS. July, ii. 22).

(23) Martyr with two companions; commemorated in Parthia Sept. 9 (Hieron. Mart.; Boll Acta SS. Sept. iii. 367).

(24) Martyr with Alphaeus, Alexander, and others under Diocletian; commemorated Sept. 28 (Basil. Menol.; Boll. Acta SS. Sept. vii. 600).

(25) Martyr with his brother Marcianus and many others, in Egypt; commemorated Oct. 4 (Hieron. Mart.; Usuard. Mart.; Bed. Mart. Auct.; Vet. Rom. Mart.; Boll. Acta SS. Oct. ii. 391).

(26) Bishop; depositio commemorated at Rome Oct. 6 (Hieron. Mart.; Bed. Mart. Auct.).

(27) Bishop of Rome and confessor; his depositio at Rome on Via Appia commemorated Oct. 7 (Hieron. Mart.; Usuard. Mart.); his natalis on this day (Bed. Mart.); Vet. Rom. Mart. mentions him without distinguishing the festival. His natalis on this day commemorated in the Sacramentary of Gregory, mentioning his name in the collect (Greg. Mag. Lib. Sac. 135). See also Boll. Acta SS. Oct. iii. 886.

(28) First gentile bishop of Jerusalem, martyr circ. A.D. 150; commemorated at Adrianople Oct.

22 (Usuard. Mart.; Vet. Rom. Mart; Boll. Acta SS. Oct. ix. 477).

(29) One of four "soldiers of Christ" martyred at Rome under the emperor Claudius and buried in the Via Salaria; commemorated Oct. 25 (Usuard. Mart.; Bed. Mart.).

(30) Martyr with Soterichus and Valentina; commemorated Oct. 26 (Basil. Menol.).

(31) Martyr; commemorated at Nicomedia Oct. 30 (Hieron. Mart.).

(32) Martyr; commemorated in Africa Nov. 16 (Hieron. Mart.; Bed. Mart. Auct.). Another of the same name on same day at Antioch (Hieron. Mart.).

(33) Martyr; commemorated in Spain Nov. 20 (Hieron. Mart.).

(34) Martyr with Stephanus, both belonging to Antioch in Pisidia, under Diocletian, buried in Pisidia; commemorated Nov. 22 (Basil. Menol.).

MAREAS, with Bicor, bishops, martyrs in Persia; commemorated Apr. 22 (Usuard. Mart.). [C. H.]

MARES, com. Jan. 25 (Cal. Byzant.). [C. H.]

MARGARITA or MARINA, virgin, martyr at Antioch in Pisidia; commemorated July 20 (Bed. Mart. Auct.; Boll. Acta SS. July, v. 24); commemorated at Marina, μεγαλομάρτυρ in the Eastern church, July 17 (Cal. Byzant.; Dan. Cod. Liturg. iv. 263; Basil. Menol.). [C. H.]

MARGARITA (Μαργαρίτης, the Pearl) is a term for the particle of the bread which is broken off and placed in the cup as a symbol of the union of the Body and Blood of Christ [FRACTION, I. 687]. According to Daniel, however (Codex Liturg. iv. 208, 416), it is equally applied to all the particles which are placed in the cup for the purpose of administration to the faithful, according to the Eastern rite, by means of a SPOON. [C.]

MARIA [See MARY THE VIRGIN, FESTIVALS OF] (1) MARY sister of Lazarus, martyr; commemorated Jan. 19 at Jerusalem (Hieron. Mart.; Bed. Mart. Auct.); Feb. 8 (Basil. Menol.; Boll. Acta SS. Feb. ii. 157); June 6 at Constantinople (Boll. Acta SS. Jun. i. 621). [MARTHA (8).]

(2) who called herself Marinus, and passed herself for a man; commemorated Feb. 12 (Basil. Menol.) and other days. [MARINA (11).]

(3) Martyr; commemorated at Nicomedia Feb. 24 (Hieron. Mart.).

(4) Martyr; commemorated at Nicomedia March 12 (Hieron. Mart.).

(5) Martyr; commemorated at Nicaea Mar. 13 (Hieron. Mart.).

(6) Martyr: commemorated in Africa Mar. 14 (Hieron. Mart.).

(7) Martyr; commemorated at Nicomedia March 17 (Hieron. Mart.).

(8) Martyr with Aprilis and Servulus; commemorated at Nicomedia Mar. 18 (Hieron. Mart.; Boll. Acta SS. Mar. ii. 619).

(9) AEGYPTIACA; commemorated in Palestine April 2 (Usuard. Mart.; Boll. Acta SS. Ap. i. 67). She is commemorated on April 1 as "Our mother Mary of Egypt" in Cal. Byzant., Cal. Aethiop., Daniel's Cod. Liturg. iv. 256. Bede's Auctaria gives her natalis on April 9, and her depositio April 8.

(10) The wife of Cleopas; commemorated April 9 (Boll. Acta SS. Ap. i. 811).

(11) Martyr; commemorated at Rome, in the cemetery of Praetextatus, May 10 (Hieron. Mart.).

(12) ad Martyres; her natalis on May 13 (Usuard. Mart.). Her natalis on this day is kept in the Sacramentary of Gregory, but her name is not in the collect (Greg. Mag. Lib. Sacr. 88). Her dedication on this day (Bed. Mart.), appointed by pope Boniface (Vet. Rom. Mart.).

(13) Martyr; commemorated at Thessalonica June 1 (Hieron. Mart.).

(14) Two martyrs of this name commemorated at Rome June 2 (Hieron. Mart.).

(15) Martyr; commemorated at Aquileia June 17 (Hieron. Mart.).

(16) The Magdalen; commemorated July 22 (Vet. Rom. Mart.; Basil. Menol.; Boll. Acta SS. July, v. 187). "The Ointment Bearer and equal of the Apostles" (Cal. Byzant.). Her house at Jerusalem said to have been turned into a temple, A.D. 34 (Ciampini, Vet. Mon. i. 155).

(17) Matron of Jerusalem, the mother of John surnamed Mark; commemorated June 29 (Boll. Acta SS. June, v. 475).

(18) or MIRIAM, prophetess, sister of Moses; commemorated July 1 (Boll. Acta SS. July, i. 11).

(19) Virgin, surnamed Consolatrix, in the 8th century; commemorated Aug. 1 (Boll. Acta SS. Aug. i. 81).

(20) PATRICIA, martyr with Julianus and others under Leo Iconomachus; commemorated Aug. 9 (Basil. Menol.).

(21) Martyr; commemorated at Ravenna Nov 12 (Hieron. Mart.).

(22) Martyr; commemorated at Antioch Nov. 16 (Hieron. Mart.).

(23) Martyr; commemorated in Africa Dec. 5 (Hieron. Mart.).

(24) Martyr; commemorated at Antioch Dec. 9 (Hieron. Mart.).

(25) Martyr; commemorated Dec. 11 (Hieron. Mart.). [C. H.]

MARIAMNA, supposed sister of Philip the apostle; commemorated Feb. 17 (Basil. Menol.; Boll. Acta SS. Feb. iii. 4). [C. H.]

MARIANA (1) Martyr; commemorated at Antioch Oct. 28 (Hieron. Mart.).

(2) Martyr; commemorated Nov. 16 (Hieron. Mart.). [C. H.]

MARIANUS (1) Martyr; commemorated at Beauvais Jan. 8 (Hieron. Mart.).

(2) Martyr; commemorated in Africa Mar. 9 (Hieron. Mart.).

(3) Martyr; commemorated at Antioch Mar. 10 (Hieron. Mart.).

(4) Commemorated with Mamertinus, both monks of Auxerre, April 20 (Boll. Acta SS. Ap. ii. 758).

(5) Reader, martyr with Jacobus, deacon; commemorated April 30 at Lambesitana (Usuard. Mart.; Vet. Rom. Mart.; Bed. Mart. Auct.).

(6) Martyr with Fortunatus and others, Africans; commemorated May 3 (Hieron. Mart.; Boll. Acta SS. May, i. 383).

(7) Martyr; commemorated in Africa May 6 (Hieron. Mart.).

(8) Martyr; commemorated in Africa May 7 (Hieron. Mart.).

(9) Martyr at Rome on the Via Nomentana; commemorated May 28 (Hieron. Mart.).

(10) Martyr with Januarius; commemorated in Africa July 11 (Hieron. Mart.; Boll. Acta SS. July iii. 188).

(11) Confessor; depositio commemorated in Berry Aug. 19 (Hieron. Mart.; Usuard. Mart.; Boll. Acta SS. Aug. iii. 734). His natalis Sept. 19 (Hieron. Mart.). Bede's Auctaria give the depositio on Sept. 19 and natalis on Aug. 19.

(12) Martyr; commemorated at Rome Oct. 27 (Hieron. Mart.).

(13) Deacon, martyr with Diodorus, presbyter; commemorated at Rome Dec. 1 (Usuard. Mart.).

MARRIAGE. The subject will be dealt with in the present article under the three headings of I. MARRIAGE LAWS; II. MARRIAGE CEREMONIES; III. DIVORCE.

I. MARRIAGE LAWS. The affirmative law of marriage, which has come down from the creation, and is written in the hearts of all mankind, is simply that an unmarried adult man may marry an unmarried adult woman, provided that both parties are in their sound mind, both of them are willing to enter into the contract, and both of them capable of carrying out the primary end for which marriage is instituted. This affirmative law, however, is at once and everywhere limited by a crowd of prohibitive regulations, differing in different countries and at different times, but having as their general object—1, the prevention of incest; 2, the prevention of evils which might accrue (a) to the state, (b) to religion, (c) to the individuals concerned.

The first Jewish converts to Christianity, bound before their conversion by the prohibitions of the Mosaic law, continued to be equally bound by them when they had become Christians, except so far as any of the Mosaic regulations had been abrogated or modified by the authority of Christ and His apostles, or had become necessarily obsolete owing to a change of circumstances. The modifications made by our Lord in the Hebrew law of marriage and divorce, as it existed in his time, were two. He restored the rule of monogamy, and he disallowed of divorce, except upon the single ground of the wife's adultery. Apostolic authority added the regulation that Christians should marry none but Christians. The Mosaic rules that became obsolete were of slight importance, being of particular rather than of general application; such as the laws commanding levirate marriages, prohibiting the marriages of heiresses out of their tribe, and making regulations as to the marriage of the high priest. While these special laws fell into abeyance, the general prohibitions continued to be still binding upon the Jewish convert, together with the prohibition of polygamy, divorce (for any reason except one), and heathen marriage.

When the Gentile convert embraced Christianity he, in like manner, was already bound by the prohibitions which the Roman law had introduced with respect to marriage. After his conversion he was still bound by them, as being the law of the land, and not contrary to his Christian conscience. In addition, he was bound by the Mosaic prohibitions (with the same modifications and additions as the Jewish convert), the Jewish convert being analogously bound by the prohibitions of the Roman law, as being the law of the civilised world.

The first object of both laws, as in almost every other nation, was, as we have said, to prevent incest, which shocks the common instincts of humanity; and for this purpose marriage was prohibited between persons related or connected with each other within certain degrees. These prohibitions, and the enlargements or curtailments of them which were made in the early church, will be discussed under the heading of PROHIBITED DEGREES. Here we shall only treat of those other impediments which were introduced for the good of the state, or of the church, or of the contracting parties.

In the 13th century the schoolmen codified the impediments to marriage which then existed in the church; and their code has been accepted and acted upon by the greater part of Western Christendom down to the present day. It is contained in the five following lines, which are given in the Theologia Moralis of Saint Alfonso de' Liguori (lib. vi. § 1008), as embodying the rules which regulate present practice:—

i. Error, ii. Conditio, iii. Votum, iv. Cognatio, v. Crimen.
vi. Cultûs Disparitas, vii. Vis, viii. Ordo, ix. Ligamen, x. Honestas.

xi. Aetas, xii. Affinis, xiii. Si clandestinus, xiv. et Impos.

xv. Raptave ut mulier nec parti reddita tutae. Haec sociandi vetant connubia, facta retractant.

From the 13th century onwards these impediments have more or less been regarded as nullifying marriage. It will be seen that the first, the seventh, the fourteenth, and the fifteenth are contrary to what we have termed the primary law of marriage, which postulates on both sides a knowledge of what is being transacted, willingness, and capacity. The second, which forbids marriage between persons differing in condition, was introduced by the state, and for state purposes. The third, the sixth, and the eighth originate in the supposed good of the church. The fourth and the twelfth have for their object the prevention of incest. The remainder are intended as safeguards to one of the parties concerned. We will pass each of these impediments shortly in review, inasmuch as they existed though they were not formalised in early times.

i. Error. This impediment required no canons for its establishment. If the mistake affected the substantials of the marriage, such as a mistake with respect to the person, it ipso facto invalidated a marriage, as there could be no marriage where sufficient knowledge was wanting. If it had to do only with the quality or circumstances and accidents of the marriage, it did not invalidate it during the period with which we are dealing, except in the cases which have to be mentioned under the next heading.

ii. Conditio. Under this head three questions arise: the marriage of slaves with slaves; the marriage of free men with slaves; the marriage of persons of a higher rank with those that were of a rank lower than themselves. With regard to the marriage of slaves with slaves the first converts found the two laws to which they paid respect in conflict with one another. According to the Roman law, there could be no such thing as the marriage of a slave: he was a thing, not a person, and the utmost he could attain to was contubernium, not connubium, whereas the Hebrew law recognised in the slave a capacity of contracting marriage.[a] We can trace a struggle between the Roman and the Hebrew principle in the early church, but the genius of Christianity was such as necessarily to cause the more humane principle to triumph. The judgment of the church appears in the Apostolical Constitutions, which command a master to give his consent to the marriage of slaves (lib. viii. c. 32). Slaves therefore might marry, but a condition of their doing so was the express consent of their master. This is repeated in St. Basil's Second Canonical Epistle to Amphilochius (Op. tom. iii. p. 296, Paris, 1730), which pronounces that "the contracts made by those who belong to others are of no force" (can. xl.), except when made by the consent of their master. This became the law of the early church. The fourth council of Orleans, A.D. 541, ruled that slaves who put themselves under the protection of the church with a view to getting married, were "to be restored to their parents or masters, as the case might be, and made to promise that they would separate, liberty being granted to the parents and masters to unite them afterwards in marriage if they thought proper" (can. xxiv., Hard. Concil. tom. ii. p. 1440). The second council of Chalons, A.D. 813, pronounced that the marriages of slaves belonging to different masters were not to be nullified, if once the masters had consented (can. xxx., ibid. tom. iv. p. 1036).

The legality of marriages between freemen and slaves was not so easily allowed, inspiring as they did a repugnance which was never wholly overcome. At the beginning of the third century bishop Callistus, having himself been a slave, attempted to obtain the sanction of the church at Rome for the marriage of free-born women with slaves. But he did not succeed; and we find Hippolytus treating his attempt as matter for a passionate accusation against him (see Döllinger, Hippolytus and Callistus, p. 147, Eng. tr. Edinb. 1876). The Apostolical Constitutions, which recognise the propriety of the marriage of slaves with slaves, do not permit the marriage of a freeman with a slave. "If a believer has a slave concubine, let him give her up, and lawfully marry a wife. If he has a freewoman for a concubine, let him take her for his legitimate wife" (Apostol. Const. lib. viii. c. 32). This principle is again laid down in still harsher form by pope Leo I. A.D. 443 (Epist. ad Rusticum Narbonens. Resp. vi., Op. p. 408, Paris, 1675). Some Welsh canons of the 7th century recognise marriage between a man and his female slave, and in case it has taken place forbid him afterwards to sell her; if he attempts to sell her, he is to be condemned, and the slave-wife put under the protection of the priest (Canones Wallici, can. lx. in Haddan and Stubbs' Councils of Great Britain, vol. i. p. 137).[b] The 17th of the Capitula of Theodore of Canterbury, as given by Harduin (Concil. tom. iii. p. 1773), declares that "a man of free birth ought to marry a woman of free birth." The form of the expression "ought to" (debet) implies that at the date of that canon the feeling against slave marriages had grown less strong than it had been, but we cannot be sure what that date is, as the canon is not Theodore's (see Haddan and Stubbs' Councils of Great Britain, vol. iii. p. 210).[c] Among the genuine canons of Theodore, A.D. 686, are found two, one of which recognises the validity of marriage between a freeman and a slave, and forbids the husband to dismiss his wife if the consent of both parties had been originally given to the marriage (Penitential, lib. ii. cap. xiii. § 5), while the other still sees such a gulf fixed between the freed and the slave that it allows husbands or wives

[a] Contubernium was a concubinage, or permanent marriage-relation, between one man and one woman, and recognised by the law as marriage. Even that was forbidden to their slaves by many masters (see Plutarch, Cato Maj. c. 21); and when not forbidden it was commonly impossible, as the male slaves in Rome were about five times as many as the female slaves.

[b] The place and date of these canons is somewhat uncertain, and the canon given above is found in only one of the two MSS. from which they are printed.

who have gained their freedom to dismiss their consorts, if the latter cannot be redeemed from slavery, and to marry freeborn persons instead (Ibid. § 4, Haddan and Stubbs' Councils of Great Britain, vol. iii. p. 202). A third canon rules that if a man has reduced himself to slavery by crime, his wife may at the end of a year marry another man if she has herself been hitherto only once married (Ibid. cap. xii. § 8, p. 299). The feeling against marriage with slaves (naturally stronger in respect to the marriage of freeborn women with male slaves than of freemen with female slaves) found its most barefaced and reckless expression in some of the Barbarian Codes. By the laws of the Visigoths (lib. iii. tit. ii. c. 2, in Canciani, Leges Barbarorum, vol. iv. p. 91) judges were commanded immediately to separate a freewoman from her slave or freedman whom she had married, as guilty of an atrocious and shocking crime, for which she and her paramour were to be burnt; and it was further enacted that if she married the slave of another she and her husband were to receive a hundred stripes, which were to be thrice repeated (c. 3). The Roman law was not so severe as this. It is true that a senatus consultum of the year 52 had enacted that if a freewoman formed a permanent marriage relation or contubernium (she could not contract a legal marriage) with a slave, without permission from the latter's master, she should herself become the property of the master (Tacit. Annal. xii. 53); and a freedman who aspired to marry his patrona was liable to be sent to the mines or the public works (Paul. Sent. ii. t. 29); and by a law of Constantine a decurio who married another man's slave was ordered to be banished, while the woman was to be sent to the mines (Cod. Theod. lib. xii. tit. i leg. 6). But even these penalties do not equal those of the Barbarian Code in severity, and they were more or less such as might be evaded. Nor does there seem to have been any desire to enforce them harshly. So early as the time of Hadrian the children of a freewoman and a slave were allowed to be regarded and treated as free (Gaius, i. 84). When the 6th century is reached, we find Justinian appointing, in case a master gave his slave in marriage to a freeman as being a freewoman, not that the marriage should be regarded as null and void (which would undoubtedly have been the earlier ruling), but that the slave should thereby be constituted free, and the marriage should hold good (Auth. Collat. iv. tit. i., Novell. xi., Corp. Juris Civilis, tom. ii. pt. 2, p. 125). By the Carolingian era the repugnance entertained to these marriages had greatly abated. The councils of Vermerie (can. xiii.) and of Compiègne (can. v.), A.D. 753 and 757, admit and enforce the legality of marriages deliberately entered into between the free and the slave, whether the man or the woman were the slave. But if a man married a slave under the apprehension that she was free, the error was considered to affect the substance of the contract, and the marriage was thereby invalidated, by the legislation both of Justinian (Novell. xxii. c. 10, Corp. Juris, tom. ii. pars 2, p. 125) and of the Carolingians (Concil. Vermeriense, can. vi.; Concil. Compendiense, can. v., Hard. Concil. tom. iv. pp. 1992, 2005). [CONSENT TO MARRIAGE; CONTRACT OF MARRIAGE.]

The third set of cases to which this Impediment applied was that of marriages between persons of dissimilar rank and position. The Julian and Papian law had forbidden the marriage of senators, their sons and daughters, and the descendants of their sons, with freedwomen, or with women of low degree, and these marriages were declared null and void under Marcus Aurelius and Commodus. The slave-born bishop of Rome, Callistus, would seem, from a charge made against him by Hippolytus, to have attempted to run counter to this legislation by giving an ecclesiastical sanction to them. By very slow degrees, it is probable, that public opinion within the Christian body veered round, until it became favourable to them; but the prohibition continued to be maintained on grounds of state policy by the Christian emperors, as well as by their predecessors. Constantine declares that any attempt to treat the issue of such marriages as legitimate subjects the father, if he be a senator or high official, to the penalties of infamy and outlawry (Cod. Justin. lib. v. tit. xxv. leg. 1). Valentinian and Marcian, A.D. 454, following in the steps of Constantine, define the forbidden marriages to be those with a slave or the daughter of a slave, with a freedwoman or the daughter of a freedwoman, with an actress or the daughter of an actress, with a tavern-keeper or the daughter of a tavern-keeper, or with the daughter of a procurer, or of a gladiator, or of a huckster (Cod. Justin. lib. v. tit. v. leg. 7, Corp. Juris, tom. ii. p. 425). If a senator or the son of a senator married within these prohibited classes, his children, being regarded spurii, followed the position of their mother, and in the eye of the law he was not married at all. Nay, more, by the Papian law, if a man with a freedwoman for his wife was created a senator, his marriage was thereby dissolved. Justinian softened the harshness of this legislation, which became more and more insupportable as the dignity of the senate was more and more lowered (Cod. Justin. lib. v. tit. iv. legg. 23 seq.); and by degrees the impediment came to be regarded as less and less imperative, though a perverted application of it continues to have a baneful operation throughout the greater part of Europe to the present day. See the Theologia Moralis of St. Alfonso de' Liguori, iv. 644.

iii. Votum. We may distinguish six classes of religious women, bound, in different degrees of strictness, by a vow or understanding which caused an impediment to marriage,—the widows, the πρεσβύτιδες, the virgins, the devotae, the nuns, the deaconesses. The special duties of each of these classes will be found designated in the several articles devoted to them. It is enough here to say that the πρεσβύτιδες probably formed the elder division of the widows (see Hefele's note on the eleventh canon of the Council of Laodicea, Hist. of Councils, vol. ii. p. 306, Eng. tr. 1876); that the virgins did not differ essentially from the widows except in respect to the life that they had led before entering the order; that the deaconesses were generally, but not necessarily, selected from the widows or the virgins; that the devota was a woman living in her father's household, or with some respectable woman (Council of Hippo, A.D. 393, can. xxxi.), but given up more or less formally to the service of God; while the nun made one of a religious community living together under rule. There can be little doubt that the members of each of these classes were from the beginning bound to celibacy by the public opinion of the church, which they would themselves have shared. Morally there is little distinction between such an obligation recognised by the conscience and a formal vow. Nor is it possible to fix the time when the former slid into the latter. At first the obligation was based upon the idea that the unmarried were more free than the married to devote themselves to spiritual works, and also upon a widely spread sentiment that a celibate life was one of superior sanctity (see Justin. Apol. i. 29, p. 81, Paris, 1742; Athenag. Legat. c. xxxiii. p. 311, Paris, 1742). Before long another idea was attached to the celibate state; that the virgins were the spouses of the church and therefore of Christ. This notion does not appear in the 13th canon of the Council of Elvira, A.D. 304 (de Virginibus Deo sanctis), nor in canon xxvii. of the same council, nor in the 19th canon of the Council of Ancyra, A.D. 314, dealing with the same subject; but it is found when we reach the first Council of Valencia, A.D. 374, which condemns those who, after they have been devoted to God, turn to earthly marriages (can. iii., Hard. Concil. tom. i. p. 198), and in Optatus, who wrote about the year 370 (de Schism. Don. lib. vi. p. 95, ed. Dupin). It is also found, as might be expected, in Tertullian (de Virg. Vel. cap. xv.). In the 5th century it was generally accepted (see St. Augustine, Tract. ix. in John ii., Op. tom. iii. p. 1459, ed. Migne; St. Jerome, adv. Jovin. lib. i., Op. tom. iv. p. 156; St. Chrysostom, ad Theod. Laps., Op. tom. i. p. 38, Paris, 1718), and it was symbolised by the acceptance of a veil, velatio being used, as we shall see presently, as a synonym of matrimony. Pope Innocent, in his letter to Victricius, distinguishes clearly between the virgins who had taken the veil, and those virgins who, without taking the veil, had promised to embrace the celibate life. The former are in an analogous position to that of married women, and if they marry are to be treated as adulteresses and not admitted to penance. The latter are in the position of betrothed women, and are to do penance "for some time," for breaking their promise to the heavenly spouse (caps. xii., xiii., Hard. Concil. tom. i. p. 1002). From the earliest times it is probable that any member of these classes that married was considered to have been guilty of a sin and of a scandal (1 Tim. v. 12), but the marriage was held as valid, as may be seen by St. Cyprian's statement that virgins who could not, or would not, persevere had but to marry (St. Cypr. Epist. IV. ad Pompon., Op. p. 3, ed. Fell, Oxon. 1682). As soon, however, as the idea of the spiritual marriage with Christ had taken possession of the mind of the church, the earthly marriage was regarded as no marriage at all. The council of Ancyra, A.D. 314, requires that any devotae who marry should be subjected to penance for a year (can. xix.); the council of Valence, A.D. 374, that they should be suspended from communion, and not be re-admitted to it, nisi plurè satisfecerint Deo (can. ii.). St. Basil, A.D. 375, says that the old penalty of one year's suspension was too light, and that now virgins ought not to be admitted to communion while continuing in marriage (Epist. Canon. II. can. xvii.). The first council of Toledo, A.D. 400, rules that such persons are not to be admitted to penance unless they have separated from their husbands (can. xvi.); and that if they are the daughters of a bishop, priest, or deacon, their parents may no longer associate with them (can. xix.). A Roman council under Innocent I., A.D. 402, imposes a penance of many years (can. i.). A synod, called after St. Patrick, A.D. 450 (can. xvii.), and the council of Chalcedon, A.D. 451 (can. xvi.), excommunicate them, though the latter council allows mercy to be shown to them by the bishop. Pope Gelasius, A.D. 492, orders that any who marry a consecrated virgin shall be excommunicated for life (Epist. v. cap. xx., Hard. Concil. tom. ii. p. 904). Pope Symmachus, A.D. 498, forbids the marriage, and orders that the parties to it be suspended (ad Caesar. Resp. iv. 5, ibid. p. 958). The penalty of life-long suspension or excommunication is re-enacted by the council of Mâcon, A.D. 581 (can. xii.), by the so-called fourth council of Carthage in the 6th century (can. civ.), by the fifth council of Paris at the beginning of the 7th century (can. xiii., Hard. Concil. tom. iii. p. 553), and by other late councils. Deaconesses who marry are excommunicated by the second council of Orleans, A.D. 533 (can. xvii.), and Justinian enacted that their marriage should cause the forfeiture both of life and goods (Novell. vi. 6, Corp. Juris, tom. ii. par. 2, p. 37). The same Novella, however, forbids the ordination of a deaconess under fifty years of age; and of course at such an advanced age her temptation to marry was much diminished. In the 4th century we find the age for virgins taking the veil fixed at twenty-five by the council of Milevis (can. xxvi., Hard. Concil. tom. i. p. 1222). The council of Agde, A.D. 506, forbids nuns to be veiled before they were forty (can. xix.); and a novella of Leo and Majorian protects the rights of those who had been induced to take vows of virginity before that age (Novell. viii., ad calc. Cod. Theod. tom. vi. p. 36). [DEVOTA.]

The case was the same with men as with women. There were men who occupied an analogous position to that of the devotae, and the same rules were applied to them as to the devotae. Whoever has declared that he will not take a wife from a resolution of remaining in chastity should continue a celibate, says Clement of Alexandria (Strom. lib. iii. c. 12). He who has made a promise of virginity and breaks it must undergo a year's penance, says the council of Ancyra, A.D. 314 (can. xix.); must be treated as guilty of fornication, that is, undergo four years' penance, says St. Basil, A.D. 375 (Epist. Canon. II., can. xix.); must undergo public penance, says St. Leo, A.D. 443 (Epist. ad Rustic. Resp. 14, Op. p. 410); must be excommunicated, but may be restored by the bishop's humanity, says the council of Chalcedon, A.D. 451 (can. xvi.), (Hard. Concil. tom. ii. p. 607); must be separated from his wife by the judge, who must be excommunicated if he will not do it, says the second council of Tours, A.D. 567 (can. xv., Hard. Concil. tom. iii. p. 360); must undergo the penalty due for fornication, says the council in Trullo, A.D. 692 (can. xliv., ibid. p. 680). After the covenant that they have made with God, the marriage of monks is nothing else than fornication, says John Damascene (in Sacr. Par., Op. tom. ii. p. 701, ed. Lequien). An increasing rigour of sentiment is exhibited in the West, until we reach the second Lateran council under Innocent II., A.D. 1139, when, according to Basil Pontius' statement (de Matr. vii. 17), which Van Espen declares to be non sine fundamento, the monk's and nun's marriage was, for the first time, pronounced absolutely null. The words of the council are:—"To enlarge the law of continence and God-pleasing cleanness of life in ecclesiastical persons and sacred orders, we appoint that bishops, priests, deacons, subdeacons, regular canons, and monks and professed religious, who have broken their holy purpose and government in order to couple wives to themselves, be separated. For such coupling as this, which is known to be contracted against ecclesiastical rule, we do not count to be marriage. And when they have been separated from one another, they are to do proper penance for such great excesses. And we decree that the same rule is to be observed about nuns (sanctimoniales foeminae) if they have attempted to marry, which God forbid that any should do" (cans. vii. viii., Hard. Concil. tom. vii. p. 1209). [CONTRACT OF MARRIAGE.]

iv. Cognatio. [PROHIBITED DEGREES.]

v. Crimen. The two offences indicated by this heading are the murder of a husband or wife, committed with a view to a second marriage, and adultery accompanied with a promise of future marriage. This impediment no doubt existed at all times, but it is not specifically named in early times, perhaps because, according to the early discipline, murder and adultery disqualified a penitent from marriage altogether during the whole time of his or her penance, and, therefore, à fortiori, disqualified from a marriage to which the way had been smoothed by such crimes. The council of Friuli, A.D. 791, decreed that no woman put away for adultery was to be again married to any one whatever, even after her husband's death (can. x., Hard. Concil. tom. iv. p. 860). The council of Vermerie, A.D. 753, declares that "if a man's wife has entered into a conspiracy against his life, and he has killed one of the conspirators in self-defence, he may put her away." Later copies of the acts of the council add that "after the death of his wife he may marry again, and that the wife is to be subjected to penance, and never allowed to remarry" (can. v., Hard. Concil. tom. iii. p. 1990). The first council of Tribur, A.D. 895, lays down the general rule prohibiting marriage between a man and a married woman with whom he has committed adultery, on account of a scandal that had lately occurred, a man having persuaded a woman to sin on the promise, confirmed by oath, that he would marry her if her husband died, a thing described as res execrabilis et catholicis omnibus detestanda (can. xl., Hard. Concil. tom. vi. p. 452).

vi. Cultûs disparitas. The marriage of Hebrews with any but Hebrews was forbidden by patriarchal rule and by Levitical law (Gen. xxiv. 3; Ex. xxxiv. 16; Deut. vii. 3; 1 Kings xi. 2; Ez. ix. 2), the object of the prohibition being to preserve both the race and the religion uncontaminated. In Christianity there is no favoured race to be preserved, but the religious ground of the regulation remains untouched. Accordingly St. Paul adapted the existing Jewish law to changed circumstances by ruling that marriage should only be "in the Lord" (1 Cor. vii. 39), that is, that Christians should marry none but Christians. St. Paul's command is regarded as imperative by the early Fathers, as Tertullian (cont. Marc. lib. v., Op. p. 469); Cyprian (Testimon. lib. iii. c. 62, Op. p. 323, Paris, 1726); St. Jerome (Epist. xci. ad Ageruchiam, de Monogamia, Op. tom. iv. p. 742, Paris, 1706); St. Ambrose (de Abrahamo, lib. i. c. ix., Op. tom. i. p. 309, Paris, 1686); St. Augustine, Epist. cclv., al. 234, ad Rusticum, Op. tom. ii. p. 882, Paris, 1679): by councils, as that of Elvira, A.D. 313 (Conc. Elib. cans. xv. xvi., Hard. Concil. tom. i. p. 252); the first council of Arles, A.D. 314 (Conc. Arelat. i. can. xi., ibid. p. 265); that of Laodicea, A.D. 372 (Conc. Laod. can. x., ibid. p. 783); that of Agde, A.D. 506 (Conc. Agath. can. lxvii., ibid. tom. ii. p. 1005); the second of Orleans, A.D. 533 (Conc. Aurel. ii can. xix., ibid. p. 1176); the fourth of Toledo, A.D. 633 (Conc. Tolet. iv. can. lxiii., ibid. tom. iii. p. 59): and by Imperial legislation, which forbids intermarriage with Jews as a capital crime (Cod. Theod. lib. iii. tit. 7, leg. 2; lib. xvi. tit. 8, leg. 6). St. Ambrose and the councils of Elvira, Agde, Laodicea, and in Trullo (can. lxxii.), enlarge the prohibition so as to make it apply to heretics as well as to the unbaptized. On the other hand, the Council of Hippo, A.D. 393 (can. xii.) and the Council of Chalcedon, A.D. 451 (can. xiv.) seem, by specifying, to confine the prohibition of such marriages to the sons and daughters of bishops, priests, and inferior clergy. The general law was, as might be expected, very frequently set at nought. St. Jerome bursts out with a fiery invective against the women of his day, of whom he says with a rhetorical exaggeration that "the greater part (pleraeque), despising the apostle's command, marry heathens" (ad. Jovin. i., Op. tom. iv. p. 152). St. Augustine, in his work de Fide et Operibus (cap. xix., Op. tom. vi. p. 220, ed. Migne), says likewise that in his time marriage with unbelievers had ceased to be regarded as a sin; and he himself holds that it ought not to preclude from admission to baptism. St. Augustine's mother Monica, Clothilda wife of Clovis, Bertha wife of Ethelbert, and Ethelburga wife of Edwin, are conspicuous instances of the rule being transgressed to the advantage of Christianity.

vii. Vis. This impediment, like error, ipso facto invalidates marriage, the essence of which consists of its being a free contract made and declared. Physical violence, or moral violence, carried to such an extent as to interfere with the freedom of action, exercised on either party to the contract, destroys that liberty of the will which is a condition of the contract being valid. Where there was violence there could be no free consent; where no free consent, no contract; where no contract, no marriage. A well-known instance in point is the marriage of Jane of Navarre with the duke of Cleves, which, after the eleven years old maiden had been carried to church by her uncle, the Constable of Montmorency, and compelled to go through the wedding, was broken off on the ground that the bride had not consented.

It was, however, a question whether it was the consent of the woman, or of the woman's relations, that was necessary. Among the Hebrews the father was regarded as having the right of giving his daughter in marriage (Gen. xxiv. 51). The early Roman law looked upon wife and children as goods, belonging to the husband and father. Consequently there was room for violence to be employed towards one of the contracting parties with a view to force her consent, which the law would not have recognised as violence. The claim of the woman to an independent voice was to a great extent ignored. "The girl," says St. Ambrose of Rebecca, whom he holds up herein as an example, "is not consulted about her espousals, for she awaits the judgment of her parents; inasmuch as a girl's modesty will not allow her to choose a husband" (de Abrah. lib. i. cap. ult., Op. tom. i. p. 312, Paris, 1686), and he quotes with approbation Euripides' lines:—

Νυμφευμάτων μὲν τῶν ἐμῶν πατὴρ ἐμὸς
Μέρμναν ἔξει, κ' οὐκ ἐμὸν κρίνειν τάδε.

The second canonical letter from Basil to Amphilochius (Op. tom. iii. p. 296) calls marriages entered into without a father's sanction by the harsh name of fornication (can. xlii.), and rules that even after reconciliation with the parents, three years' penance is to be done by the daughter (can. xxxviii.). The fourth council of Orleans, A.D. 541, says that they should be regarded in the light of captivity or bondage rather than marriage (can. xxii., Hard. Concil. tom. ii. p. 1439). An Irish council in the time of St. Patrick, about the year 450, lays it down that the will of the girl is to be inquired of the father, and that the girl is to do what her father chooses, inasmuch as man is the head of the woman (can. xxvii., Hard. Concil. tom. i. p. 1796). See also St. Augustine (Epist. cclv. al. 233, Op. tom. ii. p. 1069, ed. Migne). The imperial laws were also very strict, as those of the heathen emperors had been. Constantius and Constans made clandestine marriages of this nature a capital offence (Cod. Theod. lib. ix. tit. xxiv. legg. 1, 2). Even widows under the age of 25 were forbidden by a law of Valentinian and Gratian to marry without their parents' consent (ibid. lib. iii. tit. vii. leg. 1); and St. Ambrose desires young widows to leave the choice of their second husbands to their parents (de Abraham. lib. i. cap. ult., Op. tom. i. p. 312). The third council of Toledo, A.D. 589, enacts that widows are to be allowed free choice of their husbands, and that girls are not to be compelled to accept husbands against the will of their parents or themselves (can. x., Hard. Concil. tom. iii. p. 481). The Penitential of Theodore of Canterbury, A.D. 688, ordains that a father may give his daughter in marriage as he will until she is sixteen or seventeen, after which she must not be married without her own consent (lib. ii. cap. xii. § 36).

Nevertheless the independent right of each of the contracting parties to give or withhold his or her consent was not altogether ignored. A law of Diocletian and Maximin declares that none are to be compelled to marry (Cod. Justin. lib. v. tit. iv. leg. 14, Corp. Juris, tom. ii. p. 418), and this liberty was testified to in the forms and ceremonies used in the celebration of marriages.

As a protection against violence, it was also enacted that no guardian might marry an orphan to whom he was guardian during her minority (Cod. Theod. lib. ix. tit. viii. leg. 1), and that no governor of a province might marry any woman subject to his control during the time of his administration (ibid. lib. iii. tit. vi. leg. 1).

viii. Ordo. St. Paul desired Timothy and Titus to select for the ministry persons who were "men of one wife" (1 Tim. iii. 2–12; Tit. i. 6). The meaning of the apostle's words is ambiguous. By some they are regarded as enjoining that the persons selected for the ministry should be but once married; by others, that they should not have put away their wives, and have taken others in the lifetime of their first wives; by others, that they should not be men who were unfaithful to their wife (whether a first, or a second, or a third wife) by keeping a concubine, according to a common Roman practice, or other laxity of life; by others, that they should not be polygamists, in accordance with Hebrew customs. The last of these four interpretations is supported by the authority of St. Chrysostom (Hom. in 1 Tim. iii. 2, Op. tom. xi. p. 599, Paris, 1734); the third, which does not exclude the fourth, is the exposition of Theodore of Mopsuestia (Catenae Graec. Patr. in N. T. tom. viii. p. 23, ed. Cramer) and of Theodoret (Com. in 1 Tim. iii. 2, Op. tom. i. p. 474, Paris, 1642). The authorities and arguments for the second interpretation may be seen at length in Suicer's Thesaurus, s. v. Διγαμία. The thought underlying St. Chrysostom's interpretation is that, whereas polygamy was allowed by the Jews, and was still practised, as shewn by the example of Herod, and proved by the testimony of Justin (Dial. cum Tryph., Op. tom. ii. 442, 460, ed. Otto), it might have been the purpose of the apostle to allow a converted Jew, who was a polygamist, to live as a layman without repudiating his existing wives, but not to allow a man in such a position to be a presbyter, "for the Jews," says St. Chrysostom, "might proceed to second nuptials and have two wives together" (in 1 Tim. iii. 2).[a] The exposition of Theodore and Theodoret is in harmony with the words of St. Paul, which literally translated mean "a man of one woman," and need bear no further signification than one who was faithful to the marriage tie, and "kept himself only to his wife so long as they both did live" (Marriage Service). It is also in better harmony with St. Paul's argument ("one that ruleth well his own house, having his children in subjection with all gravity; for if a man know not how to rule his own house, how shall he take care of the church of God?"), than that which sees in the text only a prohibition of a second marriage. Theodoret says that he deliberately adopts the view of those who held "that the holy apostle declares the man who lives contentedly with one wife is worthy of ordination, and that he is not forbidding second marriages, which he has often recommended" (in 1 Tim. iii. 2). The general understanding, however, of the words, which was accepted in the early church, was that St. Paul intended to exclude Digamists from the ministry; and his instruction to Timothy, thus understood, became converted into a rule of church discipline. See the Apostolical Canons (can. xvii.); the Apostolical Constitutions (vi. 17); Origen (Hom. xvii. in Luc., Op. tom. iii. p. 953, Paris, 1740, who says plainly, "Neither bishop, priest, deacon, nor widow must be twice married"); St. Ambrose (de Off. i. 50, § 257, Op. tom. ii. p. 66, Paris, 1690); St. Augustine (de Bono Conjug. c. xviii., Op. tom. vi. p. 387, ed. Migne); St. Epiphanius (Haer. lix. 4, Op. tom. i. p. 496, Paris, 1622); and the councils of Angiers, A.D. 455 (can. xi., Hard. Concil. tom. ii. p. 480); Agde, A.D. 506 (can. i. ibid. p. 997); Arles, iv. A.D. 524 (can. iii. ibid. p. 1070). St. Paul's injunction, thus interpreted, has been continuously the rule of the Oriental church both positively and negatively, except so far as it has been violated on the positive side by the Council in Trullo, A.D. 692, forbidding the marriage of bishops, which St. Paul appears not only to have permitted, but to have recommended, if not enjoined, in order that the bishop's power of ruling might have been tested in a smaller sphere before he was promoted to a large one (Concil. in Trullo, can. xlviii., Hard. Concil. tom. iv. p. 1679).

[a] Döllinger's argument to the contrary (Hippolytus and Callistus, c. iii.), grounded on the fact that a simultaneous second marriage was contrary to the law of the Roman empire, is of little weight; for the contemptuous tolerance of the Roman magistrate would not have condescended to interfere with a Jew's acting in accordance with his own law (Cf. Acts xviii. 15, xxv. 19): he would have contented himself with ignoring the marriage, and regarding the issue of it as spurious in case any question about it arose. The second marriage would in his eyes have been a contubernium such as many of his own fellow-countrymen had entered into. Besides, many Jews would have been converted to Christianity who had married while living in the jurisdiction of the Herods, and it is impossible to believe that the Roman magistrates would have troubled themselves with the internal oeconomy of their households.

For some time before the Christian era a change of sentiment as to the relative excellence of the married and single life had been growing up among a section of Jews. The national feeling was strongly in favour of marriage, and a man who was unmarried or without children was looked upon as disgraced (see the legend of Joachim and Anna in the Protevangelion). But the spirit of asceticism, cherished by the Essenes, led to an admiration of celibacy, of which no traces are to be found in the Old Testament; so that, instead of a shame, it became an honour to be unmarried and childless. In the early church this spirit, at first exhibiting itself only to be condemned in the Encratites (Euseb. Hist. Eccl. iv. 29; St. Aug. de Haeres. xxv.), the Apostolici (St. Aug. de Haeres. xl.), the Manichees (ibid. xlvi.), the Hieracians (ibid. xlvii.), the Eustathians (Socrates, Hist. Eccl. 1143; Council of Gangra, cans. i. ix. x. xiv.), struggled with a healthier feeling, till at length it stifled the latter.

Another cause was working in the same direction. The days of chivalry were not yet; and we cannot but notice, even in the greatest of the Christian fathers, a lamentably low estimate of woman, and consequently of the marriage relationship. Even St. Augustine can see no justification for marriage, except in a grave desire deliberately adopted of having children (Serm. ix. li., Op. tom. v. pp. 88, 345, ed. Migne); and, in accordance with this view, all married intercourse, except for this single purpose, is harshly condemned. If marriage is sought after for the sake of children, it is justifiable; if entered into as a remedium to avoid worse evils, it is pardonable; the idea of "the mutual society, help, and comfort, that the one ought to have of the other, both in prosperity and adversity," hardly existed, and could hardly yet exist. In the decline of the Roman empire, woman was not a helpmeet for man, and few traces are to be found of those graceful conceptions which Western imagination has grouped round wedded love and home affections. The result was that the gross, coarse, material, carnal side of marriage being alone apprehended, those who sought to lead a spiritual life, that is, above all, the clergy, instead of "adorning and beautifying that holy estate," and lifting it up with themselves into a higher sphere and a purer atmosphere, regarded it rather as a necessary evil to be shunned by those who aimed at a holier life than that of the majority.

Four questions arose:—1. Whether a clergyman might marry after ordination; 2. Whether after ordination he must cease to cohabit with his wife whom he had married before ordination; 3. Whether a man already married might be ordained; 4. Whether a twice married man might be ordained.

On the first question the East and West agreed in returning a negative answer, so far as bishops and presbyters were concerned. In the first half of the 3rd century pope Callistus is charged by Hippolytus with introducing the innovation of allowing clergymen to marry after they were in orders. Döllinger supposes him to have sanctioned no more than the marriage of acolyths, hypodiaconi (the title still borne by subdeacons), and, perhaps, deacons. But this is unlikely, or Hippolytus would not have made it so serious a charge against him. Callistus probably allowed his presbyters and deacons to marry, and the practice continued after his death among his special followers and disciples—his "school," as Hippolytus calls them (οὐ διαμένει τὸ διδασκαλεῖον φυλάττον τὰ ἔθη καὶ τὴν παράδοσιν), but it did not prevail against the opposite custom. The Council of Ancyra, A.D. 314, allows deacons only to marry, and that if at the time of their ordination they had given notice of their intention to do so (can. x.). The Apostolical Canons restrict the liberty of marriage after ordination to readers and singers (can. xxv.). Presbyters are ordered by the council of Neocaesarea, A.D. 314, to remain unmarried if they are unmarried at the time of their ordination (can. i.). Bishops, priests, and deacons are ordered to remain unmarried by a Roman council under Innocent I., A.D. 402 (can. iii.). The only authoritative sanction for marriage after ordination is found in a decree of a Nestorian synod held under Barsumas, archbishop of Nisibis, towards the end of the 5th century.

On the second question, whether clergy married at the time of their ordination were to cease cohabitation, there gradually developed itself one of the disciplinary differences which afterwards declared themselves between the East and West. The Eastern church has never forbidden marriage before ordination to its presbyters, and has never laid upon them the burden of abstinence from their wives; and there is no doubt that the Eastern discipline in this respect was the discipline of the whole of the early church.

Thomassin, Natalis Alexander, the Bollandist Stilting, and Zaccaria assert that married asceticism prevailed from the beginning by apostolical precept, but they have no ground for their assertion. Tillemont acknowledges that for the first four or five hundred years it was not required, and De Marca argues that it grew up insensibly as a voluntary practice, and was first made binding by pope Siricius at the end of the 4th century.

The first authority on the question is Clement of Alexandria, who, in contrasting the practice of the church with that of the heretics of his day, speaks plainly of priest, deacon, and layman as "ἀνεπιλήπτως γάμῳ χρώμενος" (Stromat. lib. iii. 12, Op. p. 352, ed. Potter, Oxf. 1715), by which words he designates cohabitation,* and towards the end of the same book he writes: Τί πρὸς ταύτας εἰπεῖν ἔχουσι τὰς νομοθεσίας οἱ τὴν σπορὰν καὶ τὴν γένεσιν μυσαττόμενοι; ἐπεὶ καὶ τὸν Ἐπίσκοπον τοῦ οἴκου καλῶς προιστάμενον νομοθετεῖ τῆς Ἐκκλησίας ἀφηγεῖσθαι· οἶκον δὲ κυριακὸν μιᾶς γυναικὸς συνίστησι συζυγία. His argument would be futile if he did not look upon the bishop, not only as married, but specifically as begetting children (Strom. iii. c. xviii., Op. p. 562). The opposite view was taken by Origen, as might be expected from the deed for which he is noted (Hom. xxiii. in Num., Op. tom. ii. p. 358); by Epiphanius, though he allows that a different practice prevailed (Haeres. lix. 4, Op. tom. i. p. 496); by St. Jerome (adv. Jovin. lib. i., Op. tom. iv. p. 175). The Apostolical Canons forbid bishops, presbyters, and deacons to separate from their wives on the pretext of piety on pain of deposition (can. vi.); but about a quarter of a century later was passed by the Spanish council of Elvira (A.D. 305) a canon which is regarded as the earliest injunction on the clergy to cease cohabitation (can. xxxiii.).† An attempt was made to force this discipline on the whole church at the council of Nicaea, A.D. 325, but it was frustrated by the firmness of Paphnutius. The spirit that dictated the attempt was not, however, extinguished. It became a fashion with some to hold aloof from the ministrations of a married presbyter in the holy communion, to such an extent that the council of Gangra, held about A.D. 350, had to anathematize those that did so (can. iv.). Pope Siricius's letter to Himerius (Hard. Concil. tom. i. p. 849), if genuine (it is so counted), gave expression and sanction to this unwholesome feeling, A.D. 385.‡ A council held at Carthage under Genethlius, in 387 or 390, binds bishops, priests, and Levites to abstain from their wives (can. ii.), and the canon that it passed to this effect was taken into the Codex Canonum Ecclesiae Africanae (Hefele, viii. §§ 106, 121). Socrates, who wrote A.D. 439, names Heliodorus, bishop of Trica, as the person who had introduced into Thessaly the novelty of deposing clergy who lived with their wives, and he speaks of that custom prevailing in his day in Thessalonica, and in Macedonia and Hellas; but he declares it contrary to the otherwise universal custom of the Eastern church, where bishops and priests were left at liberty to act as they pleased in this respect, "for many of them have had children by their lawful wives during the time that they are bishops" (Hist. Eccles. v. 22, Op. p. 242, Oxon. 1844). The argument drawn from the incontrovertible fact that popes were the sons of clergymen, and that well-known bishops and priests were married, and that sons and daughters of bishops and presbyters are frequently referred to in the canons of councils, is generally eluded by assuming that, though married, the clergy did not cohabit with their wives after ordination; but the historian's statement cannot be thus put aside, confirmed as it is by overwhelming evidence. Gregory Nazianzen, his sister and brother, were probably born while their father was now a bishop: it is certain that they were born after their father was a priest (Carm. de Vita sua, l. 502); Cyprian charges Novatus, a priest, with cruelty to his wife, which caused her miscarriage (Epist. xlix.); and Synesius, as we know, only accepted his bishopric on the understanding that he was to be in no way separated from his wife. Nevertheless, as time proceeded, the liberty not only of cohabiting with, but of having, wives was extinguished, so far as bishops were concerned, in the East and West alike. Not so with regard to presbyters. In their case the discipline of the two halves of Christendom became more and more divergent. The East never yielded the right of their clergy being fathers of families if married before ordination. The council in Trullo speaks on this point with decision and warmth: —"As we know that the Roman church has ruled that candidates for the diaconate or the presbyterate are to make profession that they will no longer cohabit with their wives, we observing the ancient canon of apostolical perfection and order, declare the marriages of all in holy orders are to be henceforth accounted valid, and we refuse to forbid cohabitation. and will not deprive them of conjugal intercourse at proper times. Therefore, if a man is found fit to be ordained subdeacon, deacon, or presbyter, he is not to be refused on the ground of cohabiting with his wife. Nor at the time of ordination is anyone to be required to profess that he will abstain from intercourse with his lawful wife; lest we thus do dishonour to marriage, which was instituted by God and blessed by His presence, the gospel declaring aloud, 'What God hath joined together, let not man put asunder,' and the apostle teaching, 'Marriage is honourable

* The Latin translation of the passage is as follows: "Jam vero unius quoque uxoris virum utique admittit, seu sit Presbyter, seu Diaconus, seu Laicus, utens matrimonio citra reprehensionem. Servabitur autem per filiorum procreationem." Binterim is driven into saying that "utens" applies only to "laicus," maintaining that otherwise the reading would be "utentes" and "servabuntur" (Denkwürdigkeiten, vi. 2-9).

† According to its grammatical construction this canon deposes from the ministry all clergy who refuse to live in wedlock with their wives. It is generally supposed that the wording is confused, and that it intends to prohibit what it seems to order. If it were construed grammatically it would be similar in its character to the fourth canon of the council of Gangra, mentioned a few lines lower down in the text.

‡ The canons of a supposed council held at Rome by Siricius, A.D. 386, the ninth of which "advises (suademus) Priests and Levites not to live with their wives," and the fourth and fifth forbid the marriage of a clergyman with a widow, are spurious. They are given by Hefele (viii. § 105).

in all, and the bed undefiled,' and 'Art thou bound to a wife, seek not to be loosed.' . . . If, then, anyone in despite of the apostolical canons, be induced to forbid priests, deacons, and subdeacons to cohabit and hold intercourse with their lawful wives, let him be deposed. And, likewise, if any priest or deacon dismisses his wife on the pretext of piety, let him be excommunicated, and if he be obstinate, let him be deposed" (can. xiii., Hard. Concil. tom. iv. p. 1666). Meantime the West was growing stiffer and stiffer, Spain still leading the way. The first and the ninth councils of Toledo (canons i. x., Hard. Concil. tom. i. p. 990, tom. iii. p. 975) forbid cohabitation with increasing rigour, A.D. 400 and 655. The French councils of Arles II., A.D. 452 (can. xliv., Hard. Concil. tom. iv. p. 774), and of Mâcon, A.D. 584 (can. xi.), denounce the punishment of deposition; and Innocent I. in his letters to Victricius and to Exuperius (Hard. Concil. tom. i. pp. 1001, 1003), and Leo I. (Epist. ad Rusticum, Resp. iii., Op. p. 407) speak for Rome in the same sense. Such a discipline so severely enforced could only end in the prohibition of marriage altogether.

The third question, whether the married state and the clerical state were altogether incompatible, could not arise while St Paul's teaching was still ringing in the ears of Christians, for St. Paul had commanded the selection of married men for priests and deacons (1 Tim. iii. 2, 12; Tit. i. 6), the reason of which command was explained by Clement of Alexandria to be that "they have learnt from their own households how to govern the church" (Strom. iii. 12); but it necessarily arose, and was necessarily answered in the affirmative, as soon as the cohabitation of the clergy with their wives had been authoritatively forbidden. When public opinion came to require that a married man should abstain from living with his wife, it was only a question of time how soon it would require him to have no wife at all; and to many the latter course would appear less revolting than the former. A one-sided development of the scriptural precepts contained in Matt. xix. 12, and in 1 Cor. vii. 1–7, necessarily led to the high estimate of celibacy for its own sake that is found in some early writers (see Ignatius, Epist. ad Polycarp. c. v.; Athenagoras, Legat. c. xxxiii.; Justin. Apol. x. xv.), and more naturally found its issue in the imposition of celibacy than of married asceticism. The arguments used from the time of Siricius onwards against cohabitation were of equal force against marriage. If it were true that holiness and abstinence from marriage intercourse were synonymous, and if it were true that the clergy were bound to be in a peculiar manner dedicated to holiness, the conclusion necessarily drawn was that the clergy should be unmarried. Siricius was the spiritual father of Damiani and Hildebrand. It is true that there was a long struggle, sometimes based by the opponents of celibacy on low and carnal motives; sometimes fought on the higher principle which brought into prominence those other scriptural injunctions which ought to limit the application commonly made of those precepts on which the idea of celibacy had grounded itself; sometimes, too, appealing to the practice of the earlier church, still perpetuated in the East. But the battle could not be a successful one unless the principles laid down by Siricius were repudiated, and the honour of married life and married intercourse vindicated. In 961 we find that "a great disturbance took place" in South Wales (as elsewhere) "because the priests were enjoined not to marry without the leave of the pope; so that it was considered best to allow matrimony to the priests" (Brut. y Tywysog. p. 28, Haddan and Stubbs, Councils of Great Britain, i. 286). But in 1059 the West was ripe for the decree of the Roman council under Nicholas II., "Whatever priest, deacon, or subdeacon shall, after the constitution of our predecessor of blessed memory, the most holy pope Leo on clerical chastity, openly marry a concubine (wife), or not leave one that he has married, in the name of Almighty God and by the authority of the blessed apostles Peter and Paul, we enjoin and utterly forbid to sing mass or read the gospel or epistle," &c. (can. iii., Hard. Concil. tom. vi. p. 1052). In the first Lateran Council under Callistus II., A.D. 1123, the word "wife" is introduced, together with that of "concubine." "We utterly forbid priests, deacons, and subdeacons to live with concubines and wives; and any other woman to be in the same house with them, except those whom the Council of Nice allowed on the ground of relationship, namely, mother, sister, aunt, and so on, about whom no suspicion can fairly arise" (can. iii., Hard. Concil. tom. vii. p. 1111). The Lateran Council appeals to the authority of the Council of Nice as though forbidding that which it deliberately refused to forbid.

The fourth question, whether a twice-married man might be ordained, was answered in the negative, being contrary to an ecclesiastical rule which, as we have stated above, was founded on a probably mistaken apprehension of the meaning of St. Paul's injunction to Timothy and Titus (1 Tim. iii. 2, 12; Tit. i. 6). Accordingly, although about the year 220 pope Callistus admitted twice or thrice married men to the Episcopate, the Presbyterate, and the Diaconate, such ordinations were forbidden by the Apostolical Canons (can. xvii.) and Constitutions (ii. 2, vi. 17), by St. Basil's canons (can. xii.), and by all the synods that dealt with the subject, except those held among the Nestorians. Here too, however, a difference of the discipline of the East and the West exhibited itself. The East, which, whenever it could be, was more human and less rigorist than the West, refused to count marriages which had taken place before baptism as disqualifications. Provided that a man had been but once married since his baptism he was eligible in the East to the priesthood, notwithstanding any marriage that he might have contracted as a heathen or as a catechumen (see Council in Trullo, can. iii.). Not so in the West. St. Ambrose and St. Augustine, popes Siricius and Innocent, the councils of Valence and Agde, agree in pronouncing that no such distinction can be recognised. Two marriages, whether before or after baptism, exclude from the ministry. The only voices raised in the West against this ruling are those of St. Jerome, who, in defending the regularity of bishop Carterius's consecration, declares that the word was full of such ordinations (Epist. lxix., Op. tom. i. p. 654, Paris, 1846), and of Gennadius of Marseilles (de Eccles. Dogm. c. lxxii. p. 38, ed. Elmenhorst). The rule, whether in its Eastern or Western form, being positive rather than moral, was constantly broken. (In proof of this, see Tertullian, de Exhortatione Castitatis, c. vii., Op. p. 522, Paris, 1675; and Hippolytus, Philosoph. ix. 12, for early times: a series of councils testifies to the same fact at a later period.) Sometimes a local custom to the contrary would arise, which maintained itself in opposition to the general rule. In the 5th century Theodore of Mopsuestia refused to be bound by a rule which, while it professed to pay deference to St. Paul's words, frustrated the purpose of the Apostle. Theodoret, following his lead, declared that he cared nothing for a practice, however general, which was based upon a false interpretation of St. Paul's command; and when the count Irenaeus had been made bishop of Tyre, though twice married, and thereupon an order came from the emperor to depose him as a digamist as well as a Nestorian, Theodoret wrote a letter justifying his consecration on the grounds that his consecrators had but followed the example of those who had gone before them, citing the instance of Alexander of Antioch and Acacius of Beroea, who had ordained Diogenes, though twice married, and that of Praulius of Jerusalem, who had ordained Domninus, bishop of Caesarea, under like circumstances. He asserted, too, that the consecration of the twice married Irenaeus had taken place with the full approval of Proclus of Constantinople, the chief ecclesiastics of Pontus, and the bishops of Palestine (see Epist. cx., Op. tom. iii. p. 979, Paris, 1642). But this uprising of common sense against harsh rule did not maintain itself. The instances given by Theodoret are exceptions, which only prove the general (though not universal) rule, just as the reiterated canons of councils prove its frequent transgression.

The rule against marrying a widow or a divorced woman was as stringent as that against a second marriage. Special rules of conduct were applicable to the clergyman's wife as well as to the clergyman. The wife of one who was to be ordained must not have been married to a previous husband (see the Apostolical Canons and Constitutions in the places above cited, the fourth council of Carthage, can. lxix., &c.), nor might she marry again after her husband's death. (See the first council of Toledo, held A.D. 400, can. xviii.; the second council of Macon, A.D. 585, can. xvi.; and the council of Vermerie, A.D. 752, can. iii.) In the latter respect the widows of kings were in Spain placed in the same condition as the widows of clergymen. The thirteenth council of Toledo, A.D. 683, forbids their remarriage as a facinus execrabile (can. v., Hard. Concil. tom. iii. p. 1741), and the third council of Saragossa orders them to retire to a convent (can. v., Concil. Caesaraugustanum III., Hard. ibid. p. 1784). [CELIBACY; DIGAMY.]

ix. Ligamen. The prohibition of polygamy by our Lord and the Roman law and practice of monogamy (Cod. Justin. lib. v. tit. v. lig. 2) were sufficient to prevent any question being raised of the lawfulness of simultaneous marriages. An existing marriage was an insuperable impediment to contracting a second marriage. Here and there exceptions to the rule are found, not in the earliest times, resting upon the ground of conjugal impotency (for which see below), and of enforced or voluntary desertion. By the civil law a soldier's wife was permitted to marry again after her husband had been absent four years (Cod. Justin. lib. v. tit. xvii. leg. 7). But the Council in Trullo, following St. Basil, determines that the wife must wait till she was certified of her husband's death, however long a time might elapse (can. xciii.). On the other hand, the council of Vermerie, A.D. 752, enacts that if a wife will not accompany her husband who has been compelled to follow his lord into another land, the husband may marry again if he sees no hope of returning home, submitting at the same time to do penance (can. ix., Hard. Concil. tom. iii. p. 1991). Theodore of Canterbury, A.D. 688, pronounces that if a wife has been carried away by the enemy so that her husband cannot redeem her, he may marry another woman after one year; if there is a chance of redeeming her, he is to wait five years, and the wife in the analogous position is to do likewise, before remarrying. He adds, that if the first wife returns from captivity her husband is to take her back and dismiss his second wife; and the wife likewise (Penitential, lib. ii. cap. xii. §§ 20–22); but a subsequent clause reverses this ruling, and orders that the wife on her return is not to be taken back by her husband, but that she may marry another man, if she has been only once married (ibid. § 24). Theodore's Capitula, as given by Harduin (Concil. tom. iii. p. 1778) fixes seven years for marriage after desertion, and one year in case a wife has been carried captive; but these Capitula are not genuine in the form in which they have come down to us. In Egbert's Excerpts, as they are called, it is decided that the man whose wife is carried away may marry again after seven years, and similarly with respect to the wife; in the case of the wife's voluntary desertion, the man may marry again after five or seven years, with the bishop's consent, but must do penance for three years (can. cxxii. cxxiii., Hard. Concil. tom. iii. p. 1972); but these Excerpts are not Egbert's; they probably belong to the ninth century, perhaps to the tenth. Such concessions as these are, for the most part, not only of a late date but local and exceptional, to meet particular cases as they arose. Theodore of Canterbury himself notes one such concession as uncanonical, though allowed by the Greeks, namely, that two married persons might agree to separate and one of them go into a monastery, the other marry again, unless already twice married (Penitential, lib. ii. cap. xii. § 8); but he allows them, in such a case, to separate, or in case of incapacity from sickness (ibid. § 12). The rule of Christian life was plain. [BIGAMY.]

x. Honestas. Betrothal to a woman is supposed to cause an impediment to marrying her nearest relatives, so that if a man be betrothed to one sister and marries another, his marriage is null and void, and he is still bound to carry out his betrothal-promise to the first sister. Antiquity knows nothing of this, a spurious decree of pope Julius is quoted as the first authority for it. (See Van Espen, Jus Ecclesiasticum, pars ii. § i., tit. xiii. 25, p. 589.)

xi. Actus. The age before which a marriage contract was null and void was, in the case of the woman, twelve, of the man fourteen years. (See Selden, Uxor Ebraica, lib. ii. c. 3; Digest.

lib. xxiii. tit. ii. leg. 4; Instit. lib. i. tit. xxii.; Martene, de Antiquis Eccles. Ritibus, cap. ix. art. i. ñ.)

xii. Affinis. [PROHIBITED DEGREES.]

xiii. Clandestinus. The publicity of the marriage contract was always regarded as an essential part of it. Different means were taken in different countries for ensuring publicity, but that it should exist was recognised by every civilised state as the foundation of its social system. Among the Jews and Romans a certain number of witnesses was required;[h] Tertullian declares that the church demands publicity (de Pudicitia, cap. iv., Op. p. 557); and the presence of witnesses is pronounced by a law of Theodosius Jun., quoted below, to be one of the few things which could not be dispensed with in a marriage ceremony. The testimony of the church officer before whom the contract was made naturally came to be accepted as the best testimony that could be had, but it was not until the council of Trent that all marriages were declared null, on the ground of their being clandestine, unless they were celebrated in the presence of the incumbent of the parish in which one of the contracting parties lived. The council of Verneuil orders that all marriages shall be made in public, whatever rank the parties might be (Conc. Vernens. can. xv., Hard. Concil. tom. iii. p. 1997). The council of Friuli, A.D. 791, gives the same order with a view to the prevention of marriages of consanguinity or affinity (Conc. Forojuliense, can. viii., ib. tom. iv. p. 859).

xiv. Impos. Impotency is an impediment which makes a marriage not void, but voidable after a period of three years. In Christian legislation it was first recognised by Justinian, A.D. 528, as an adequate cause for a divorce (Cod. Justin. lib. v. tit. xvii. leg. 10; Auth. Collat. iv. tit. 1, Novell. xxii. 6, Corp. Juris, tom. ii. pp. 458, 124). See also Photius, Nomocanon, tit. xiii. § 4. Theodore's Penitential declares it a sufficient cause for a woman to take another husband (lib. ii. cap. xii. § 32), or if arising from sickness, for a separation (ibid. § 12). In the eighth century Gregory II., replying to a question of Boniface of Germany, goes so far as to lay it down that in case of impotency on the part of the woman, arising from an attack of illness, "it would be well that her husband should remain as he is, and give himself up to self-restraint; but wherens none but great souls can attain to this, let a man who cannot contain marry rather, but he is not to withdraw alimony from her who is only prevented by infirmity, not excluded by loathsome guilt" (cap. ii., Hard. Concil. tom. iii. p. 1858). At the end of the same century, Egbert, of York, rules, though with great reluctance, in a similar case, that the one of the two that is in good health may marry again with the permission of the one that is sick, provided that the latter promises perpetual continence and is never allowed to marry during the other's life, under any change of circumstances (Dialogue of Egbert, Resp. xiii., Haddan and Stubbs, Councils of Great Britain, vol. iii. p. 409). The laws of Howel Dda, A.D. 928, allow a woman to separate from her husband, without losing her dower, on the grounds of impotency, leprosy or bad breath (Cyfreithiau Hywel Dda, bk. ii. c. xxix. § 26, Haddan and Stubbs, Councils of Great Britain, vol. i. p. 247). St. Thomas Aquinas and later moral theologians go further still; they allow that an excessive disgust for a wife justifies a man in regarding himself impotent in respect to her (see Liguori, Theol. Mor. vi. 6. 3, 2). These are concessions, which, however they may have been acted on in more than one conspicuous instance, cannot be reconciled with the rules of ordinary morality. In the 6th century the second council of Orleans ruled in a contrary sense (can. xi., Hard. Concil. tom. ii. p. 1175). Impotency existing at the time of marriage being incompatible with the primary end of the contract, makes the contract void or voidable without the intervention of any statute or canon law.

xv. Raptus. This impediment is sometimes classed under that of vis. It means not exactly the same as our word ravishment, but the violent removal of a woman to a place where her actions are no longer free, for the sake of inducing or compelling her to marry. The act of Bothwell in carrying away Mary Stuart, would have been precisely a case of raptus had there been no collusion between them. By some raptus is distinguished into the two classes of raptus seductionis and raptus violentiae. Whether ravishment in the strict sense of the word is an impediment to a future marriage is a question which has been answered in contrary ways. Those who regarded it as a shameful act that a man should gain his object by committing a great crime, decided that it was an insuperable impediment for ever. Those who considered that the injury done to the woman could only be atoned for and nullified by marriage, took the opposite view, and required the ravisher to marry her. The Roman law made it a perpetual impediment. Laws of Constantine and Constantius inflict capital punishment on ravishers (Cod. Theod. lib. ix. tit. xxiv. legg. 1, 2); and Justinian, after having pronounced the penalty of death for the crime, continues, "Nor is the ravished woman to be allowed to ask for and obtain her ravisher as her husband: her parents are to marry her to whom they will, except the ravisher, in lawful wedlock, but our serenity will never in any way consent to the act of those who try to wed in our state like enemies. For every one who wishes for a wife, whether free or freed, is to ask her of her parents or other guardians in accordance with the tenor of our laws, that by their consent a legitimate marriage may take place" (Cod. Justin. lib. ix. tit. xiii. leg. i, Corp. Juris, tom. ii. p. 832). The law of the Visigoths went so far as to punish ravisher and victim with death if they should presume to marry (lib. iii. tit. iii. legg. 1, 2, Canciani, vol. iv. p. 93). On the other hand the Ostrogothic law required the man to marry and to endow the woman.

[h] Athanaeus says that one object of the nuptial banquet was to serve as a witness: "Nec enim moribus et legibus scitum est, ut in nuptiis epulum fiat, tum ut nuptiales Deos veneremur, tum ut pro testimonio id sit." (Deipnosoph. lib. v. c. i., Op. p. 185, Lugd. 1657.) Another way in which publicity was effected was the insertion of the marriages in the Acta, which appeared daily, like modern newspapers, but there were no public marriage registers.

Similarly the Apostolical Canons, after having pronounced excommunication on the ravisher of an unbetrothed virgin, ruled that he may not take another wife, but must keep her, though poor (can. lxviii.). The laws of king Ethelbert, A.D. 597, order that the ravisher is to pay a shilling to the owner of the girl and then buy her of him; but if she were betrothed he is to be fined twenty shillings (Dooms, lxxxii., lxxxiii., Haddan and Stubbs, vol. iii. p. 49). St. Basil says that the marriage is to depend upon the will of the woman's friends (Epist. Canon. II. can. xxii). The ravisher, according to the same authority, is to do penance for three years (ib. can. xxx). The council of Chalcedon, A.D. 451, and the council in Trullo decree that a ravisher is to be deposed if a clergyman, anathematised if a layman (cans. xxvii. xcii., Hard. Concil. tom. ii. p. 611; tom. iii. p. 1694). The first council of Orleans, A.D. 511, orders that a ravisher who flies with the woman to a church is to be made a slave with power of redemption (can. ii., ib. p. 1009). The third council excommunicates the ravishers of consecrated virgins (can. xvi., ib. pp. 14-26). The Roman council under Gregory II. anathematises all ravishers (can. x. xi. ib. tom. iii. p. 1866). The Capitula of Herard of Tours forbid the marriage of the parties concerned (cap. ex., ib. tom. v. p. 457). The Council of Meaux, A.D. 845, advises it (can. lxv., ib. tom. iv. p. 1494).

Second Marriage.—Is previous marriage an impediment to a second, third, or fourth marriage? This is a question which was raised in the early church, and discussed with some warmth, and, like the celibacy of the clergy, was answered somewhat differently at different times and in different places. Certainly there is nothing in Holy Scripture to forbid successive marriages (at least so far as the laity are concerned; the question of the second marriage of the clergy has been considered above). St. Paul distinctly states that after the death of one party to the contract the other may marry again, provided that the second husband or wife be a Christian (Rom. vii. 2; 1 Cor. vii. 39); and he desires that under such circumstances young widows should remarry (1 Cor. vii.; 1 Tim. v. 14).

The teaching of the early church was framed on that of St. Paul; but some misconception of the views of early writers has arisen, owing to their designating both marriage after divorce and marriage after death by the same name of second marriage. Thus Clement of Alexandria, in the third book of the Stromateis, which is devoted to the subject of marriage, speaks with reprobation of second marriage: but a careful examination of the context leads to the conclusion that he is speaking of a second marriage while the first husband or wife is still alive (c. xii.); for in the same chapter of the same book, he plainly declares second marriage permissible, adding, however, that he who marries a second time falls short of the highest evangelical perfection. Whether the third canon of the council of Neo-Caesarea which condemns "those that have fallen into several marriages," refers to successive or to simultaneous marriages, has been questioned, but it is likely that it is aimed at some form of polygamy or marriage after divorce, not at marriage after death (see Brouwer, de Jure Connubiorum, lib. ii. c. xix. § 7, Op. p. 569, Delphis, 1714).

Hermae Pastor deals with the question altogether in St. Paul's spirit, and almost adopts his words "Qui nubit, non peccat sed si per se manserit, magnum sibi conquirit honorem apud Dominum" (lib. ii. Mand. 4, apud Cotelerii Patres Apostolicos, tom. i. p. 90; Amsterdam, 1724, where see note). The Apostolical Constitutions (c. ii.) permit second marriage, reprove third marriage, and forbid fourth marriage. "For you ought to know this, that once marrying according to the law is righteous, as being according to the will of God; but second marriages after the promise [of widowhood] are wicked, not on account of the marriage itself, but because of the falsehood. Third marriages are indications of incontinency. But such marriages as are beyond the third are manifest fornication and unquestionable uncleanness. For God gave one woman to one man in the creation; for they two shall be one flesh. But to the younger women let a second marriage be allowed after the death of their first husband, lest they fall into the condemnation of the devil and many snares and foolish lusts, which are hurtful to souls, and which bring upon them punishment rather than peace" (lib. iii. c. 2). Origen goes so far as to say that second, third, and fourth marriages exclude from the kingdom of heaven, but he proceeds to explain that by the kingdom of heaven he means that church "which hath neither spot nor wrinkle nor any such thing," that is, the invisible body of perfect Christians. He allows that the twice married are in a state of salvation, but says that they will not receive a crown at their Master's hands (Hom. xvii. in Luc., Op. tom. iii. p. 953); and elsewhere he says that a woman who marries twice will not forfeit salvation, but will enjoy less beatitude (Hom. xix. in Jerem., ib. p. 267). Tertullian, vehement monogamist as he was, yet allows that second marriage is only an obstacle to saintliness, not in itself unlawful (ad Uxor. lib. i. cap. 7). Fulgentius, in his work on the Faith, declares second and third marriage permissible (de Fide, c. xlii., Op. p. 484, Ants. 1574). Hilary of Poitiers follows St. Paul in teaching that second marriage is lawful (Tract. in Psalm. lxvii.; Op. p. 194: Paris, 1693). Cyril of Jerusalem pronounces second marriage a thing to be pardoned (Catech iv. 16, Op. p. 60, Oxon. 1703). The Oration (falsely) attributed to Amphilochius holds it permissible in case there are no children by the first marriage (Orat. in Occursum Domini, Op. p. 32, Paris, 1644). Pope Gelasius declares it permissible in laymen, though not allowable in the clergy (Epist. v. cap. xxii., Hard. Concil. tom. ii. p. 903). Epiphanius (Haeres. lix., Op. tom. i. p. 497), Theodoret (Com. in 1 Cor. xvii. 39), St. Ambrose (de Viduis, c. xi., Op. tom. ii. p. 203, St. Augustine (de Bono Vid. c. vi., Op. tom. vi. p. 435), St. Jerome (Epist. xxvii. ad Marcellam, Op. tom. ii. pars 2, p. 64), pronounce in like manner in favour of the legality and against the propriety of a second marriage. This was the general sentiment of the early church. The severer view was banished from within the borders of the church and became a distinctive mark of Montanists and Novatians. See Tertullian, de Exhortatione Castitatis, c. vii., and de Monogamia, passim. The council of Nicaea (can. viii.) deliberately condemned the Novatian view by requiring that none should refuse to hold communion with Digamists.

Second marriages were discountenanced by the imposition of a penance, but how soon this practice arose is questioned. Some think that they find it enjoined in the canons of the council of Laodicea, A.D. 360, the first of which rules that "in accordance with the ecclesiastical canon, those who have been married a second time in a free and lawful way, and have not taken their wives in a clandestine manner, are to be allowed communion (ex venia dari communionem) after a little time has passed, and they have had a period for prayer and fasting (orationibus et jejuniis vacaverint)." The last expression has been not unfrequently understood, and it is understood by Hefele (Hist. of Councils, bk. vi.), to refer to an ecclesiastical penance that the married couple had to undergo for their offence in marrying a second time; but it may only mean that a space was to intervene after marriage, which was to be devoted by them to prayer and fasting before they offered themselves at the Lord's table. The "ecclesiastical canon" referred to in the Laodicean canon is not one that restrains second marriages, but, no doubt, the eighth canon of the council of Nicaea, which is in favour of them; and the practice of setting apart a time for prayer and fasting before communicating after marriage, whether regarded as a penitential discipline or not, was looked upon as a proper act of reverence, whether the marriage was the first or the second. (See Herard's Capitula, cap. lxxxix., Hard. Concil. tom. v. p. 456. Compare also the so-called fourth council of Carthage, can. xiii., Hefele, bk. viii.; and Theodore's Penitential, lib. ii. cap. xii. §§ 1, 2.) By the end of the 7th century this period of prayer and fasting was distinctly regarded as a time of penance, but it was a penance imposed upon those who contracted a first marriage, as much as upon those who entered on a second marriage, the only difference being that a longer period was assigned in the latter case than in the former. Theodore of Canterbury orders that in a first marriage the husband and wife are to refrain from church for thirty days, and then to do penance for forty days, and give themselves to prayer, before communicating, while a man who makes a second marriage is to do penance for a year on Wednesdays and Fridays, and to abstain from flesh meat for three Lents. This is a plain instance of penance being required for second marriage, but it is equally plain that the offence for which penance has to be done is rather that of marrying than of marrying a second time (Penitential, lib. i. c. xiv. §§ 1, 2). No doubt, however, from very early times a difference was made not only in respect to the honour paid to first and second marriages, but also in the ceremonies with which they were performed. The Council of Neocaesarea, A.D. 314, forbids presbyters to be present at the festivities of a second marriage, and the ceremonies of crowning the bride and bridegroom, and giving the benediction were commonly, though not universally, omitted. Ὁ δίγαμος οὐ στεφανοῦται became a familiar Greek saying. St. Basil speaks of a penalty due to digamy as already a well-known custom in the year 375, The early Roman discipline is probably exhibited to us in the commentary attributed to St. Ambrose, supposed to have been written by Hilary the Deacon. "First marriages are godly, second marriages are permitted, first marriages are solemnly celebrated under the benediction of God, second marriages are left without honour, even at the time of celebration, but they are allowed on account of incontinency" (Com. in 1 Cor. vii. 40, Op. tom. ii. p. 138). See also Durandus, Rationale Div. Offic. i. ix. 15, Op. p. 28, Venice, 1577; and the office for the marriage of Digamists in Goar's Euchologium, p. 401, Paris, 1647. In the East Nicephorus, patriarch of Constantinople, in the year 814, fixes two years as the period for suspension from communion for a second marriage (Hard. Concil. tom. iv. p. 1052).

St. Basil's canons forbid third marriages, but did not require the separation of the parties married. Theodore of Canterbury, A.D. 687, imposes a penance of seven years, on Wednesdays and Fridays, with abstinence from flesh meat for three Lents, on trigamists, or any who contract more than three marriages, but pronounces the marriages valid (Penitential, lib. i. c. xiv. § 3). Nicephorus of Constantinople, A.D. 814, suspends trigamists for five years (Hard. Concil. tom. iv. p. 1052). Herard of Tours, A.D. 858, declares any greater number of wives than two to be unlawful (cap. cxi., ibid. tom. v. p. 457). Leo the Wise, emperor of Constantinople, was allowed to marry three wives without public remonstrance, but was suspended from communion by the patriarch Nicholas when he married a fourth. This led to a council being held at Constantinople, A.D. 920, which finally settled the Greek discipline on the subject of third and fourth marriages. It ruled that the penalty for a fourth marriage was to be excommunication and exclusion from the church; for a third marriage, if a man were forty years old, suspension for five years, and admission to communion thereafter only on Easter day. If he were thirty years old, suspension for four years, and admission to communion thereafter only three times a year.

A widow might not marry again till the expiration of the old Romulean ten-month year from the time of her husband's death. By Theodosius this term was extended to twelve months (Cod. Theod. lib. iii. tit. viii. leg. 1).

II. MARRIAGE CEREMONIES. The marriage rite was divided into two parts, the betrothal and the nuptials, each of which had its own peculiar ceremonies attached to it. The betrothal was a legal contract, entered into between a man and a woman, binding them to marry within a given time, which time came to be fixed at two years; the nuptials were a further contract, whereby each gave to the other certain rights over himself or herself, and received in turn the gift of certain rights over the other. Betrothal could be omitted without absolutely and in all cases invalidating the marriage, but when formal betrothal had taken place, nuptials could not be declined by either party without incurring both ignominy and punishment. The council of Elvira condemned parents who break their promise given at espousals to excommunication for three years (Conc. Elib. can. liv.). If the woman breaks her troth, Theodore of Canterbury's Penitential condemns her to restore the money which the man had given for her, and to add to it one-third; if the man refuses, he is to lose the money that he had paid. A betrothed woman may go into a monastery instead of marrying, but her parents may not give her to another man unless she shews an utter repugnance to the proposed match (lib. ii. c xii. §§ 33, 34).

A. Betrothal ceremonies. We are fortunate in having both a definition of betrothal and a description of the ceremonies which accompany it given us by pope Nicholas in his Replies to the Bulgarians, who had asked his counsel, A.D. 860. "Betrothal," he says, "is the promise of future nuptials made by the consent of the contracting parties and of their guardians;" and he explains that the betrothed proceed to their nuptials at some suitable time "after the man has betrothed the woman to himself with arrhae by adorning her finger with a ring of fidelity, and the man has handed over a dowry agreed to by both of them in a written form containing his covenant before witnesses invited on both sides." This passage embodies an account of the traditional practice which had existed for centuries previous to the date of Nicholas, for he distinctly states that he is relating to the Bulgarians "the custom which the holy Roman church has received from old" (Nicol. Respons. ad consulta Bulgarorum, Resp. iii., Hard. Concil. tom. v. p. 354). We see here that there are four things necessary to make betrothal regular: 1, arrhae; 2, a ring; 3, a dowry; 4, witnesses.

1. The most essential of these ceremonies was the bestowal of the arrhae, or earnest money, supposed by some to have been originally given by the man as the symbolical purchase-money of the maiden, answering to the Jewish rite termed בכסף ("by money"), recalling in a sort both the Roman co-emptio, and the barbaric practice of purchasing wives. But it is probable that it was no more than a pledge such as was given in other cases where bargains were struck which could not be immediately carried out. It served to assure the woman that she should hereafter share her husband's worldly goods, of which the coin given at espousals was an earnest, and it was evidence which might be exhibited by the aggrieved party in case of a breach of promise of marriage. Thus we read that Andarchius went to law with the daughter of Ursus, alleging as proof of his espousals with her that he had given her an arrha. (See Gregory of Tours' History, lib. iv. c. 41, apud Hist. Franc. Script. tom. i. p. 322, Paris, 1636.) That the practice existed among the Western nations before they were Christianized is proved by the ambassadors of Clovis betrothing Clotilda to him by presenting a shilling and a penny, "according to the custom of the Franks." The Espousals service is called by the name of ἀκολουθία τοῦ ἀρραβῶνος or ordo in nuptiarum subarrhatione in the Greek Euchologion (Goar, p. 380, Paris, 1647). Subarrhare came to be equivalent to espouse. [ARRHAE.]

2. The ring is described by pope Nicholas as making part of the arrhae. It was used in pre-Christian times in marriages, and was probably borrowed by the Jews from pagan usage. Among the Jews it occasionally took the place of the piece of money, the payment of which constituted one of the three forms of Jewish marriage. When this was the case, an examination was instituted to see if its value were equal to that of the legally required coin before ... as accepted as an equivalent (Selden, Uxor Ebraica, ii. 14). Among Christians it was probably adopted, not only as part of the arrhae, but as having (if it were the same as the seal ring described by Clement of Alexandria), a symbolical meaning like that of the presentation of a bunch of keys, shewing that the wife had the charge of the household goods. "He gives a gold ring," says St. Clement, "not for ornament, but that she may with it seal up what has to be kept safe, as the care of keeping the house belongs to her" (Paedagog. iii. 11, Op. p. 287). Other and less material symbolisms easily attached themselves to the ring: it was a type of fidelity, of safely guarded modesty, of union, of protection, of the Holy Spirit's encircling grace. Tertullian testifies to its use, in the words "digito quem sponsus oppignerasset pronubo annulo" (Apologet. c. vi., Op. p. 7). In later times the ring was blessed by a special service. Some Eastern rituals required the interchange of two rings (Goar, Euchologium, p. 385). The latest issued Rituale, that of the Old Catholics, contains a form for the blessing either of two rings or of one (Old Catholic Ritual, p. 39, Eng. tr. Oxf. 1876).

3. The dowry is next mentioned. Among the Greeks and Romans it was the custom that the dowry should be paid or promised at the betrothal by the relatives of the woman (see Plautus, Trinummus, act v.); with the Hebrews (as with the Germans—see Tacitus, de Moribus Germanorum, c. xviii.) the dowry was paid by the man (Gen. xxxiv. 12; 1 Sam. xviii. 25), but occasionally the father gave a dowry to his daughter (Judges i. xv.). The Hebrew custom prevailed in the early church, and is embodied in the civil as well as in the canon law (Cod. Theod. lib. iii. tit. 13; lib. ii. tit. 21). St. Augustine says that a good wife looks upon the tabulae nuptiales as instrumenta emptionis suae, whereby her husband has become her lord (dominus) and she has been made his handmaid or slave (ancilla), as she gladly acknowledges (Sermo xxxvii. cap. 6, Op. tom. v. p. 225, ed. Migne). The promise of a dowry was generally consigned to writing, which was read before the witnesses to the betrothal, and it became a formal legal document, of the nature of a marriage settlement. The following is an abridged form of nuptial tablets as used by the Jews: "On such a day of such a month in such a year at such a place, such an one, the son of such an one, said to such an one, the daughter of such an one: 'Be thou betrothed to me for wife according to the ordinances of Moses and the Israelites, and I, if it please God, will pay you respect and honour, I will give you food and sustenance, and I will dress you in the way that Jewish husbands do who honour, maintain, and clothe their wives as they ought. I also give to you, as the dowry of your maidenhood, £4, as the law requires, and I pledge myself to give you in addition board and clothing, and I will live with you according to the customs of the whole earth.' Then she gave assent to be his wife. He then declared that he would give such and such a sum as an addition to the original dowry. The goods which the woman brought with her are estimated at such and such a sum. . . We have sealed this tablet or dowry settlement at the time above-mentioned: the whole matter is clear, settled, and determined" (Selden, Uxor Ebraica, ii. 10, Op. tom. iv. p. 619). In the Christian tabulae matrimoniales, the end for which marriage was instituted was also inserted: "nam id tabulae indicant ubi scribitur, 'Liberorum procreandorum causâ'" says St. Augustine (Serm. ix., Op. tom. v. p. 88, ed. Migne); and again, "Recitantur tabulae, et recitantur in conspectu omnium attestantium, et recitatur, 'Liberorum procreandorum causâ'" (Serm. li., ibid. p. 345); see also his Enarr. in Ps. lxxxi. (Op. tom. iv. p. 1045).

4. Witnesses were required to be present, before whom, as we have seen, the marriage settlements were to be read and handed over. They were to be friends of both parties, and their presence was required not only to prevent fraud in the matter of the dowry, but also to give a public character to the transaction, that there might be a proof before the world of the consent of both parties to the contract. One of them acted as best man to the bridegroom (amicus interior, conscius secreti cubicularis, St. Aug. Serm. ccxcii., Op. tom. v. p. 1332) and one as bridesmaid, and, in case of the mother's death, as temporary guardian to the bride. It would appear probable from a passage in St. Ambrose (de lapsu Virginis, c. v., Op. tom. ii. p. 310) that the requisite number of witnesses was ten (Cf. Ruth iv. 2, where the number of witnesses called by Boaz is ten).

5. Some minor ceremonies, which were less essential to the rite, have also been handed down. One of these was a kiss, which might or might not be given, but which, if given, was considered to bind the betrothed more closely to each other, so that, in case of the man's death, half of his betrothal gifts were delivered to his betrothed; whereas if there had been no kiss, they were all returned to his relations (Cod. Theod. lib. iii. tit. 5, leg. 5; Cod. Justin. lib. v. tit. 3, leg. 16).

6. Another ceremony of similar nature was that of joining hands, which is mentioned together with that of the kiss by Tertullian: "Corpore et spiritu masculo mixta sunt per osculum et dexteras, per quae primum resignarunt pudorem spiritûs" (de Virg. Veland. c. xi., Op. p. 179).

7. In the time of Tertullian, the veil was assumed by the woman at the betrothal and worn thenceforward, but the custom was not universal (Rebeccam quidam adhuc velant), and in later times, like the offering of the ring, was transferred to the nuptials (Tertull. ibid.).

8. Siricius in the 4th century speaks, in an epistle which (rightly or wrongly) is regarded as genuine, of a benediction of the priest at betrothal, of so solemn a nature as to make it sacrilege in the betrothed woman to marry another man (Siric. Epist. ad Himer. § 4, Hard. Concil. tom. i. p. 848). The betrothal benediction, however (if it existed), must not be confounded with that which was given at the nuptials.

B. Nuptial ceremonies. Pope Nicholas proceeds, in the Reply above quoted, to enumerate the nuptial ceremonies which were in use in his day with the same minuteness with which he described the betrothal ceremonies. He writes: "First of all they are placed in the church with oblations, which they have to make to God by the hands of the priest, and so at last they receive the benediction and the heavenly veil.' He adds: "After this, when they have gone out of the church they wear crowns on their heads, a supply of which it is usual to keep always in the church" (Nic. Respons. ubi supra).

The first thing that forces itself upon our notice on reading the above passage is that in pope Nicholas' time, and for such previous times as the ceremonies described by him had existed, marriage was regarded as a religious rite; being (1) performed in a church, (2) accompanied by offerings and oblations made to God by the married persons through a priest, (3) followed by the solemn benediction of the church, together with (4) other ceremonies of an ecclesiastical character: and this was the aspect in which marriage was viewed from the times of Tertullian, as is proved by the following passage: "How shall I state the blessedness of a marriage which the church brings about, and the oblation confirms, and the benediction seals, angels attest, and the Father ratifies" (ad Uxor. lib. ii. c. 8, p. 171). In these words Tertullian, as is pointed out by Gothofred (Cod. Theod. lib. iii. tit. 7, leg. 3, tom. i. p. 280), contrasts the marriage ceremonies of the Christian church, A.D. 200, with the ceremonies used by heathens on the same occasion. Among heathens, marriages were brought about by persons called conciliatores. In the case of Christians, the place of the conciliatores is taken by the church, that is, by the officers of the church, namely, the bishops, priests, deacons, and widows (see the passage of Tertullian referred to just below), the heathens' offering of arrhae is replaced by the oblation of prayers and alms offered through the priest;[1] for the sealing of the marriage settlements is substituted the seal of the church's benediction; the testimony of angels stands in the place of the testimony of human witnesses; and ratification by a heavenly Father takes the place of the expressed consent of parents. Tertullian's rhetorical description does not of course imply that the old ceremonies were abolished, but it does imply that an ecclesiastical character was given to them, and that they were carried out under the control, and by the hands, of ministers of the church. Elsewhere Tertullian states that Christian marriages had to be announced to the church, and were allowed, or disallowed, by bishops, priests, deacons, and widows (de Pudicitia, c. iv.; de Monogam. c. xi., Op. p. 531). One object of this regulation may have been to prevent ignorant members of the flock from transgressing various laws of the state with which they might be unacquainted; but this was not its only purpose; the church, that is, the bishops, priests, deacons, and widows, would thus become the conciliatores of a Christian's marriage, according to the idea employed in the previously quoted passage. St. Ignatius, in like manner, says that people who marry ought to be united with the cognizance and approval of the bishop: μετὰ γνώμης τοῦ Ἐπισκόπου (St. Ignat. Epist. ad Polycarp. c. v.). St. Ambrose says that marriage has to be sanctified by benediction (Epist. xix., Op. tom. ii. p. 844); Gregory Nazianzen writes that at the marriage of "the golden Olympias" there was a number of bishops (ἀνιερέων ὅμιλος), and that he too, though absent in body, was present in will, taking part in the festivity, and joining the young couple's hands together, and placing them in the hands of God (Epist. lvii., Op. tom. i. p. 815, col. 1690). The (so-called) fourth council of Carthage (can. xiii.) in the 6th century speaks plainly of priestly benediction being received by the bride and bridegroom (Hard. Concil. tom. i. p. 979). Synesius uses the expression, "The holy hand of Theophilus gave me my wife" (Epist. 105).

[1] It is surprising to find Dr. Döllinger apparently translating Ecclesia conciliat, confirmat oblatio by "The marriage was concluded by the bishop, or presbyter uniting the betrothed, and confirmed by offering of the Holy Sacrifice" (Hippolytus and Callistus, c. iii. p. 158, Eng. tr.). It is impossible to believe that this is the meaning of confirmat oblatio in this passage; nor does ecclesia conciliat seem to refer to the actual marriage-service, but rather to the first steps taken in the matter before the church officers.

There is no reasonable doubt that the place in which Christians were ordinarily married was a church, so soon as it became safe and customary for them to meet in churches for religious purposes, and that the way in which they were ordinarily married was by a religious ceremony.[k] Nevertheless, it is equally true that marriages could, and, especially in the East, often did, take place in houses (see St. Chrys. Hom. xlviii. in Gen. c. xxiv.), and that the religious ceremony does not form, and was not regarded as forming, the essence of marriage. The essence of marriage consists in the contract agreed to and publicly made between the contracting parties.[l] Consequently, marriages unaccompanied by the blessing of the church were still considered to be marriages, though they were looked on with disfavour, and, as Tertullian says, ran the risk of being condemned as adultery (De Pudicitiâ, c. iv.). Accordingly, a law of Theodosius Junior, A.D. 428, distinguishing between the essentials and non-essentials of marriage, declares that the omission of other rites such as arrhæ, dowry, and a festive procession, did not invalidate a marriage, provided that (1) the contracting parties were of equal station (see above, under the heading Conditio), (2) they broke no specific law by their union, (3) they gave their consent, (4) their friends were present as witnesses. The law recognised no more than the above-named four qualifications for a valid marriage,[m] nor did the church attempt to annul what the law allowed. Probably the feeling with which these marriages were regarded on which the church's blessing was not invoked was much the same in the early church as it is at present with ourselves. The secular marriage was acknowledged to be valid; but the parties contracting such a marriage were supposed to have incurred serious loss by depriving themselves of the church's blessing on their union, and to have acted undutifully and only as irreligious persons would act. This liberty of contracting marriage otherwise than by the benediction of the church continued in the West till the time of Charles the Great, A.D. 800, and in the East till that of Leo the Philosopher, A.D. 900. These two emperors enacted that all marriages were invalid except such as were performed by a priest.

There is no sign or hint of marriage being regarded as a sacrament, in the stricter sense of that word, in early times. It is supposed by some that it began first to be so regarded in the time of St. Augustine, A.D. 430, but this is a mistake arising from the use which St. Augustine makes of the word "sacramentum," which he uses frequently in connexion with marriage, but nowhere in the modern sense of the word sacrament. Calvin states that it was not regarded as a sacrament down to the time of Gregory (Instit. lib. iv. cap. 19, § 34, Op. tom. ix. p. 396, Amsterdam, 1567), but he does not say that it then began to be so regarded. The period when this took place is so late that it does not fall within the limits of the time assigned to this dictionary. Binterim's attempts to father it upon Tertullian, St. Augustine, St. Chrysostom, and other early writers, are so manifestly futile as to raise a smile (Denkwürdigkeiten, sechster Band, erstes Kapitel, § 2, 3).

The constituent parts of the marriage service, as named by pope Nicholas in the passage quoted above, are 1. The oblations. 2. The benediction. 3. The veiling. 4. The crowning.

1. The Oblations consisted mainly of prayers, which, however, were accompanied by a gift of money. The offering of these formed the introductory portion of the ceremony, answering in some sort to the prayers and thanksgivings which in our form for the solemnisation of matrimony precede and accompany the blessing pronounced by the officiating priest upon the contract.

2. The Benediction was a form not unknown to the Jews; amongst whom it was given, not necessarily by a priest, but by the eldest friend or relative present. The following is an abridgment of a Jewish formula of benediction:—"Blessed be Thou, O Lord our God, who hast created all things for Thy glory! Blessed be Thou, O Lord our God, the creator of man! The barren shall rejoice and cry for joy as she gathers her children with joyfulness to her bosom. Blessed art Thou who makest Zion to rejoice in her children! Make this couple to rejoice with joy according to the joyousness which thou gavest to the work of Thy hands in the garden of Eden of old! Blessed art Thou who makest the bride and bridegroom to rejoice! Blessed art Thou who hast created for the bridegroom and bride joy and gladness, exultation, singing, cheerfulness, mirth, love, brotherly kindness, peace, and friendship! O Lord our God, may there be heard in the cities of Judaea and in the streets of Jerusalem the voice of mirth and gladness, the voice of the bridegroom and bride, the voice of the bridegroom's and bride's mutual affection out of their cham-

[k] Van Espen considers it doubtful if marriages were contracted in a church, though they were no doubt contracted in the face of the church (De Spons. et Matr. vi. 4).

"A contract of eternal bond of love,
Confirmed by mutual joinder of the hands,
Attested by the holy close of lips,
Strengthened by interchangement of your rings;
And all the ceremony of this compact Sealed in my function by my testimony."

Twelfth Night, v. 1.

The essence of the marriage was the contract: all that was necessary (strictly speaking) on the part of the priest was his testimony to the contract having been fully made and declared.

[m] Apuleius introduces Venus denying that Psyche is Cupid's wife, on the ground that "Impares nuptiæ, et præterea in villâ sine testibus, et patre non consentiente legitimæ non possunt videri." (De Asino aureo, lib. vi. p. 104.)

ber, and the young men's festive song! Blessed art Thou who makest the bridegroom to rejoice with the bride" (Selden, Uxor Ebraica ii. 12, Op. tom. iv. p. 625). The particular form of the Christian benediction, which differs from the Jewish by being a blessing on the newly married pair instead of a thanksgiving to God, was at first probably left to the officiating minister, but it would soon have become stereotyped in the rituals of the several churches. The following is a form on which it will be seen that the final benediction in the solemnisation of matrimony in the English church is framed:—"O God, who by Thy mighty power hast made all things of nothing, who, after other things set in order, didst appoint that out of man (created after Thine own image and similitude) woman should take her beginning, teaching that it should be never lawful to put asunder those whom Thou hadst pleased should be created out of one; O God, who hast consecrated the state of matrimony to such an excellent mystery that in it Thou didst typify the Sacrament of Christ and the Church; O God by whom woman is joined to man, and so blessed a union was instituted at the beginning as not to be destroyed even by the judgment of the flood; look mercifully upon this Thy servant now to be joined in wedlock, who seeks to be defended by Thy protection. May there be on her the yoke of love and peace! May she be a faithful and chaste wife in Christ, and may she continue a follower of holy women! May she be loveable to her husband as Rachel, wise as Rebecca, long-lived and faithful as Sarah! May the author of wickedness gain no advantage against her from her acts! May she continue in the faith and commandments, constant to one husband! May she avoid all unlawful deeds. May she strengthen her weakness by the help of discipline! May she be modest, grave, bashful, and instructed in God by learning! May she be fruitful in childbearing! May she be approved and innocent, and may she attain to the rest of the blessed, and to the heavenly kingdom! And may she see her sons' sons to the third and fourth generation, and may she reach the rest of the blessed and the kingdom of heaven, through," etc. (Martene, de Antiquis Ecclesiae ritibus I. ix. 5, Ordo iii. ex MS. Pontificali Monasterii Lyrensis).

3. The practice of veiling is mentioned by Tertullian (de Veland. Virgin. c. xi.) and by St. Ambrose (Epist. xix. 7, Op. tom. ii. p. 844); the former of whom speaks of it as a praiseworthy heathen custom commonly used in the ceremony of betrothal, after which (in Tertullian's days) the desponsata wore the veil habitually. The heathen veil, called flammeum, was of a yellow colour. The colour adopted by Christians was purple and white, though the name flammeum was still sometimes used (St. Ambr. de Virgin. c. xv.; de Inst. Virg. c. xvii.). It is probable, as St. Ambrose has observed (de Abrah. I. ix. 93), that the word nuptials is derived from the word obnubere, which means to veil. In the earliest times the veil was part of the married or espoused woman's dress, akin in form and purpose to the Eastern yashmak. But after the first few centuries it ceased to be worn by them, and the veiling came to be a symbolical act, making part of the marriage ceremony, and symbolising the woman's forsaking all others and keeping her charms for her husband alone, and also her being submissive to him. "Ideo velantur ut noverint se semper viris suis subditas esse" (Durand., Rat. Div. Off. lib. i. c. ix. 9). In the West the word velatio came to signify the whole marriage ceremony, and it became customary to lay the veil on both bride and bridegroom at the time of the benediction (Martene, de Ant. Eccl. 2, ix.).

4. The crowning was also originally a heathen custom (Euripides, Iphigenia in Aulide, l. 905), and was therefore at first disallowed by Christians (see Justin, Apol. c ix.; Tertull. Apolog. i. 42), but was soon permitted in the East (see Clement of Alexandria, Paedagog. ii. 8, for a discussion on the lawfulness of the use of crowns). The same custom prevailed among the Jews. The crowns were made of gold, silver, olive, myrtle, or flowers; their use in the city of Jerusalem was forbidden during the Roman siege, as being too great a sign of joy for such sad times. This shews that they were regarded as a symbol of rejoicing by the Jews; and as such probably they were adopted by the Christian Church, though they came to be looked upon rather as rewards for victory over passion and tokens of virgin purity, in consequence of which they were not given at second marriages. In the Greek church they came to play a much more important part than in the Latin. In the West as we learn from pope Nicholas's reply to the Bulgarians, they were no more than a festive ornament worn by the married pair on leaving the church. In the East the crowning, which was once only a part of a lady's wedding attire (see St. Amator's Life, Acta SS. May, tom. i. 52), became so substantial a part of the nuptials that the whole marriage was called the Crowning, as in the West it was called the Veiling. The crowns were placed on the heads of the bride and bridegroom immediately after the benediction, appropriate prayers being said at the same time. The following is an extract from a form given by Goar:—"After the amen (to the benedictory prayer) the priest takes the crowns and first crowns the bridegroom saying 'The servant of the Lord is crowned, for the sake of the handmaid of the Lord, in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost.' The woman is crowned in the same manner. Then he joins the right hand of the woman with the right hand of the man. Then is sung, 'With glory and honour hast thou crowned them, thou hast placed crowns of precious stones upon their heads.' Then the deacon says, 'Let us pray,' and the priest offers the following prayer: Crown them with Thy grace, unite them in temperance and dignity, bless them with a good old age and with unshaken faith. Grant them length of days; grant to them all things expedient for them, fear of Thee and thought of Thee; give them the fruit of the womb, comfort them with the sight of sons and daughters; let them rejoice in Thee and respect the words of the Apostle, 'Marriage is honourable and the bed undefiled.' Hear us, O Lord our God who wast present at Cana in Galilee and blessed the marriage there by Thy presence, miraculously changing the water into wine. O Lord of all, bless the marriage of this Thy servant and this Thy handmaid as Thou didst bless Abraham and Sarah: bless them as Isaac and Rebekah: bless them as Jacob and Rachel: crown them as Joseph and Asenath, as Moses and Sipphorah. May Thy eyes be upon them and Thy ears open to hear the voice of this prayer. May this be fulfilled to them that which is spoken by the Prophet, saying, 'Thy wife as the fruitful vine on the walls of thy house, thy children like olive branches round about thy table; behold thus shall the man be blessed that feareth the Lord'" (Euchologium, p. 398).

At the end of eight days the crowns were solemnly removed while the following prayers were used: "O Lord our God, who crownest the year with Thy blessing, and hast given these crowns to be placed upon the heads of those united to one another by the law of marriage, rewarding them thus for their continence, because they have come pure and clean to marriage instituted by Thee, do Thou bless their union, now that they lay aside their crowns, keep them inseparably united, that in everything they may give thanks to Thy most holy name, Father, Son, and Holy Spirit, now and ever, world without end, Amen. Peace be to all. Bend your heads to the Lord. O Lord, we glorify Thee, confirming the contract of Thy servant, and finishing the office of the marriage in Cana of Galilee, and taking off its symbols. Glory to the Father, Son, and Holy Ghost, now and ever, world without end, amen" (Goar, Euchologium, p. 400).

5. The marriage-pomp, another ceremony which, as we see from the law of Theodosius Junior above quoted, was so common as by some to be thought essential to the validity of nuptials, consisted partly of a procession which noisily conducted the bride to the bridegroom's house with torches and lanterns and shouting and songs, and partly of feasting, singing, and dancing in the house. The songs and dances, used both in the procession and at home, having come down by tradition from ancient heathen days, were of an immodest character, like the ἐπιθαλάμια and Fescennina of Greece and Rome (see the description given by St. Ambrose of Samson's wedding-feast, Exist. xix., Op. tom. ii. p. 846), and were therefore vehemently denounced by fathers of the church (see St. Chrysostom, Hom. xlviii. and lvi. in Genes.; Hom. xii. in 1 Cor., Op. tom. iv. pp. 490, 539, tom. x. p. 105), and by councils (see council of Laodicea, canons liii. liv., Hard. Concil. tom i. p. 790); though the festivity itself was not objected to. Gregory Nazianzen has left us a charming letter in which he excuses himself for not having been present at the festivities which accompanied Olympia's wedding on the ground that a gouty old gentleman was out of place among dancers, though in heart he joined with them in their amusements (Epist. lvii., Op. tom. i. p. 815). The expression "uxorem ducere" is derived from this fetching home of the wife.

6, 7. Two other ceremonies of slighter character have to be named. One was joining the hands of bridegroom and bride, to which we have seen Gregory Nazianzen referring (Epist. lvii.), as being done by himself, or one like himself, that is, a bishop or minister of the church; the other was untying the hair of the bride, which we may gather from Optatus (lib. vi. p. 95, Paris, 1702) was customary both in marriages and in devoting virgins to the service of God. At the same time that her hair was untied it is probable that the keys of the household were delivered to her (St. Ambr. Epist. vi. § 3, ad Sygarium, Op. tom. ii. p. 77).

We can now follow a primitive Christian through the different scenes of his marriage. As soon as, by the intervention of his friends and relations, he had fixed on a woman for his consort who was of marriageable age, and not too nearly akin to himself, nor disqualified for his wife by the enactments of any special law, and had gained her consent, and that of her parents or guardian, he announced his purpose to the officers of his church, and if they pointed out no obstacle arising from ecclesiastical or civil law, a day of betrothal was fixed. On the day appointed the parties met in the house of the future bride's father, in the presence of as many as ten witnesses, the bride being dressed in white (Clem. Alex. Paedag. iii. 11); and the man offered his arrhae, among which was a ring which he placed upon the third finger of the woman's left hand. These having been accepted, he proceeded to hand over to the father of his betrothed an instrument of dowry or marriage settlement, the delivery of which, after it had been read aloud, was testified by the witnesses present. The betrothal was now complete, but it was generally confirmed by a solemn kiss between the betrothed and a joining of hands. It is probable that an informal prayer for a blessing upon the couple completed the ceremony, and in the earliest times a veil was at this time assumed by the woman. The betrothal over, the man returned to his home, and the woman continued living under her father's roof, both of them bound to the other to fulfil a contract of marriage at some future time within the next forty days, or at furthest the two succeeding years, but holding communication with each other only through the best man and the bridesmaids, or other relatives and friends. At the time of betrothal the nuptial day was generally named, which might be at any season of the year except during Lent (Conc. Laod. can. liii.).[n]

When the wedding day had arrived each of the betrothed, accompanied by friends, proceeded to a church, where they were received by the priest for the solemnization of their marriage. The bride was arrayed in the veil, which she had worn since her betrothal, as she walked to church during the first two or three centuries (Tertull. de Cor. Mil. c. iv.; de Veland. Virg. cxi.), but after that time she received the veil from the priest's hands as part of the marriage ceremonial. The ceremony, or service as we may call it, commenced with prayers offered by the priest in behalf of the bridegroom and the bride, an offering in money being at the same time made by them. After this the free consent of each to the contract made between them was declared. The officiating minister then joined their hands, and (perhaps) placing his hand on their heads,[o] he uttered over them a form of benediction, conveying to them the blessing of the church upon the union which had been effected by the contract made and declared between them. Immediately after the benediction in the Greek church, at the conclusion of the whole service in the Latin, crowns of gold and silver, if the bride and bridegroom were rich, of leaves or flowers if they were poor, brought from the treasury of the church, were placed upon their heads, and arrayed in these, they returned to the house of the bride's father, from whence, as the evening approached, the wife was carried by her husband to his home in a joyous procession, attended by a concourse of friends uttering acclamations and wishing joy to the newly-married pair. On arriving at his home, the husband led in his wife, and she untied her hair as a symbol of his authority over her, and he delivered over to her a bunch of keys as a symbol of her authority over the household. The evening was spent in festivity, which consisted of feasting, dancing, and singing. At the end of seven days the crowns were restored to the church in a solemn manner.

[n] Lent was the only forbidden season. A supposed canon of the council of Lerida, in the 6th century, interdicting the celebration of marriages in Advent, in the three weeks preceding the Feast of John the Baptist, and in the period from Septuagesima to the octave of Easter, is spurious.

[o] Cui enim manum imponit Presbyter? Cui autem benedicet? (Clem. Alex. Strom. lib. iii. c. vi., Op. p.

If, however, there were any who desired that a religious character should not be given to the ceremony, they were permitted to dispense with it; and their marriage was regarded as valid provided only that they made a contract one with another without fraud or compulsion, and declared it before an adequate number of witnesses, and did not otherwise transgress the imperial laws.

III. DIVORCE. Our Lord's rule laid down in respect to divorce is plain and simple. He disallows it on any other ground than that of fornication or adultery on the part of the woman.[p] This continued to be the rule of Christian conduct down to the time of Constantine. There is a consensus amongst the doctors of the early church that no other cause is adequate for the dissolution of marriage. Thus, Clement of Alexandria (Strom. lib. ii. c. xxiii., Op. p. 506), Tertullian (adv. Marc., lib. iv. c. xxxiv., Op. p. 449), and somewhat later, St. Chrysostom (Hom. xvii. in Matt., Op. tom. vii. p. 227). St. Basil (Epist. Canon II., can. xxi.), and St. Jerome (Epist. ad Amand., Op. tom. iv. p. 162). In the case of the clergy divorce was made imperative on the discovery of the wife's adultery by the councils of Neocaesarea and Elvira (canons viii. and lxv.): laymen were left to their own judgment in the matter; but a canon of Theodore of Canterbury requires anyone who keeps his wife under such circumstances to do penance for two years on two days of the week and fast days, or to abstain from living with her as long as her penance for adultery lasts (Penitential, lib. i. cap. xiv. § 4). But, as was to be expected, a difference of opinion grew up as to the force of the word fornication. The Allegorists, according to their manner, insisted on understanding the word spiritually as well as literally, and thus they made it bear the meaning of idolatry, infidelity, and covetousness, as well as carnal fornication. So Hermae Pastor ("Is qui simulacrum facit moechatur," lib. ii. mand. iv., apud Patres Apostol., ed. Coteler, tom. i. p. 89). This view was adopted by St. Augustine (de Serm. Dom. in Monte, cap. xvi., Op. tom. iii. p. 1251, ed. Migne), but in his Retractations he expressed some doubt as to its correctness: "Quatenus intelligenda atque limitanda sit haec fornicatio, et utrum etiam propter hanc liceat dimittere uxorem, latebrosissima quaestio est" (lib. i. c. xix. 6, Op. tom. i. p. 66).

Such differences of opinion as existed between theologians arose from their interpreting the word fornication with greater or less latitude; but there was a substantial agreement among them that no crime, however heinous, could have the effect of dissolving the contract once formed, with the one exception of the wife's fornication. Not so the civil law.[q] Constantine appears to have wished to make a compromise between the lax practice which had come down from heathen times and the strict rule which had hitherto been acknowledged by Christians, though not always acted upon. Accordingly he passed a law, A.D. 331, allowing divorce to a wife if her husband should be a murderer, a poisoner, or a robber of graves; but specifically disallowing it on the ground of his being a drunkard or a gambler, or given to women (muliercularius). By the same law divorce was allowed to the man if his wife were an adulteress, or a poisoner, or a procurer (Cod. Theod. lib. iii. tit. xvi. leg. i., tom. i. p. 310). Honorius, A.D. 421, passed a law of a similar character with that of Constantine, which allowed other causes —"morum vitia et mediocres culpae"—as adequate besides the three named by the first Christian Emperor (Cod. Theod. lib. iii. tit. xvi. leg. 2, ibid. p. 313). Honorius's law did not remain long in force; but it, or Constantine's, was the law of the empire during the time of some of the chief church writers of the fourth and fifth centuries. It was abrogated, together with the law of Constantine, A.D. 439, by Theodosius Junior, who restored the laxity allowed by the civil law before the time of Constantine—"durum est legum veterum moderamen excedere." Ten years later, however, Theodosius found it necessary to draw the reign tighter, and he published a law, A.D. 449, enumerating the causes which were now held to be adequate to justify a divorce. To the three crimes named by Constantine he added those of treason, sacrilege, manstealing, and similar offences (Cod. Justin. lib. v. tit. xvii. leg. 8, Corp. Juris, tom. ii. p. 457). And this was followed 291). It is not certain that it is of the marriage benediction that Clement is speaking.

[p] That in Matt. v. 42, Πορνεία is used in the sense of μοιχεία, or rather that the generic term is employed when the specific word might have been used, was not questioned in the early church, nor is there any sufficient cause for questioning it, much as has been written upon it. (See Selden, Uxor Ebraica, iii. 23, 27.)

by a law of Valentinian III. forbidding dissolution of marriage by the mere consent of the parties concerned. Again reaction followed reaction. First, a law was passed by Anastasius, A.D. 497, making divorce by mutual consent legal (ibid. leg. 9). Next, Justinian. A.D. 528, recalled the second law of Theodosius Junior (that of the year A.D. 449), adding, however, to the causes there specified impotency lasting two years (ibid. leg. 10), or three years (Novell. xxii. 6), a desire for the monastic life (Novell. cxvii. 18), and a lengthy captivity (Novell. xxii. 7). Justinian's nephew, Justin, restored the liberty of divorce by consent (Novell. cxl.), and thus the law continued, as we learn from Photius (Nomocanon, tit. xiii. c. iv., Op. p. 200, Paris, 1620), to the year 870, and indeed to the year 900, when Leo the Philosopher once more replaced it on the footing in which it was under Justinian, before the alteration made by Justin.

The laws of the Western nations as they became christianised were similar in character to those of the empire. The Visigoths inserted into their code of laws, A.D. 460, the original rule of Christianity, such as it was before it was altered by Constantine (Leg. Visigoth. lib. iii. tit. vi. c. ii.), adding, however, that the wronged husband might do anything that he pleased with the adulteress and her paramour (ibid. tit. iv. c. iii.). Theodoric, king of the Ostrogoths in Italy, republished and confirmed with his authority, A.D. 500, the law of Constantine, allowing three causes of divorce, and three only, to the husband and to the wife. The Burgundians at the same date allowed divorce to the man for the causes specified by Constantine, but not to the woman. Among the Franks and the Alemanni divorce by mutual consent was permitted in the 7th century. At the Carlovingian era the law was generally made stricter, though Charles the Great himself divorced his wife Bertha and married Hildegard, holding himself to be in such matters above the laws. At the beginning of the 10th century Howel the Good, with three bishops, went to Rome "to consult the wise in what manner to improve the laws of Wales," and after the laws were drawn up "went a second time to Rome and obtained the judgment of the wise there, and ascertained those laws to be in accordance with the law of God and the law of countries and cities in the receipt of faith and baptism." Nevertheless the laws on divorce are remarkably lax. A husband and wife may separate before the end of seven years from their marriage-day on the husband's paying her dower to the woman; after seven years, on sharing their goods between them, the husband taking two-thirds of the children; but, "if a man deserts his wife unlawfully and takes another, the rejected wife is to remain in her house until the end of the ninth day; and then if she be suffered to depart entirely from her husband, everything belonging to her is to go in the first place out of the house, and then she is to go last out of the house after all her property: after that, on bringing the other into the house, he is to give a dilysdawd (certificate) to the first wife, because no man, by law, is to have two wives. Whoever shall leave his wife and shall repent leaving her, she having been given to another husband, if the first husband overtake her with one foot in the bed and the other out, the first husband, by law, is to have her." (Cyfreithiau H vel Ilda ar ddull Dyf. d, bk. ii c. xviii. §§ 1. 2, 28, 29, Haddan and Stubbs Councils of Great Britain, i. 247.)

As in marriage, so in divorce, St. Paul supplements the teaching of our Lord by stating the law in a case which must have soon arisen among the early Christians. In 1 Cor. vii. 12–16 he lays down the rule that a marriage that has taken place between two heathens is not to be broken off by one of the two becoming a Christian: the marriage still holds good, and the convert to Christianity may not separate from his or her consort on the plea of his infidelity. But if the non-Christian party to the contract chooses to desert the one converted to Christianity, the latter is free from the previously existing conjugal obligations. In this passage St. Paul does not justify divorce, but only a separation, in which the Christian convert is merely to be passive. In the early church the negative character of this permission was recognised;[r] in later times it has become changed into a positive right on the part of the convert, to be exercised at the discretion of the bishop, or rather it is declared a positive duty which must be performed by him, except a dispensation be obtained from the bishop (Liguori, Theologia Moralis, v. 957); and the meaning of "infidelity" is extended so as to include "heresy" (ibid. iii. 17). The modern Latin law of divorce, which allows four causes of divorce quoad vinculum (death, conversion, preference of monastic life, papal dispensation), and six causes of divorce quoad torum (adultery, ill-treatment, solicitation to heresy, leprosy, supervenient heresy, mutual consent) (Liguori, Theologia Moralis, vi. 957–975)—has only to be mentioned here in order to say that it was unknown to the early church.

Form of Divorce.—The Jews had a ceremonial of divorce as well as of marriage. The following are formulas given by Selden (Uxor Ebraica, iii. 24, Op. tom. iv. p. 797):—

"You may go to what man you will. This is a bill of divorce between me and thee; a letter of quittance, and instrument of dismissal, so you may marry whom you please."

"On such a day, of such a month, of such a year, I, such an one, son of such an one, from such a place, and by whatever other name or surname I, or my parent or my birthplace, are known by, of my own will and purpose, and without compulsion, dismiss, quit, repudiate thee, such an one, daughter of such an one, from such a place, and by whatever other name or surname thou, or thy parent, or thy birthplace art known by, who up to this time hast been my wife. And now I dismiss, quit, and repudiate thee that thou be free, and have the power of going away and marrying any other man. And no one on earth is to hinder thee from this day forward for ever. And now, behold, thou art permitted to be the wife of any man. And this is to be thy bill of divorce, the instrument of thy dismissal, and the letter of thy quittance, according to the law of Moses and the Israelites."

[r] The author of the commentary that goes under the name of St. Ambrose, appears to have been the first to argue that the believer from whom his unbelieving consort had departed might marry again. If those who were separated from their wives by Ezra, he urged, might marry again, how much more those whose marriages had been dissolved by the infidelity of their consorts (Pseudo-Ambrose in 1 Cor. vii. 15)! Theodore of Canterbury ruled at the end of the 7th century, "If the wife is an unbeliever and a heathen, and cannot be converted, let her be dismissed" (Penitential, lib. ii. c. xii. § 18). If a husband and wife have separated while still heathens, and then been converted to Christianity, the same authority rules that the man may do as he pleases as to taking or leaving his wife (ibid. § 17).

The above bills had to be signed by two witnesses and formally delivered to the wife or her proctor.

The Greek and Latin formulas were much shorter: It was only necessary to say, Γύναι πράττε τὰ σά—Ἀνὲρ, πράττε τὰ σά: or Τὰ σεαυτῆς πράττε—Τὰ σεαυτοῦ πράττε—and the Greek marriage was broken off. The Roman marriage was a more serious thing than that of any of the Greeks except the Spartans. To break off a marriage effected by confarreatio there was a form called diffarreatio, and a marriage by coemptio was dissolved by a form called remancipatio. For a length of time divorces were not heard of among the Romans; but under the empire they became common. Sometimes the nuptial tablets were broken and the key of the house taken from the woman, but the most significant part of the proceedings was the use of the form of the words:—"Tuas res tibi habeto" (Plautus, Amphitryon, act iii. sc. 2), or "Tuas res agito." Espousals were broken off by the formula:—"Conditione tuâ non utar." And the Lex Julia de adulteriis required the presence of seven witnesses to make a divorce valid. The early Christians followed for the most part the Roman practice; but as the marriage was contracted in the face of the church, so also the divorce might not be effected without the church's cognisance. We have already seen that the council of Agde, A.D. 506, excommunicates the man who presumed to dismiss his wife until he has proved her guilt before the bishop of the province in which he lived (can. xxv., Hard. Concil. tom. ii. p. 1001).

Remarriage after divorce.—The distinction between separation a mensâ et thoro and divorce a vinculo (the last of which alone qualifies for remarriage) was not formulated in the early church: and this is perhaps one reason why the imperial laws passed so readily, as by the swing of a pendulum, from severity to laxity, and from laxity to severity. There are fewer canons of councils bearing upon the question of remarriage after divorce than might have been expected. In the Apostolical Constitutions (lib. vi. c. 17), and in the so-called fourth council of Carthage, A.D. 398 (can. lxix.), the clergy are forbidden to be married to a divorced woman, which implies that under some circumstances at least a divorced woman might be married. In the Apostolical Canons, indeed, there appears a rule forbidding a man who has divorced his wife to marry again, and forbidding marriage to a divorced woman on pain of excommunication (can. xlviii.); but this canon is commonly understood to refer only to men who had illegally put away their wives, or to women who had illegally separated from their husbands. (See Balsamon's exposition, In Canon. Apostol. p. 258, Paris, 1620.) At the council of Arles, A.D. 314, it was enacted that young men who had put away their wives for adultery should be advised not to marry again as long as their first wife was living, but no yoke of compulsion was laid upon them (can. x.). The council of Elvira, about the same date, decreed that a woman who had separated from her husband without cause and had married again should be for ever excommunicated; and that a woman who had separated from her husband on the ground of his adultery, and had married again, should not be received to communion until her first husband was dead; and that a woman who had married a man that had separated from his wife without cause should be for ever excommunicated (cans. viii. ix. x.). The last of these canons implies that the man who separates from her with sufficient cause might marry again. Tertullian dissuades remarriage in all cases, but in his treatise addressed to his wife he allows that it is lawful after death or divorce (Ad Uxor. ii. 1). In his treatise on Monogamy he declares marriage after divorce unlawful (c. xi.) Lactantius holds remarriage permissible in the husband who has dismissed his wife for adultery (Inst. vi. 23). Remarriage in the man is by implication permitted by the council of Vannes, A.D. 465 (can. ii., Hard. Concil. tom. ii. p. 797). Origen (in opposition to the opinion of some of his contemporaries) and St. Jerome declare it not permissible in the woman (Orig. Com. in Matt. xiv. 23, Op. tom. iii. p. 347; Hieron. Epist. ad Amand., Op. tom. iv. p. 162). Elsewhere St. Jerome pronounces against it in both parties (see in Matt. xix. 9, Op. tom. iv. p. 87). Athenagoras disallows it altogether (Legat. c. xxxiii.). Pope Innocent I. in his letter to Exuperius condemns it in both parties (Hard. Concil. tom. i. p. 1005). At the second council of Milevis, A.D. 416, it was forbidden to both parties (can. xvii., ibid. p. 1220); and at a council of Carthage of the year 407, from which the prohibition was adopted as the rule of the African church (Cod. Eccles. Afric. can. cii.) The prohibition was repeated by a council of Nantes, of uncertain date, supposed by some to have been held in the year 658 (can. xii., Hard. Concil. tom. vi. p. 459), by the council of Herudford (Hertford) under archbishop Theodore, A.D. 673,[a] (cap. x., ibid. tom. iii. p. 1017), by the capitulary of Aix, A.D. 789 (cap. xliii., ibid. tom. iv. p. 836), and by the council of Friuli, A.D 791 (can. x., ibid. tom. iv. p. 859). The prohibitory rule is enforced by Hermae Pastor (lib. ii. mand. iv. tom. i. p. 87, ed. Coteler), St. Chrysostom (Hom. in Matt. xvii. Op. tom. vii. p. 227), St. Basil (Moralia, Reg. lxxiii. 1, Op. tom. ii. p. 494, Paris, 1637). St. Augustine speaks with hesitation (De Fide et Oper. c. xix., Op. tom. vi. p. 221). Epiphanius declares that the Word of God does not condemn a man who marries again after having separated from a wife proved guilty of adultery, fornication, or any such base guilt (Haer. lix. 4). Theodore's Penitential allows a husband's remarriage if the woman was his first wife, and permits the wife's remarriage, on her repentance, after five years (lib. ii. cap. xii. § 5). Elsewhere he orders that a man who divorces his wife and marries again shall do seven years' severe penance or fifteen years' light penance (lib. i. cap. xiv. § 8). If we are to reconcile these two rulings, we must suppose that in the latter case is meant a man who has divorced his wife for some less offence than fornication. If a wife leaves her husband, and he thereupon remarries, he is to do one year's penance; if she returns to the husband whom she had left, having lived innocently meantime, she is also to do one year's penance; if she does not return, she is to do three years' penance (ibid. § 13). If a wife haughtily refuses to be reconciled with her husband, after five years he may marry again with the bishop's leave (lib. ii. cap. xii. § 19).

The civil law permitted remarriage. A law of Honorius enacts that if a woman put away her husband for grave reasons, she might marry after five years; and that a man in like case might marry as soon as he thought proper; if the reasons for the divorce were of a less grave character, the man must wait for two years before taking another wife; if he had no reasons he might not marry again, but the injured woman might remarry after the lapse of a year (Cod. Theod lib. iii. tit. xvi. leg. 2). See also the Codex Justinianus, lib. v. tit. xvii. legg. 8, 9. The laws of Ethelbert, established in the time of Augustine for England, A.D. 597, enact with great simplicity that an adulterer is "to provide another wife with his own money" for the injured husband, "and bring her to him" (Doom xxxi. Haddan and Stubbs, Councils of Great Britain, iii. p. 45).

The general conclusion that we arrive at from a review of the documents and authorities of the early church is that while the remarriage of the guilty party was sternly and uncompromisingly condemned, there was no consensus on the question of the lawfulness or unlawfulness of the remarriage of the innocent party. After a time an ever-widening divergence exhibited itself on this point, as on others, in the practice and teaching of the eastern and western divisions of the church. Eastern theology at length framed for itself rules shortly expressed in the following canons, found in the synodical decisions of Alexius, who was patriarch of Constantinople in the beginning of the 11th century:—

"1. No clergyman is to be condemned for giving the benediction at the marriage of a divorced woman, when the man's conduct was the cause of the divorce.

"2. Women divorced by men whose conduct has been the cause of the divorce are not to be blamed if they choose to marry again, nor are the priests to be blamed who give them the benediction. So, too, with regard to men.

"3. Whoever marries a woman divorced for adultery is an adulterer, whether he has himself been married before or not, and he must undergo the adulterer's penance.

"4. Any priest who gives the benediction at the second marriage of parties divorced by mutual consent (which is a thing forbidden by the laws) shall be deprived of his office" (see Selden, Uxor Ebraica, iii. 32, Op. tom. iv. p. 855).

The teaching embodied in these canons and the practice founded upon it has continued to be the teaching and the practice of the Oriental church to the present day. In the East, therefore, the once doubtful question of the legality of the remarriage of the innocent party after divorce has been resolved in the affirmative sense; in the Latin church it has been determined in the negative, except when a papal dispensation has intervened, which, according to modern Roman theology makes all things possible and allowable. In England the law of the land permits the remarriage of both parties when a divorce has been judicially declared; but having regard to the consciences of the clergy of the church, in whose eyes the remarriage of the guilty party would be presumably a wrong act, it does not require that the ceremony of the second nuptials should be performed by them.

MARRIAGE (IN ART). The form of treatment, or the amount of notice, which the Christian rite of marriage received from the artists of the primitive church varied with the view taken of the solemn union of man and woman by her authorities. The ascetic principle, which had almost entirely prevailed in the Eastern world, began to influence Italy and Europe almost as powerfully after the sack of Rome by Alaric. It need not be connected in our minds with misanthropy, the desire for power, or any equivocal motive; it was related more closely to terror at the wickedness, distress, and degradation of the present world, with the desire of escape from some of its dangers, and especially, as a consequence of these sufferings, with the hope of the speedy coming of Christ to judgment, and the end of the world. That this had a direct effect on art is proved by the number of mosaic pictures, in particular, which direct the thoughts of the worshipper to the scenery of the Apocalypse, the symbolic or trance-seen manifestations of the coming of the Son of Man; or image forth His glory in Heaven, contrasted in the same picture with His presence as the Lamb of Sacrifice among men on this side of Jordan, and in the wilderness of the world. It might be expected accordingly that such works of art as either represent or commemorate the marriage of Christian persons would chiefly or entirely be confined to the first four or five centuries, at least in Italy. The monuments or relics connected with marriage seem to be of two kinds; either cups, glasses, signets, or other memorials of the union of the parties, or sepulchral effigies commemorative of the marriage bond as perfected and completed, by their death in wedlock. The earliest of these latter which we possess is the tomb of Probus and Proba, early in the latter half of the 4th century. The fragments of cups and platters have principally been found in catacombs or tombs of early date; and as it seems agreed that the catacombs were never used for fresh burials after the taking of Rome by Alaric, and with less frequency for some time before that event, these relics cannot be later than the 4th century. [See GLASS, CHRISTIAN, note [r], p. 734.] That few or none of them are earlier or later than the 4th century (unless certain Greek forms be excepted) seems highly probable.

Taking these memorial glasses first, there are two given by Martigny (Dict. p. 388) from Garrucci's Vetri, &c. trovati ne' cimiteri dei primitivi Cristiani, tav. xxvi. 11, 12, (see woodcut, No. 1), which seem to indicate the ritual of Christian marriage in the earliest times. The parties stand side by side with joined hands; or rather the husband takes the right hand of the wife in his, as if in the act of plighting troth. Martigny refers to Tobit vii. 13 on this point, but that passage describes the action of a father in giving his daughter away to her husband. There is exact resemblance between the action of the two figures, and that of Hercules taking the hand of Minerva, on a heathen glass given in Buonarotti, Vetri, tav. xxvii.; Garrucci, tav. xxxv.[t] Above the figures is the monogram of our Lord to indicate wedlock in Him. The crown of marriage sometimes takes the place of the monogram, as in fig. 11, pl. xxvi. (see Tertullian, de Corona, xiii. "coronant nuptiae sponsos;" and in other cases the symbolism is completed by a figure of Christ placing the crown on their heads (woodcut, No. 2). Inscriptions are frequent on these glasses, arranged round the figures (see ibid.) giving their names, with "Vivatis in Deo," or some other words of blessing.

A rolled paper or volume is sometimes placed near the bride, and is thought to refer to the dower. See Garrucci, tav. xxvii. 1; Tertullian, ad Uxor. ii. 3, "tabulae nuptiales." The bride stands on her husband's right invariably. She is not veiled, and is richly dressed and ornamented, perhaps in remembrance of Ps. xlv. 10, 14, 15. As to the veil, see MARRIAGE, p. 1108, and VEIL. He further mentions an interesting relic figured in P. Mozzoni's Tavole Cronologiche della storia della Chiesa, Venice, 1856–63, suec. iv. p. 47. It is a small chest belonging to a lady's wardrobe, with heathen figures carved on it, accompanied nevertheless by the upright monogram, combined thus, A☧ω with the A and ω, and the motto SECVNDE ET PROJECTA VIVATIS IN CHR. It may have been a wedding present. A gold medal at sec. v., p. 55 (a volume of this work is assigned to each century), is said to have been struck at the marriage of Marcianus and Pulcheria. They are represented with nimbi, the figure of the Lord above with the cruciform nimbus, and the legend FELICITER NUBTIIS surrounds the device.

II. As memorials of the family, a number of gilded glass vessels and devices are in existence, which appear to represent deceased heads of families; often with their children (Buonarotti, tav. xxiii. xxvi. &c.; Garrucci, xxx.) or crowned by the Lord (xxix. 1). These were probably used at agapae, and indicate a connexion or relation between the Christian and the ethnic funeral feast. Engraved stones and rings are common; one from P. Lupi (Severae Martyris Epitaph. p. 64. 1) represents two fishes embracing an anchor, which may or may not symbolise a Christian pair.

But our chief examples are found on sarcophagi. That of Probus and Proba has been mentioned, and will be found in Bottari, tav. xvi. (Aringhi, vol. i. p. 283). It represents the wedded pair with an aspect of deep distress, as in the act of parting.

The sarcophagus of Valeria Latobia (p. 291) has two figures bearing the same aspect; at least, if Bosio's draughtsmen are to be trusted, Valeria is taking her husband's hand by the wrist (reversing the ordinary action) as if bidding him farewell. They are separated by an object, which may be taken for three large rolls of paper or parchment bound together, and the husband carries the usual volumen also. Aringhi thinks they represent the scriptures. Martigny thinks the smaller roll is the consular mappa.

The dolphins on the tomb of Valeria are probably symbolic of affection, and the turtle-doves or other birds in the spandrels of the small arches on that of Probus and Proba may have the same meaning. See St. Ambrose (de Abrah. ii. c. 8, 53), with reference to Luke ii. 22 sqq. "duos pullos columbarum quod in columba spiritalis gratia sit, in turture incorruptae generationis natura, vel immaculata corporis castimonia."

Martigny mentions a marble sarcophagus, carved apparently on the same principle of composition as the last-mentioned, of dividing the front by pillars into arched recesses, where the spaces are filled by figures of the different ages of a soldier, and of his courtship and marriage. It was discovered at Arles in 1844. (See Bulletin de l'Institut de Corresp. Archéol. an 1844, p. 12 sqq.) It is in good classical style, and might be taken for a heathen monument, if the miracle of the loaves were not sculptured on the sides. This may be a Christian addition made to an antique sarcophagus, and doves and fruits are also found on the ornamental carvings.

For children and domestic scenes on the glass and gold cups, see Garrucci, Vetri, tav. xxix. 45, xxxii. 11, 2, 3, xxxi. 4. Lesson learning is going on in xxix. 4; and in xxxii. 1 a mother offers her breast to her child. [R. St. J. T.]

MARTYR. The Greek word μάρτυς signifies one who has such immediate knowledge of past events as is derived from actual participation in them, and does not keep this knowledge to himself, but makes deposition of it freely as a freeman, and makes it his μαρτυρία or evidence, the knowledge being such as to constitute a μαρτύριον, or testimony, as affecting a question not only of facts but of merits.

I. i. The history of the Christian modification of the term is as follows: (a) The office of public, oral, ocular testimony was insufficiently discharged till the testimony was recorded, as the sentence against Christ had been passed, in a court of law. The word is used specially for such official testimony, of Stephen (Acts xxii. 20), of Paul at Rome (Acts xxiii. 11, 1 Tim. ii. 6), of James (Heges. ap. Eus. ii. 23), of Peter and Paul (Clem. Rom. 5), of John (Polycrates ap. Eus. H. E. v. 24).

(b) The idea of martyrdom at first was not of maltreatment, but of a perilous dignity. The witnesses won their title of honour by courage without suffering. The title was co-ordinate with bishop and teacher (Polycr. ap. Eus. H. E. v. 24), and prophet (Eus. H. E. v. xviii. 7). The typical instances are the grandsons of Jude, who were accused before Domitian and released unscathed, and took the lead ever after in the churches as martyrs (Hegesipp. ap. Eus. H. E. iii. 20, 32).

(c) The martyrs would have been mere confessors, not witnesses, but that they "endured as seeing Him who is invisible." Thus they not only "confessed," but "witnessed the good confession." The confessors were "the companions of the martyrs" (Bullettini, 1864, p. 25). "Confession," says Clement of Alexandria, "is possible for all; the grace of testifying by speech is only given to some" (Strom. iv. 9). Steadfastness under torture was the testimony to which the advocates of Christianity appealed. It was needful that the honours and authority of martyrdom should not be won too easily. Hence, not merely peril, but actual suffering became indispensable to constitute martyrdom. Those, for instance, who had been condemned to the quarries were honoured as martyrs (Philosophumena, ix. 12; Tert. de Pudicit. 22).

(d) Bloodshedding (Clem. Alex. Strom. iv. 4), instead of speech, became the mode of the testimony. "The custom of the brotherhood," says Origen (in Joann. ii. 28, t. iv. p. 88, cf. Cypr. Epp. x. 2, xxviii. 1, xxxvi. 2), "calls those alone properly martyrs who have testified to the mystery of godliness by the shedding of their own blood." This public testimony, expressed not in words, but in blood, was far more than testimony; it was martyrdom.

(e) Many Christian Virginias and Lucretias committed suicide to escape the brutal lusts of their persecutors. They are extolled as martyrs by Eusebius and Chrysostom (Eus. H. E. viii. 12, 14; Chrys. T. 1, Hom. 40). Augustine pronounces the practice unlawful, unless instigated by a special revelation (De Civitate Dei, I. xvi.–xxv. 30–39).

(f) Martyrs were made by popular riots and lynch law, without any judicial proceedings (Eus. H. E. vi. 41).

(g) It was once a complaint "Martyrio meo privor, dum morte praevenior" (Cypr. de Mortalitate, p. 167, ed. Oxon.), and this applied even to deaths in prison before the case was heard. There seem to have been cases of suicide in gaol to avoid torture (Tertullian, de Jejunio, c. 12). But the names of those who died in prison were recorded in A.D. 177 (Eus. H. E. v. 4), and in Africa, in A.D. 202 (Acta Perpetuae, c. 14), and they are expressly reckoned as martyrs by Cyprian (Ep. 12 (37)).

(h) Flight from persecution, though reprobated by Tertullian (de Fugâ), was enjoined by Christ (Matt. x. 23), and the Apostolic Constitutions (v. 3, cf. viii. 45) recommend the fugitives as deserving the same care as the martyrs in gaol. Those who perished in the hardships of their flight were recognised by Cyprian as martyrs, whose martyrdom was witnessed by Christ (Ep. lviii. (lvi.), c. 4).

(i) The death of the Innocents murdered by Herod was regarded as an active martyrdom, "testimonium Christi sanguine litavere" (Tert. in Valentin. c. 2), "martyria fecerunt" (Cypr. Ep. viii. 6). The recognition of it as such was closely connected with the sanction of infant baptism (Cypr. Ep. lxiv. (lix.)).

(k) Athanasius recognises as martyrs those who fell at the hands of the Arians. (Ath. ad Mon. p. 277.)

(l) In A.D. 368 some Christians, put to death for railing an officer of Valentinian's to justice, were celebrated as martyrs. The testimony of Ammianus Marcellinus (xxvii. 7) to this fact is most explicit and circumstantial, though absurdly derided by Gibbon. So Augustine (in Psalm. 140, c. 26) calls John Baptist a martyr to truth and justice.

(m) Augustine says one becomes a martyr on a sick bed by refusing to be cured by magic (Serm. 286, c. 28; cf. Serm. 318).

(n) Augustine says again, You will go hence a martyr if you have overcome all the temptations of the devil (Serm. 4, c. 4).

(o) Readiness for martyrdom is regarded as itself martyrdom (Chrys. ii. 601, ed. Migne).

ii. We have traced the change of the meaning of the word from witness to martyr. As a title of honour among the Christians, the term was adopted into Latin along with Christianity. In the languages of Oriental Christendom it is represented by some native equivalent that has undergone a like change of meaning. The testimony of innocence and endurance was transfigured into the "peace, and grace, and glory" of martyrdom. What this meant and was, may be seen in the acts of the martyrs of Vienne and Lyons (Eus. H. E. V. i.), and of Perpetua. Martyrdom could not be perfect while the martyr still lived in the flesh. This was dimly apprehended by Ignatius, and was clearly grasped by the Lyonnese confessors. (Eus. H. E. V. ii.) To their brethren they seemed martyrs many times over; they themselves declined the title. "They are already martyrs whom Christ the Veritable Martyr has taken to Himself: we are confessors mean and lowly." The line was not immediately and universally drawn where they drew it. They themselves, though declining the title, exercised the prerogatives of martyrs. In Cyprian's time the lapsed went round to the martyrs everywhere, and corrupted the confessors too (Cypr. Epp. 20), and therefore Cyprian wrote to the martyrs and confessors (Epp. 10, 15). A martyr as distinct from a confessor was one who had shed his blood, and could grant absolution. But in Rome the title was by that time limited to the dead. (Cypr. Epp. 28, 37.) Cyprian usually conforms to Roman usage (cf. Epp. 22, 27, 66), though at the close of his days he wrote to the martyrs in the mines (Ep. 76). "What martyr," asks Tertullian, "is a denizen of the world, a suppliant for a shilling, at the mercy of the usurer or the physician?" (Tert. de Pudic. c. 22.)

The first great interruption of the peace of the church in the 3rd century seems to have fixed the title to the departed, namely, Maximin's persecution in Rome, those of Decius and Valerian in Africa.

By the beginning of the 4th century the limitation of the term martyr to the defunct seems to have been quite established, though it is just possible to doubt whether in writing "A whole choir of martyrs greets you at once," St. Lucian (A.D. 312) means to convey a salutation from his fellow prisoners, or the tidings of an auto da fé. He adds that Anthimus has been consummated in the course of martyrdom (Routh, Reliquiae, iv. p. 5). Death, the consummation of martyrdom, was already regarded as the consummation of the martyr. After the triumph of the church under Constantine, "living martyr" became an oxymoron. Yet Gregory Nazianzen in the oration (no. xx) in which he so uses the phrase, speaks of Basil being gathered as "a martyr to the martyrs," though it was only his whole life that was his martyrdom.

Before the close of the 4th century the Pagan Latin historian Ammianus Marcellinus (xxii. 17) says: "Those who when subjected to compulsion to make them deviate from religion have endured torture and persevered to a glorious death with faith unbroken, now are called martyrs." Elsewhere he explains the term to signify "divinitati acceptos" (Amm. Marc. xxvii. 7).

iii. Limitations of the title.

(1) Heretics were excluded. Martyrs were at first of any sect that suffered for the name of Christ. The early Gnostics declined martyrdom (Revelation ii. 14, 15; Tertullian, Scorpiace, i.; Epiphanius, Hist. Haer. xxiv. 4; Clem. Strom. iv. 4), saying that the martyrs died for Simon of Cyrene. But the Marcionites (Eus. Mart. Pal. 10) and the Montanists courted it. Apollinaris of Hierapolis tells that in his time Catholic martyrs refused communion with Montanists to the last (Eus. H. E. v. 16). Compare Const. Apost. v. 9.

(2) Schismatics were excluded. Cyprian (de Unitate, c. 14) says, He cannot be a martyr who is not in the church. So the Roman confessors (Cypr. Ep. 36). Augustine says, Outside the church you will be punished everlastingly though you have been burnt alive for the name of Christ (Ep. 173 (204), c. 6).

(3) Self-sought martyrdom was not allowed as such. Such a would-be martyr lapsed at the time of Polycarp's martyrdom (Mart. Polyc. c. 4). Clemens Alexandrinus speaks of self-surrender as heretical, and founded on disbelief in the Creator (Strom. iv. 4). There were instances in which it was justified (Tertullian, ad Scapulam, 5; Acta Theodoti, Ruinart), and some such martyrs, e.g. Euplius and Eulalia, were most celebrated. Ensebius approved the practice (Mart. Pal. 3; H. E. vii. 12). But Mensurius of Carthage (Aug. Brevicul. collat. diei III. xiii. 25) and Peter of Alexandria (Canon ix.; Routh, iv. 32) forbade it.

(4) Iconoclasm (without imperial fiat) was disapproved by the teachers of the church. The 60th canon of Illiberis states, If any break idols and be slain on the spot, as it is not written in the gospel, nor found to have been done under the apostles, he is not to be received into the number of the martyrs. The 41st canon even allows the faithful to have idols in their houses if they fear that their slaves would offer violence in case of their removal.

(5) Individual scruples were refused recognition. Resistance to the obligations of military service, (which was the ground of the martyrdom of Maximilian in Mauritania in A.D. 296: see his Acts in Ruinart,) is made a bar to communion by the third canon of the 1st council of Aries.

(6) "Martyrem non facit poena sed causa." The conception that suffering is martyrdom is implied in the practice of the Donatists of offering themselves to armed wayfarers, and demanding with terrible threats the stroke of martyrdom (Aug. Ep. 185 (50); T. ii. coll. 7, 8). But this was disapproved by others of their number (Aug. Ep. 204 (61); T. ii. col. 940).

iv. Those who were arrested and not yet heard in court were called martyrs designate (Tertullian ad Martyres). Those of whose firmness their brethren were not quite confident are named by Tertullian uncertain martyrs (Tert. de Jejunio, c. 12).

v. The later Greeks adopt a classification of martyrs into various classes.

Hieromartyrs are the martyrs of the clergy.

Hosiomartyrs are martyred monks.

Megalomartyrs are the martyrs of the soldiery.

Parthenomartyrs are virgin martyrs.

Anargyri, the title of the twin physicians Cosmas and Damian, is extended to Sergius and Bacchus, and to John and Cyrus, two similar pairs.

We find the term megalomartyr in Theophylact Simocatta (v. 14). Some trace of such classification appears in Polycrates ap. Eus. H. E. v. 24.

II. Laws under which the Christians suffered.—(1) General. In ancient civilisation idolatry was almost inseparable from daily life. Education (Tertullian, de Idololatriâ, c. 10), commerce (ib. c. 11), public amusements (ib. c. 13), marriages, funerals, social intercourse (c. 16), domestic service (c. 17), state affairs (c. 18), military duty (c. 19), all involved idolatry. The Jews, indeed, had dealings with the Gentiles everywhere and kept clear of idolatry. Hence, while the only intolerance shewn to other religions was an occasional attempt to keep the worship of Isis outside the walls of Rome (Dio, liv. 6, Val. Max. I. iii.), Judaism was detested, and all the charges rebutted by Tertullian from the Christians, secret enormities (Tert. Apol. 7–9), impious atheism (ib. 10–28), disaffection to the empire (ib. 29–35), enmity to mankind (ib. 36–41), laziness (ib. 42–46), priestcraft (ib. 46–49), are brought also as calumnies against the Jews (Tac. Hist. V. 4, 5; Juv. Sat. xiv. 96 ff.). Besides disbelief in the gods led easily to sacrilege (Acts xix. 37; Rom. ii. 32), a charge not brought against the Christians. (Tert. Apol. 41.) Yet the Jews were tolerated, were protected in the observance of their code, exempted from civil action on the Sabbath, excused from adoring the image of the emperor, and even permitted to make proselytes. Enactments in their favour are collected by Josephus (Ant. Jud. xvi. vi.).

Stringent as were the Roman laws against treason, a crime into which words as well as acts might be interpreted—especially any disrespect to the emperor's images—and which rendered all ranks alike liable to torture (Paul. Sent. v. xxix.; Sueton. Octav. 27; Amm. Marcell. xxix. 12; Arnob. iv. 24; Digest. xlviii. iv.), the only acts of the Christians which could be construed as treasonable were such as were freely permitted to the Jews. The example of Joseph might encourage either Christian or Jew to swear by the life of Caesar. (Tert. Apol. 32.) They could plead that to call him a god before his death would be ill-omened (ib. 34).

Again, meetings for worship might be construed as treasonable (see Digest. xlvii. xxii. 2, xlviii. iv. 1), and were at any rate strictly illegal, even in fulfilment of a vow, and even for veterans, unless express imperial or senatorial sanction for them were producible (Sueton. Julius, 42; Octav. 32; Digest, iii. iv.; xlvii. xi. 3, xxii.), and the old laws against even private worship of gods unrecognised by the state (Cic. de Leg. ii. 8) were not quite extinct (Tac. Ann. xiii. 32); but Jewish worship, public or private, had sanction.

The formation of guilds and clubs was strictly forbidden by Trajan (Plin. Ep. x. 42, 43, 97). Afterwards it was more and more frequently permitted to the lower classes for one special purpose, the burial of the dead. These guilds had a common chest like little commonwealths, and an agent, called an actor or syndic, who appeared for them in any legal disputes (Dig. iii. iv. 1). All the functions of the church were permitted to them, as the church is described by Tertullian. "Approved elders preside. Everyone brings a little sum on a certain day in the month, or when he pleases, and only if he pleases, and only if he can. From this stock payments are made, not for feasts, but for support and burial of the poor and of destitute orphans and bedridden old people and shipwrecked sailors and convicts in the mines or islands or jails" (Tert. Apol. 39). This was only illegal because senatorial sanction was requisite in each case.

Witchcraft was a capital crime by Jewish law. Roman procedure varied, for people of that sort were always being forbidden and always being retained (Tac. Hist. i. 22). "Burn him alive" is the outcry of the rabble in Lucian's Asinus, c. 54, but the law given by Paulus (Sent. V. xxiii. 17) decreeing this death for the wizards and crucifixion or the beasts for their accomplices may be later. Death or banishment is the penalty that we find historically in the 1st century (Tac. Ann. ii. 32, xii. 52; Dio, lvii. 15; Juv. Sat. vi. 660 ff.). Supposed possession of magical powers was enough to make a humble individual formidable and culpable for treason.

Any departure from the ordinary reverence for the gods might easily be linked with an attempt to turn the gods into slaves. Two main branches of supernatural art, astrology and exorcism, were largely in Jewish hands, and Moses was reputed to have been a mighty wizard.

Any new superstition was looked upon as a school of magic – "Magi estis quia novum nescio quod genus superstitionis inducitis" (Acta Achatii, § 7, Ruinart). Otherwise works of beneficence would rather lead the rabble to regard the wonder-worker as a god than as a wizard. Busy slander might produce a revolution of feeling, but to all supernatural pretensions, magisterial scepticism had a ready answer, the doom of death.

(2) Special. Thus far we have reviewed the first part only of the laws against the Christians, namely the previously existing legal principles that could be turned against them by "unjust disputations of the juris-consults." These charges of impiety, foreign superstitions, treason, unlawful assemblage, magic, appear to M. Le Blant sufficient to explain all the persecutions. But Lactantius (Instit. Div. v. 11) tells us that Ulpian also collected in the first book of his last work, De Offi·io Proconsulis, another set of laws, which the very nature of the case and the whole tenor of the acts of the martyrs and of the writings of the apologists prove to have existed, the "sacrilegious constitutions" and "nefarious rescripts" of the emperors directly censuring it.

It was indeed necessary in order to bring the principles which are specified above into play against the Christians, that there should be authoritative definitions, distinguishing Christianity from the lawful religion of Judaism, and refusing it sanction for its rites or concessions to its scruples. It was needful that the various suspicions of guilt which could not be urged against the same act under different laws, without transgressing a principle of jurisprudence (Digest, XLVIII. ii. 14), should all be brought under one head, and summed up into a single crime.

(a) If we inquire when Christianity was first made criminal, the answer of antiquity is unanimous. In A.D. 64, his mistress, Poppaea, being a Jewish proselyte (Jos. Ant. Jud. xxviii. 11; cf. Tac. Ann. xiii. 45, xv. 6), Nero had made Rome a very Sodom, when a fiery doom fell. The flames spared the Jewish quarter across the Tiber, so, as culprits were wanted in order to remove the suspicion from Nero himself, the conflagration was charged on members of the new sect, who confessed and betrayed the names of others. Then a decree of the emperor, probably also of the obsequious and not reluctant senate, made the profession of Christianity a crime, supposed to imply enmity to the human race, and sentenced to be visited with death, by beasts, crosses, flames, or novel horrors invented on purpose.[a] Their deaths were turned to sport, and Nero gave his own gardens for the show (Tac. Ann. xv. 44; Sulpicius, Hist. ii. 41; Tert. Apol. 5). We have no hint of any opportunity of pardon on recantation, for those once arrested. The persecution was extended to the provinces (cf. 1 Pet. iv. 12-19), and even a civis Romanus ingenuus like Paul was beheaded (Tertullian, Scorpiace, 15).

The Neronian persecution has only left us two certain names of martyrs, Peter and Paul, of each of whom their disciple, Clement, says emphatically, ἐμαρτύρησεν (c. 5), while of the other victims murdered by Nero he only says that they suffered unhallowed outrages (c. 6). "Guilty as the Christians were," says Tacitus (l. c.), "pity for them arose." Yet on Nero's death, when all his other constitutions were cancelled, we are told that this decree against the Christians alone remained ("permansit erasis omnibus hoc solum institutum Neronianum," Tertull. ad Nationes, i. 7). So we learn from Dio that Vespasian in A.D. 70, after Jerusalem was taken, wrote to Rome, "wiping out the disgrace of those who had been condemned for what were called impieties by Nero and those who had ruled after him, alike of the living and of the dead, and putting an end to accusations on such charges" (Dio Cassius, lxvi. 9). The senatus-consultum against the Christians remained apparently unrepealed, only suspended by this imperial despatch (cf. Eus. H. E. v. 21).

(b) In the reign of Domitian, if we may trust the Colbertine Acts of Ignatius (c. 1), there were many persecutions. The grandsons of Jude, sent as prisoners to Domitian by Invocatus, as chiefs of the house of David, were dismissed contemptuously as harmless peasants, and Domitian stopped this persecution (Hegesipp. in Eus. H. E. iii. 20, 32).

In A.D. 95, in the exaction of tribute from the Jews, profession of faith was made imperative for every one, and the Christians were accused of atheism. Some were put to death, others were stript of their property. Among the chief sufferers were Clemens and Domitilla, cousins to the emperor, and parents of his heirs. Clemens, though consul of the year, was beheaded: Domitilla was only banished to the isle Pandataria. Glabrio, who had been consul with Trajan in A.D. 91, and had been compelled, to fight with a lion in the very year of his consulate, was now put to death, on the same charges as the rest, and also on the ground of his easy victory over the lion. Compare Suetonius Domitian, c. 12: "deferebantur qui vel imprefessi judaice viverent," Dio Cassius, lxvii. 14, Bruttius in Eus. H. E. iii. 18, and Hieronym. Ep. 96 [27] and Eus. Chron. Olymp. 218. Domitilla has given her name to a Roman cemetery, where De Rossi has found inscriptions identifying the site as her property, and a shrine adorned with first century Christian paintings, and especially with a vine branch (κλῆμα) in allusion to the name of Clemens. (Bullettini, 1865, pp. 33 ff., 91 ff.) In A.D. 96 Nerva proclaimed general toleration (Dio Cassius, lxviii. 1), and closed the second oecumenical persecution, and the last till the days of Decius (Melito ap. Eus. H. E. iv. 26; Tert. Apol. c. 5; Lactant. de Mortibus, c. 3).

(c) Trajan is universally recognised as a persecutor. The chronology of his reign is somewhat hard to determine. According to the Colbertine Acts of Ignatius, the triumph over the Dacians was followed by a persecution of the Christians, Christianity being regarded by the soldierly Trajan as insubordination. Trajan's first triumph over the Dacians was in A.D. 102. It seems to have been somewhat later in his reign that Simeon, bishop of Jerusalem, suffered (Hegesippus, ap. Eus. H. E. iii. 32, cf. Zahn, Patres Apostolici, ii. 307).

In A.D. 112, according to Mommsen, Trajan wrote his famous rescript to Pliny (Plin. Ep. x. 97, 98), making Christianity still a capital crime, but forbidding search for the offenders, or anonymous accusations, and decreeing pardon for any who recanted. Under this law it was possible for bold Christians to present apologies for the faith without being themselves arraigned. The apologies of Aristides and Quadratus presented to Hadrian in A.D. 125 (cf. Clinton ad ann.) were immediately followed by the rescript of that emperor to Fundanus, insisting that definite illegal acts must be alleged against the Christians by responsible accusers (Eus. H. E. iv. 9; Melito ap. Eus. iv. 26; Justin, Apol. I. ad fin.; Aube, pp. 264, 275).

Nothing certain is known about the persecution of the Christians by Hadrian. The martyr acts

[a] The construction of the passage in Tacitus is obscure, but becomes clearer if we suppose him to be transcribing with a change of tense the actual terms of the senatus-consultum, which in that case seems to have been artfully worded, so as to stretch phrases descriptive of the old punishment of parricide, to be sewn up in a hide with a dog and thrown into the river, and of simple crucifixion, so as to make them include the novel sports of dressing men up as beasts, and setting dogs at them, or setting dogs at them as they hung on their crosses. "Pereuntibus addenda ludibria: ferarum tergis contecti laniatu canum intereant aut crucibus affixi; aut flammandi, atque ubi defecerit dies in usum nocturni luminis urantur." The tunica molesta, or plaguy shirt, seems to owe its origin to the charge of arson. The victim's throat was not fast, lest he should inhale the smoke and suffocate himself. The threat of this penalty was afterwards used to compel a gladiator to play, the part of Mucius (Martial, Epig. x. 25).

assigned to his reign do not inspire confidence. The first historian who reckons him as a persecutor is Sulpicius Severus, and he connects his persecution with the foundation of Aelia Capitolina on the site of Jerusalem. This seems probable enough, for we must remember that till then the Hebrew church survived, that the foundation of Aelia was an insolent rearing of the abomination of desolation on the sacred sites, that the same time circumcision was forbidden, and that these events synchronized with the deification of the vile Antinous (Clinton, A.D. 130–132). Barcochbas, the leader of the Jewish revolt, practised all manner of cruelties upon the Christians (Justin. Apol. I. 31), and the mother church of Jerusalem ceased to be, and was succeeded by a Gentile congregation at Aelia (Eus. H. E. iv. 6). The only martyr of this reign of whom we have certain knowledge, is the bishop of Rome, Telesphorus, whose execution may be assigned to A.D. 136 or 137.

There is some uncertainty as to the identity and date of Arrius Antoninus, an urgent persecutor in Asia, who, when all the Christians of the town presented themselves before him in a band, ordered some to be led off to execution, and said to the rest, "Wretches, if you want to die, there are precipices, and you have halters." (Tertull. ad Scap. c. 5.)

The chief danger of the Christians, however, was from popular outcries, and the most prominent members of the church bore the brunt of the assault, and quenched the fury of their adversaries by their death (cf. Origen in Joann. vi. 36; t. iv. p. 133). A notable instance is Polycarp, bishop of Smyrna, who was burnt on Saturday the 23rd of February, A.D. 155 (Waddington, Vie du Rhéteur Aristide, Mém. de l'Acad. des Inscriptions, 1867, t. xxvi. pp. 203 ff., 232 ff.). The sufferings of the martyrs were the occasion and the staple of the apologies. Thus the apology of Justin complained of the martyrdom of Ptolemy by Urbicius, i.e. between A.D. 156 and 160. This seems to have elicited the extant rescript of Pius (cos. iv. trib. pot. pp. xxi. i.e. A.D. 158—given as of Marcus in A.D. 161, by Eusebius,[b] H. E. iv. 13), addressed to the council of Asia, demanding proof, not merely of Christianity but of treason, and in default of such proof, threatening the accuser with condign punishment. The genuineness of this rescript has been doubted, because of its frank recognition of the piety of the Christians, and of their superiority to the sycophants who accused them. This seems to us quite in keeping with the character of Pius.

(d) Marcus, the noblest of the emperors, appears as a persecutor. His sincere piety in troublous times probably decreed universal religious observances with which the Christians could not comply. Both the acts of Justin (A.D. 166), the earliest that appear really to be taken down by a notary at the time, and the apology of Melito (Eus. H. E. iv. 26), written upon occasion of the martyrdom of Sagaris of Laodicea, A.D. 167 (Aubé, p. 362), speak of edicts ordaining that all who were caught should be compelled to sacrifice. If there were no reversal of the decision of Trajan, and no hunt after the Christians were decreed, there were at any rate plenty of "concussions." The Christians were driven to build their splendid tombs underground, as in the case of Januarius (Bullettini, 1865, p. 97). The emperor's justice replied to the apologies of Melito and of Apollinaris (Eus. H. E. iv. 27, v. 5) by a law which condemned the accuser of Christians to death whether his charge were substantiated or not (Tert. Apol. 5). This was subsequent to the deliverance of the army by an unexpected fall of rain in A.D. 174. The rescript of the emperor ascribing this to the prayers of a Christian legion is an undoubted forgery, and is not that to which Tertullian alludes (l. c., cf. ad Scap. 4). It is however possible that Marcus may have commended the piety of the Legio Fulminata, and that Apollinaris may have pointed out that in that legion the Christians were numerous.

But though convinced that the Christians were not atheists, and stern in repressing the attacks made upon them by private sycophants, Marcus was not ubiquitous and was not unprejudiced. Christian martyrs appeared to him to die in a spirit of irrational emulation, τραγῴδως κατὰ ψιλὴν παράταξιν (Med. xi. 3), and hence he was disposed to regard Christianity as a frightful fanaticism. His hatred of priestcraft made him decree that whoever scared men's minds with superstition should be banished to an island (Dig. XLVIII. xix. 30.) Meanwhile he was himself somewhat priestridden by his philosophers; the senators were for the most part utterly opposed to the new religion, and not likely to be impartial judges, and popular uproar did not always present itself as the voice of a rabble, but sometimes, as at Vienne and Lyons in A.D. 177, as the act of a municipality. The governor, on that occasion, found Christian prisoners awaiting him accused by the whole town of Lyons, and himself proceeded to commit an advocate who appeared for them and avowed his Christianity, to torture the heathen domestics of the Christians and to extract supposed evidence of cannibal banquets and incestuous orgies, to permit the murder by the rabble before the tribunal of bishop Pothinus, who was supposed to be the Christ worshipped by the Christians, and finally to consult the emperor about those who were Roman citizens without permitting them to go and plead their own cause before him. Marcus wrote back that those who recanted should be released; those who persisted should be drummed off, i.e. cudgelled to death. A similar decree appears in the acts of Caecilia, which are referred by De Rossi to this date. It seems to have called forth the apology of Athenagoras. The Gallic governor assumed a certain liberty in interpreting it. He gave up to the beasts all who were not Roman citizens, and one who was. Other tortures were applied to them in the amphitheatre for the amusement of the people, e.g. a chair of red-hot iron, in which the prisoner was fastened. This is noteworthy as indicating the effect of persecution of the Christians in whetting an appetite for horrors, —Tertullian (ad Martyres, 5) tells of some who volunteered to run a course in a flaming shirt,—and also in undermining the old fabric of chartered liberties, and reducing the world under the tyranny of the emperor and his emissaries. The rescript of Marcus is important as definitely sanctioning the employment of torture to induce recantation. Those who persisted in confession were liable to torture, and it came to be used not only to elicit confessions of imaginary guilt, but to compel denial of the faith (Tert. Apol. 2). The fact is that those who proclaimed, I am a Christian and among us no evil is done, not only failed to supply evidence against the Christians, they bore irrefragable evidence in their favour (cf. Eus. H. E. v. 1–4).

Christianity was left by Marcus in a most anomalous position. It was a capital crime either to be a Christian, or to accuse another of being so. Thus the accuser of the senator Apollonius, in the reign of Commodus, was put to death by having his legs broken, but Apollonius himself, after pleading his cause before the senate, was beheaded (Eus. H. E. v. 21). The proceedings of the governors varied. One suggested an answer that would enable him to acquit, another bound the culprits over to satisfy their townsfolk, a third let them off with a little torture, a fourth beheaded them, a fifth burnt them alive (Tertull. ad Scap. 4). There were convicts in the mines in Sardinia on the ground of their faith, whose release was obtained of Commodus by his Christian concubine, Marcia. A list of them was furnished her by bishop Victor, and the name of Callistus was omitted, because he had been guilty of breach of the peace in disturbing the Jews in their synagogue (Philosophumena, ix. 12). There were believers in high station in the palace (Iren. c. Haer. iv. 30).

(e) The power of the senate, so hostile to Christianity, was overthrown along with the dynasty of Trajan (Gibbon, ch. v.). No Christians followed the standards of the usurpers Albinus, Niger, and Cassian (Tert. ad Scap. 2), but Severus, the military despot, who proved victorious, had many Christian favourites whom he sheltered, and his son was reared on Christian milk (ib. 4).

Yet Severus was compelled (A.D. 202) to forbid conversions to Christianity (Spartian, Severus, c. 17), and the persecution which ensued, the first that made martyrs in Africa (Tertullian, ad Scap. 3), was so fierce that the Christians thought the end of the world must be drawing nigh.

In another way, however, this emperor enabled the church to acquire a sort of legal recognition. Severus made the permission of funeral guilds to those of slender means, provided they met only once a month, universal through Rome, Italy, and the provinces (Dig. XLVII. XXIII. 1), and committed charges of illegal association to the jurisdiction of the city praefect (ib. I. XII. 1 or 14). The church saw her opportunity. The archdeacon Callistus (A.D. 198) was set over the new cemetery on the Appian Way. A sum of hush money, distributed in presents at the Saturnalia, prevented awkward questions about the religion of the new funeral society, though it was indeed no secret, and the clergy were booked, by the police, among the taverns, gambling houses, brothels, and thieveries. But the recognition in any way of the clergy by the state increased their power and responsibility, and made the independent ambiguous position of the martyrs apart from the clergy above the laity, disturbing discipline by indulgences, a thing less and less tenable. Meanwhile, as wardens of the cemeteries pursuing their other offices of charity under cover of attending to the tombs, the clergy, instead of little meetings from house to house, could organize grand celebrations in subterranean halls before the monuments of the heroes of the faith; and to conform their phraseology and ritual as much as possible to heathen models was an obvious precaution. The danger that lurked in such conformity remained wholly unsuspected (Philosophumena, ix. 12; Tertullian, de Fuga, 12, 13; Bullettini, 1866, pp. 8–11, 19–22).

(f) The extension of the Roman franchise by Caracalla to all the free subjects of the empire made the torture of Christians thenceforward the torture of free Romans. We do not read of direct sanction of Constantinity or repeal of the laws against it, till the days of Alexander Severus. "Christianos esse passus est." He proposed to erect a temple, and gave the preference to the guild of the Christians over the guild of the cooks, when they disputed about a piece of land. His successor, Maximin (A.D. 235–237), aimed a persecution at the clergy only (Eus. H. E. vi. 28), which seems not to have been oecumenical only because his rule was not everywhere firmly established. It affected Egypt and Asia (Firmilian ap. Cypr. Ep. 75, c. 10), and above all Rome. Pontianus and Hippolytus were transported to Sardinia, and there died (Cat. Liberianus); Anteros, after six weeks' episcopate, was put to death, it is said, for his diligence in collecting and treasuring up the acts of the martyrs (Cat. Felicianus). Protoctetus and Ambrose of Caesarea were exhorted to martyrdom by Origen. It is a question whether the martyrs mentioned by Eusebius (H. E. vi. 4, 5) ought not to be referred to this persecution rather than to that of Severus, for Isidore of Pelusium expressly mentions Maximin as the persecutor of Potamiaena (Pallad. Hist. Lausiac. c. 3). The one part to which the persecution seems not to have extended is Africa (Dodwell, Diss. Cypr. xi. 48–50).

This outbreak was followed by a period of imperial favour. The emperor Philip is said to have been himself a Christian.

Decius (A.D. 250) instituted the third oecumenical persecution, by what laws we know not, but he seems to have given the reins to a great popular onslaught, which at Alexandria had begun a year before without waiting for imperial encouragement, but which was let loose universally by Decius.

The persecution of Decius appears to have summed up in itself the characteristics of all previous persecutions: direct and universal like those of Nero and Domitian, it was conservative and disciplinary in aim like that of Trajan, it employed torture for the direct purpose of forcing recantation like those of Marcus and Severus, and it broke through a period of peace and was directed principally against the clergy like that of Maximin. The Acta Sincera belonging to it are those of Pionius, Achatius, Maximus, Petrus Lampsacenus, Lucianus. The story that Decius was so impressed by the answers of Achatius of Pisidia, which were reported to him, that he recalled the edict of persecution, is somewhat confirmed by the cessation of persecution before the close of his reign. Cyprian returned, and a new pope was elected in the early part of 251 (Lipsius, Chron. Rom. Bisch. p. 18).

Persecution was renewed under Gallus, occasioned by the plague (A.D. 252, 253).

In A.D. 254 commences a formal registration of the bishops in the state archives. Valerian seems to have hoped thus to keep control over the church without the necessity of making martyrs. In 257 he had the bishops interrogated and banished (Vita Cypriani, c. 11). Reports of the interrogatories were published (Cypr. Ep. 77; Dionys. Alex. ap. Eus. H. E. vii. 11), and seem to have earned the bishops the title of martyrs. At least Dionysius of Alexandria is commemorated as such, though he survived the persecution and died in peace. But in A.D. 258, Valerian wrote that all the clergy should be executed offhand, nobles and knights degraded and stript of their property, and only put to death if they still persisted, ladies should be banished, officers of the household led off in convict gangs to penal labour (Cypr. Ep. 82).

Gallienus (A.D. 260) stopt the persecution and gave legal sanction to the church body, and reinstated it in possession of its corporate property (Eus. H. E. vii. 13).

Aurelian had intended (Eus. H. E. vi. 30), or even decreed (Lact. de Mortibus, 6) a persecution, but the execution of the design was frustrated by his death (A.D. 275). The peace of the church endured till the opening of the 4th century.

Like his great master in statesmanship, Aurelian, Diocletian also appeared as a protector of the church so long as he was occupied with rebels or foreign foes. But in his 17th year (A.D. 300) before his final triumphs, when he was anxiously awaiting news from the East, he expelled all Christians from the army (Eus. Chron. H. E. viii. iv.; [c] Lact. de Mort. 10). In A.D. 303 he was induced by Galerius reluctantly to re-enact the edicts of Valerian, with some exceptions and additions. His decree was placarded at Nicomedia on February 23. No blood was to be shed, but (a) the churches were to be razed, (b) the sacred books were to be burnt, (c) the Christians were to be disfranchised and outlawed, (d) liberti and addicti (οἱ ἐν οἰκετίαις) persisting in Christianity were to be reduced to slavery (Eus. H. E. viii. 2; Lact. de Mo t. 13). Two conflagrations in the palace caused the torture and execution of the Christian domestics, and a second decree incarcerating the entire clergy (Lact. de Mort. 14, 15; Eus. H. E. viii. vi. 9). The celebration of the Vicennalia at the close of the same year, which was the occasion of the release of all other prisoners, was signalised by the employment of torture to force the Christians to sacrifice (Eus. Ib. 11). The results of these edicts are graphically portrayed in the Acts of Theodotus: "All the chiefs of the brethren were kept fast in prison; their houses were ransacked; the unbelievers plundered whatever came in their way; freeborn virgins were shamelessly violated; there was no place of safety even for those who fled; they could not long endure their hunger, so that many gave themselves up to be taken." Altars were placed in the law courts that none might plead a cause without first sacrificing (de Mortibus, 15). A whole Christian town with its inhabitants was burnt in Phrygia (Eus. H. E. viii. xi.). New tortures were invented. The victims were stretched on a rack (equuleus) or hung up with stones fastened to their feet, then beaten in that posture with cudgels, rods, or scourges; then torn with iron hooks (ungulae, pectines); then rubbed with salt and vinegar; then burnt bit by bit from the soles of their feet upwards with torches or hot-iron plates, water being meanwhile thrown in their faces to keep life in them (Eus. H. E. viii. vi.; cf. Lact. de Mort. 21), or dragged along the rough ground to restore consciousness (Eus. H. E. viii. x.). Those who were remanded to jail were put in the stocks with their feet far asunder, and high up so that they had to lie on their backs. All these things were done before the persecution had properly commenced.

Throughout the west, in Italy, Africa, Spain, and even in Gaul and Britain, except as far as Herculius was checked by his subordinate Constantius, possession of Christian books, attendance on Christian meetings, and concealment of Christian fugitives, were already reckoned capital crimes. Such interpretation was put on the bloodless decrees of Diocletian by his colleague (Mason, Persecution of Diocletian, pp. 48, 1152, 154 ff. 172 ff.). In the East it was still illegal to kill, but not to mutilate a Christian (Eus. Mart. Pal. ii. 1). To understand the horror of the persecution it must be borne in mind that it was similar to the Revocation of the Edict of Nantes, a sudden subversion of legal security, a sudden disruption of peaceable society, nay, a sudden withdrawal of imperial favour.

In 304 the persecution raged most fiercely, for Herculius was still supreme in the west, and Diocletian was not in a condition to control Galerius in the east. At the beginning of the year a new edict extended the obligation of sacrifice to all the people of every town, and sanctioned the arrest of the consecrated virgins of the church and their consignment to the brothels (Eus. Mart. Pal. 3; Acta Irene, c. 5; cf. Acta Theodorae, c. 1). Even this did not satisfy the enemies of the church. In April a senatus-consultum (cf. Martene, Thes. iii. 1649) and a rescript of Herculius decreed the seizure of Christians "wherever found," and recognised that the penalty might be death (Mason, p. 212 ff.).

On the 1st of May, 305, Diocletian and Maximianus Herculius abdicated. Constantius, who had retained the confessors and dismissed the apostates among the officers of his own household (Eus. Vit. Const. i. xvi.), did not, of course, urge the persecution further in the west, but the church was not reinstated in her legal rights, and the western Caesar was a nominee of Galerius. In the east under Galerius and Maximin the persecution raged with redoubled fury, and a law was promulgated condemning the Christians to die by slow fire (De Mortibus, 21). The mode of punishment varied from province to province. In Cappadocia their legs were broken; in Mesopotamia they were suffocated by hanging their head downwards over a smoky fire; in Pontus they had their nails torn off, and other tortures too horrible to relate; at Alexandria their ears, noses, and hands were cut off; in the Thebais they were fastened to two boughs brought together by force and then let go, and so torn asunder. Meanwhile the pitying soldiery would force them to sacrifice, or drag them off by their feet and set them among the apostates, and stop their mouths if they tried to say anything (Eus. H. E. VIII. iii. ix. xii.).

On the death of Constantius, July 25, 306, Constantine was proclaimed in Britain, and his first act was to repeal the prohibition of Christianity (Lact. de Mort. 24). In October, Maxentius, son of Herculius, usurped the purple in Rome. Severus, who was sent against him, was defeated and put to death. Herculius resumed the purple along with his son, and they allied themselves with Constantine. Toleration was doubtless a condition of alliance, and a new bishop of Rome was elected; but to grant the church her right of imposing penance on apostates must have been intolerable to Herculius. Brawls ensued, the old emperor was forced to flee, and the same fate of exile was imposed on two successive popes, Eusebius and Marcellus. In the 6th year the Christians had their feet maimed and their eyes put out instead of being put to death (Eus. Mart. Pal. viii.). In the autumn there was a new edict enjoining sacrifice on man, woman, and child (ib. ix.). In April, 311, the dying Galerius with Constantine and Licinius, put out an edict of toleration (Eus. H. E. VIII. xvii.; Lact. de Mort. 34). This was suppressed by Maximin, who only wrote to his governors, bidding them desist from persecution (Eus. H. E. ix. i.). On the death of Galerius he made himself master of all Asia. He then induced the inhabitants of the towns to present petitions to him entreating him to continue the work (Eus. H. E. IX. ii. iv.; Lact. de Mort. 36), and decreeing for their own part expulsion of the Christians. Christian Armenia flew to arms (Eus. H. E. ix. viii. 2). Plague and famine gave the Christians new opportunity for charity (ib.).

In Rome the property of the church was restored, in accordance with the edict of Galerius, by Maxentius to Melchiades in July, 311 (Aug. ad Dom. post coll. i. xiii.; t. ix. p. 662; cf. Cat. Liberianus). There are legends of martyrdoms at Rome in presence of Diocletian about the close of the reign of Maxentius, e.g. the four crowned saints and Sebastian, and we know that Maxentius and Maximin were secret allies, and Diocletian was accused of favouring them (Victor. Epist. xxxix. 8). Whether Maxentius had turned persecutor or not, the victory of Constantine was none the less a triumph for the Christians. Before the close of 312 he met Licinius at Milan and put forth the famous edict of toleration (Eus. H. E. IX. ix. 9, X. v.; Lact. de Mort. 45, 48; Mason, Persecution of Diocletian, p. 333). This was at once communicated to Maximin and stopt his designs of persecution, though (as before) he substituted a rescript of his own (Eus. H. E. IX. ix. 11). But before the close of the winter he declared war, vowing, if victorious, to exterminate the Christians. The army of Licinius called on God most high and holy. Maximin fled (Lact. 46, 47), and decreed toleration and died (Eus. H. E. IX. x. 6 ff.).

The universal toleration promised by the edict of Milan was, however, impossible. The church as a corporate body possessed property, and the question necessarily arose who were the true members of the corporation. In this question the state could not but interfere, and claim a right of regulating the conditions of membership in the interests of public morality.

III. Roman Procedure.—There was a regular form for accusers to give in. "L. Titius professus est se Maeviam lege Julia de adulteriis ream deferre, quod dicit eam cum C. Seio in civitate illa domo illius mense illo coss illis adulterium commisisse" (Digest, ii. 3). The proconsul decided whether to commit the culprits to prison or to a soldier, or to admit them to bail, or to leave them at large (ib. iii. 1). Those who had confessed their guilt were put in chains till sentence was passed (ib. iii. 5). The police courts often sent up prisoners with a brief of the evidence against them: the higher courts were forbidden to condemn without fresh hearing (ib. iii. 6). Jailors were often bribed to leave the prisoners unchained, or to afford them means of committing suicide (ib. iii. 7), but jailors who let their prisoners escape through culpable negligence were liable to be punished with death (ib. iii. 12). To kill, scourge, or torture a Roman citizen, or to detain him from proceeding to Rome to plead his cause there, was to be guilty of assault on the public peace (ib. vi. 8, 9). Nobody might be condemned in his absence without a hearing (ib. xvii. 1). A prisoner might not be stript of his possessions till he were condemned (ib. xx. 2). There was great liberty of appeal, even for slaves, who might appeal on their own behalf, if their master or a commissioner of his did not appeal for them (ib. XLIX. i. 15). On behalf of freemen anyone might appeal who was shocked at the cruelty of the sentence (ib. 6). The appeal was drawn up in writing, stating who appealed, and against whom, and from what sentence (ib. 1), but in court a man might simply say, I appeal (ib. 2). The proceedings in court were taken down by official shorthand writers, and carefully preserved (Amm. Marc. xxii. 3; Cod. Theod. II. xxiv. 3, Lydus de Magister. ii. 20).

IV. Treatment of sufferers by their brethren.—Christians in prison and in danger of death, (martyres designati, Tert. ad Martyres) were naturally objects of great solicitude. The most graphic picture of the treatment that an imprisoned Christian, so called "martyr," in the 2nd century would receive from his brethren, is given by Lucian in his Life of Peregrinus, c. 12. After relating how that rogue turned Christian in Palestine, he proceeds: "Then at last he was arrested on this charge and put into prison: Proteus was caught. Not he! that very circumstance gained him no small stock of credit to stand him in good stead during the next stage of his life in his favourite game of making a sensation. In short, when he was put in prison the Christians took it to heart, and left no stone unturned to have him out again. Then, when that proved impossible, all other kind offices were done him, not half-heartedly, but in business-like fashion and in good earnest, and right from early morning you might see at the gaol-door old women waiting about, certain widows, and little children that were orphans. But their official personages even slept inside the gaol along with him, bribing the gaolers. Then dinners of various viands were carried in, and their sacred treatises were read, and the worthy Peregrinus (for he still went by that name) was called by these people a new Socrates. Nay, there are certain cities even in the province of Asia, from which some of the Christians came, deputed by their community, to help the man and support him in court and comfort him. They display incredible alacrity, when anything of this kind happens of public concern. And as an instance in point, much wealth accrued to Peregrinus from them then, by reason of his incarceration, and he made no small revenue out of it. . . He was released by the man who was then governor of Syria. . . He went forth a second time on his wanderings, with the Christians for a bank to draw upon for travelling expenses. As their soldier and servant he revelled in all abundance. And for some time he battened so: then he committed some transgression against their law also, was seen, I fancy, eating of their forbidden meats, and they came to him no more."

This hostile account is fully confirmed by Christian evidence. The jailors came to count on gains when they had Christian prisoners (Acta Pionii, c. 12); and when the officials forbade the access of visitors for fear of attempts at a rescue by magical arts (Acta Perpetuæ, c. 16), the prisoners seem sometimes to have been in danger of starving (Acta Montani, c. 9). Directions were given by Cyprian that the confessor Celerinus, though but a reader, should have the salary of a presbyter (Cypr. Ep. 39). The Apostolic Constitutions (viii. 23) forbid confessors to arrogate to themselves episcopal functions; and the 25th canon of Illiberis, which enjoins that if any bring letters of commendation as confessors, these shall be taken away and simple letters of communion given them, because all under the vaunt of that name everywhere make game of the simple (concutiunt simplices, the word used for violent threats, from the military). Compare also Apollonius (Eus. H. E. v. 19), who speaks of Montanist martyrs exacting coin from orphans and widows. And though Callistus had obtained recognition as a martyr, contrary to the wishes of Victor, that bishop thought it necessary to pension him (Philosophumena, ix. 12).

V. Prerogatives of Martyrs before Death.—The honours which martyrs received from their brethren in this life were far more than the material emoluments. "Martyrs," in the old sense, signed as martyrs to the decrees of councils (Eus. v. xix.). The bloodshedding of martyrdom was a sacrament, a baptism that replaced or renewed the baptism of water (Tert. de Bapt. c. 16); one of the seven ways of obtaining remission (Orig. in Lev. Hom. ii. 2, t. ii. p. 190); the wanderer's last refuge (Tert. Scorp. 6), in which not only soils were washed off, but stains bleached white (ib. 12), in which angels were the baptizers (Cypr. ad Fortun. pref. 4). Baptism was a time for prayer (Tert de Bapt. 20, Perpetua 2), and so was martyrdom. It did not suffice for a martyr to have purged his own sins (Tert. de Pudic. 22): they began to be in such dignity that they might ask what they would (Perpetua, 3, 7): "martyrs gave grace to those that were not martyrs," and received the penitent apostates into communion (Eus. H. E. v. i. 40, ii. 7, 8): they had a right to be heard in claiming absolution for their brethren, as they did actually atone for their brethren's faults; they wearied out by their patience the fury of the adversaries and broke down the power of evil (Orig. t. iv. p. 133; Eus. H. E. VII. xli. 16); moreover, their peace was so divine, that to be at peace with them could not but be to be at peace with God (cf. Cypr. Ep. xxiii.). Hence martyrs excelled confessors by their power of receiving back the lapsed (Cypr. Epp. 20 [17], 10 [8]). Soon as a martyr was thrown into jail, seekers of grace gathered round (Tert. de Pudic. 22). "What martyr," asks Cyprian, "is greater than God or more merciful than the divine bounty, that he should fancy that we are to be kept by his own aid?" Cypr. de Lap. sin. c. 20. [LIBELLI]

VI. Modes of Death.—The xlviiith title of the xlviiith book of the Digest treats of punishments. These were very various. Burning alive was supposed the most frightful death, and was reserved for deserters or slaves who murdered their masters. Crucifixion came next, the lot of brigands. Those condemned to be thrown to beasts lost their franchise and freedom forthwith, and might be kept to be tortured for further evidence before their sentence took effect (ib. 29). But praefects were forbidden to throw criminals to the beasts just to please a popular outcry (ib. 31). Criminals might of course die under torture, but were not to be put to death by torture, unless the above ways be so reckoned. Roman citizens were simply beheaded with the sword. Men might be condemned, not to be thrown to the beasts, but to fight with them. Then there was slavery in the mines with heavier or lighter chains; the lime-works and sulphur works were considered the worst, and the mines furnished occupation to women as well as to the miners. Then there was transportation to an island, which involved loss of citizenship, though not of freedom (ib. xxii. 6, 15). Then there were various modes of flogging, a cudgelling was thought more honourable than a scourging: there was labour in public works, banishment to an island, perpetual or temporary banishment. In almost every case the punishment varied according to the station of the offender. This is exemplified in the chief instance that we have of a persecution of the Jews. The crimes of some would-be Jewish missionaries in A.D. 19 brought the whole community into trouble. Four thousand of the humbler sort were shipped off to Sardinia to be employed against the brigands—"if they died, small loss"—the rest were to recant by a given day or leave Italy (Tac. Ann. ii. 85; Jos. Ant. Jud. xviii. 5).

VII. Treatment of the Bodies of the Dead.—The bodies of criminals, and even the ashes of such as had been burnt alive, except sometimes in cases of treason, were given up for burial to any who might ask for them (Digest, XLVII. xxiv.). At first such leave was only granted to private individuals; for funeral guilds were not yet allowed, and most of the early cemeteries bear the name of some wealthy owner. But the graves were recognised as possessing a religious sanctity. "Religiosum locum," says Marcianus, "unusquisque sua voluntate facit, dum mortuum infert in locum suum" (Digest, I. viii. 6; cf. Gaius, Instit. ii. 6). In 303, at the beginning of the persecution, Diocletian found it necessary to have the bodies of the martyrs dug up and thrown into the sea (Eus. H. E. viii. 6). Thenceforth he refused them burial. Instances of the measures taken to rob the Christians of the relics will be found in the acts of Claudius and Asterius, of Victor of Marseilles, Theodotus of Ancyra, Vincent of Valencia, Irenaeus of Sirmium, &c. &c. They were generally thrown into the sea in sacks. At Caesarea, on one occasion, they lay guarded, and the dogs threw them all about the city (Eus. Mart. Pal. 9). The more grievous the wrong done to the holy bodies, the greater the eagerness to requite them with due honour. There is a legend of a Roman lady sending her paramour to the east, where persecution was still raging, to bring her some relics (Ado, June 5). Antony strongly protested against the Egyptian practice of keeping the mummies of the martyrs in private houses, whereas "even the body of the Lord was buried out of sight" (Athanas. Vita Antonii, ii. p. 502). The same practice is forbidden in one of the Arabic constitutions which claim to be of the council of Nice (Labbe, Conc. ii. 350).

VIII. Sepulture of Martyrs.—The subject of Christian sepulture in general is treated under BURIAL, CATACOMBS, OBSEQUIES.

Of differences in the manner of sepulture of martyrs, which should enable future investigators to distinguish them after they had been forgotten, we have very little evidence. The title was sometimes inscribed on the tomb, either at the time of the interment or not long after (De Rossi, Rom. Sott. ii. 60, 61). In the lives of the popes, by Anastasius, Eutychian is said to have decreed that martyrs should not be buried without a purple dalmatic. Their blood was collected and buried with them (Prudentius, Peristeph. xi. 141–144), but the separate vessels supposed to contain blood are now recognised as receptacles for the wine of the agapae, or else forgeries.

Leibnitz tested a red sediment on a fragment of ancient Christian glass with sal-ammoniac, and finding the solvent successful, concluded that the sediment must be blood (Boldetti, p. 187). Palm branches, once supposed to distinguish martyrs, are common in the Christian epitaphs of the 4th century (ib. p. 271). These were the signs by which the Romanists used to pretend to distinguish the bodies of martyrs. Mabillon, under the pseudonym of Eusebius Romanus, entered a powerful protest (De Cultu Sanctorum ignotorum, Paris, 1698). Compare Martigny (Dict. des Antiquités Carétiennes, SANG DES MARTYRS).

It was very usual to inter the relics of the martyrs under the altar. [ALTAR, CONSECRATION.] There seems to be an allusion to this custom in Rev. vi. 9. The monuments were at first above ground. The monument of James the Just was to be seen in the days of Hegesippus (Eus. H. E. ii. xxiii.), and the trophies of Peter and Paul were shewn at the Vatican and on the Ostian way (Gaius ap. Eus. ii. xxv.). So long, of course, as the cemeteries were in Christian possession, the tombs of the martyrs would not be forgotten. It was only the confiscation of the cemeteries by Diocletian that caused uncertainties.

There was of course a peculiar sacredness attaching to the bodies of the martyrs. They bore visible stamps of celestial joy triumphing over earthly malice. When tortured into a mass of sores, the application of fresh cautery some days after healed them. They came forth from their dungeons with shining faces, and seemed to emit a heavenly fragrance (Eus. H. E. v. i. 19, 30). The martyrs themselves sometimes discouraged the desire for relics (Ign. ad Rom. 4; Pontius, Vit. Cypr. 16); but sometimes gave them (Acta Perpetuae, 21). The relics were regarded as more precious than gold (Mart. Polyc. 18), and the taunts of the Jews that the Christians would leave Jesus and worship Polycarp (ib. 17) but increased their devotion. The heathen attempted to make the resurrection of the martyrs impossible (Eus. H. E. v. i. 54–58) by forbidding the interment. Martyrs often suffered away from their own churches, e.g. Ignatius, and the possession of the bodies of martyrs gave lustre to the churches and seemed a guarantee of the purity of their doctrine (Polycr. ap. Eus. H. E. v. xxiv. 2–4). Hence translations were necessary. These could not be effected except by stealth or by imperial permission. It was probably by imperial permission that pope Fabian (Cat. Liberianus) translated the bodies of Pontianus and Hippolytus from Sardinia to Rome. [RELICS.]

A statue of Hippolytus was set up outside his church

A graffito praying for the peace of Pontianus was found in the papal crypt, and is referred by De Rossi to the times of Fabian. It was cut across when the crypt was altered by Damasus (Rom. Sott. ii. 80, cf. 381–396).

IX. Cultus.—Cultus, with rites of private direction, of the spirits of the departed, was not a new religion, though it was continually swelling the roll of divinities. But the graves were under the general supervision of the pontifical college, and might not be repaired without their permission (Digest, XI. vii. viii.; Bullettini, p. 89).

A pagan's will directing the construction of a memorial chamber [CELLA MEMORIAE] with an exedra or summer-house, marble and bronze statues of himself seated, a lectica and stone benches with drapery, cushions, and vestments, and an altar to contain his bones, an orchard to be attached, and the property to be inalienable from the tomb, two freedmen to be wardens on yearly pay, and all the freedmen to club together to keep up a yearly feast at the place, and to elect club masters yearly who should sacrifice monthly through the summer at the tomb, is given by De Rossi in the Bullettini, 1863, p. 95. A monument has also been discovered, probably of a Jew, in which sepulture is granted to the freedmen themselves and their descendants, provided they "belong to my religion" (ib. 1862, p. 80). The celebration of the eucharist and of agapes at the tombs was only illegal, because the dead had died as traitors.

Heathen[d] cultus of the departed in general was based upon the notion that their souls were hovering about their bodies, and stood in need of the good offices of the living to their bodies. Christian belief is that the departed need the salvation of survivors, that they without us should not be made perfect (Heb. xi. 40). Undutiful neglect of their corpses was thus injurious to the dead, as it was perilous to the living (Cypr. Ep. 8). Their souls were not supposed to hover about their bodies, but their memory was the strongest incentive to that devotion on the part of survivors which they really needed. Hence their tombs from the first (cf. Hel xiii. Rev. vi. Martyria Ignatii et Polycarpi) were places for the celebration of the Eucharist.

When the competition between heathen and Christian worship had once begun, the heathenish notions of honouring the dead by wakes and with waxlights began to gain currency among the Christians. In the canons of Illiberis, in or just after the time of the persecution of Diocletian, it is ordained that "waxlights should not be burnt by day in the cemetery," and the reason given for this prohibition is as superstitious as the practice prohibited, "for the spirits of the saints are not to be disquieted" (Can. Elib. 34; Routh, Rel. Sacrae, iv. 265). [LIGHTS.]

At the same council (can. 35) women were forbidden to keep vigil in the cemeteries, because under the pretext of prayer they commit sin. [VIGILS.]

When Constantine restored the property of the church, the re-erection of memorial edifices and celebration of festival anniversaries was commenced under prosperous auspices. If every city had a patron deity, almost every city had a native guardian saint. In the west, Prudentius enumerates the martyrs in whom diverse cities gloried. Carthage had Cyprian; Cordova, Acisclus and Zoellus and another trio; Tarragona, Fructuosus and his deacons; Gironda, Felix; Calahorra, Chelidonius; Barcelona, Cucufas; Narbonne, Paul; Arles, Genesius; Complutum, Justus and Pastor; Merida, Eulalia; Tangier, Cassian; Fez, the Massylitans; Valencia, Vincent; Saragossa boasted Encratis and a group of eighteen (Prud. Peristeph. iv). Rome seemed to be crowded with martyrs: they were buried there in heaps, and the number only, not the names, inscribed upon the tomb: in one sepulchre lay sixty (ib. xi).

So throughout the 4th century, the rival cults contended for that which is the first necessary of a ritual system of hero-worship, the honour of being the national religion. Paganism had the prestige of antiquity; martyr-worship was recommended by imperial favour, by its innate superiority, and by the independent vital force of the church of Christ.

The deities of the heathen were by this time generally recognised among the heathen themselves as merely deified men, and it was easy to demonstrate from the heathen myths that they were bad men. The vices of the gods and heroes were the commonplace of ancient philosophers, and Christian preachers. A race of true heroes had sprung up. To bow before the horrible leavings of butchery was mortifying to human pride, and the 20th canon of the council of Gangra, A.D. 324, was passed against those who disdained the worship at the shrines of the martyrs. But if ridiculous and disgusting in outward form, and moving the disgust of aristocratic scholars like Eunapius (Vita Aedesii, 78, 81), the new worship could yet justify itself by appeal to Plato and to Hesiod (Eus. Praep. Evang. xiii. 22), as the old hero-worship in a better spirit.

Private appropriation of the martyrs being forbidden, the privilege of worshipping in the public cemeteries became the more precious. The great question between the various parties of Christians in the 4th century was which of them had the right of community of creed and communion in worship with the ancient champions of the common faith. Each great city had its own cemeteries; for those of Alexandria and Jerusalem see De Rossi, Bullettini, 1865, pp. 57 ff. and 84. From this heritage of ancient memories the Catholic body was, during great part of the 4th century, unjustly excluded, and so they were grasped with the more tenacity when they were regained. Meanwhile the prohibitions of heathen worship by Constantius (Cod. Theod. XVI. x. A.D. 341–356), and the galvanic resuscitation of it by Julian (Amm. Marcell. xxv. 4), and the renewed abandonment of the temples of Heathenth (Soc. iii. 24) and interdiction of bloody sacrifice by Valens and Valentinian (Liban. Orat. de Templis, ii. 163) sent multitudes into the church with fresh appetites for ritual and devotional exercises.

The most striking instance of the support gained by the cause of Christian verity and independence from its ominous alliance with the popular fetishism, and from the supposed testimony of devils whom Christ would have gagged at once, is that afforded by the "invention" of the bodies of Protasius and Gervasius at Milan, in A.D. 386, by Ambrose. From the place where they were found, the church of SS. Nabor and Felix, De Rossi argues very probably that they were really martyrs, for it was an ancient Christian cemetery (Bullettini, 1864, p. 29). But they had been quite forgotten, and a dream led Ambrose to the excavations which disclosed two almost gigantic skeletons with a prodigious quantity of fresh, liquid blood. As the bishop, who was steadily resisting the claim of the Arian empress for a single church in which to worship, bore the relics through the city to his new basilica, demoniacs were seized with convulsions, and the demons owned the power of the martyrs and the error of Arianism, and left their victims. The relics cured a well-known citizen who had been many years blind. Undeniable facts will not convince sceptics, and the Arians derided the miracles, but the Catholics regarded them as a gracious interposition of Providence on their behalf (Ambros. Ep. xxii.; Augustine, Conf. ix. 7; De Civ. Dei, xxii. 8).

The year after the occurrence of these miracles the Arian empress was a fugitive and a suppliant at the court of the first Catholic Christian emperor, the great Theodosius, who finally suppressed Paganism, and who acknowledged by his submission to penance the power of the church to grant or withhold to the sovereign of the world the bread of his life, but who prepared himself for the contest with the last champion of Paganism, the usurper Eugenius (Ambr. Ep. 57) by going round all the places of prayer with the priests and the people, lying prostrate in sackcloth before the tombs of martyrs and apostles, and begging help from the intercession of the saints (Ruffinus, Hist. Eccl. xi. 33).

X. Intercession of Martyrs.—While martyrdoms were frequent they were regarded as a kind of perpetual embassy from the church on earth to her Lord. They were requested to bear their friends in mind when they entered into the presence of Christ (Eus. Mart. Pal. 7). Fructuosus, A.D. 258, answered such a request by saying, I must needs bear in mind the whole church spread from east to west (Act. Fructuosi, c. 5). Origen says, Of the martyrs John writes that their souls assist at the altar: he who assists at the altar performs the function of a priest: it is the office of a priest to plead for the sins of the people; I fear lest since we have no more martyrs it be with us as with the Jews who have no temple. Our sins remain in us (Orig. in Num. x. 2, t. ii. p. [illegible]). The belief derived from the words of Christ (Luke xxiii. 47, Rev. ii. 7), that the souls of the martyrs and theirs alone passed up into the presence of the Lord in Paradise, was confirmed by the dreams of the martyrs themselves (Acta Perpetuae, 4, 11, 12; Tertull. de Anima, c. 55). Moreover the crown which Paul mentioned as laid up for him against the last day (1 Tim. iv. 8) was supposed to be already given them (Mart. Polycarp. 19; Eus. H. E. v. 2, § 37; Acta Fructuosi ad fin.), and they were regarded as the future assessors of Christ in judgment (Cypr. Epp. vi. 2, xv. 3, xxxi. 3, de Lapsis, 17).

To these general beliefs Origen (l. c.) added a peculiar doctrine of his own, which he supported by Paul's phrase "to be spent" (2 Cor. xii. 15; 2 Tim. iv. 6), that Christ's sons joined with him in taking the sins of the saints. In his Exhortation to Martyrdom, c. 50, he suggests that perhaps some will be bought by the precious blood of the martyrs. In the same writing (c. 38) he suggested that after death the father would love his children more skilfully, and pray for them more continuously (t. i. p. 269). So he averred that the souls of martyrs not only interceded with the Lord, but themselves administered forgiveness to those who prayed (ib. c. 30, p. 293). He had been taught that those who had gone before contended in prayer for those who were following after, and licked up their adversaries as an ox licks up the grass (in Jesu Nave, xvi. 5). He gives as a mystery not to be written down the doctrine that the souls of good and bad men become good and evil angels (in Rom. ii. 4, t. iv. p. 479), and he seems to speak of martyrdom as necessary for attaining eternal life, though good works might lead to glory, honour, and peace (ib. c. 7, p. 483).

These beliefs naturally found expression in the forms of Christian worship. Thus as regards the martyrs, in the prayer for the whole church, it was not said "we beseech thee for them," but "we offer on their behalf"—an important difference (Const. Ap. viii. 12), and in the bidding prayer the faithful were not bidden to pray for them, but remember them (ib. c. 13). Prayers for them there were in the sense of pious wishes, but not in the sense of earnest entreaties, such as were made for others of the dead (Perpetua, c. 7). The Nestorians indeed whose liturgies seem in other respects to give the prayer in a more ancient form, requested that the sins of the martyrs might be forgiven them. "O Lord our God, receive from us by Thy grace this sacrifice of thanksgiving, the reasonable fruit of our lips, that the memory of the just men of old, the holy prophets, blessed Apostles, martyrs, &c., and all sons of Holy Church may be before Thee, that of Thy grace thou wouldst give them pardon of all sins that they have done in this world in a mortal body and in a mutable soul, as there is no man who sinneth not" (Renaudot, Lit. orient. coll. t. ii. p. 620). Epiphanius appeals to such prayers as a proof of the wide distance that the church acknowledged between the holiest saint and the Lord (Epiph. c. Haer. 75, § 7). But Augustine says we do not pray for martyrs, for they have fulfilled the love than which no man hath greater. We ask them to pray for us (Aug. in Joann. tract. lxxxiv. t. iii. coll. 847). And again, it is a wrong to pray for a martyr (Aug. Serm. 159, v. 867).

Invocation of the martyrs was fostered by Christian orators, whose theology was influenced by the teaching of Origen, but whose rhetorical training had been received in schools of pagan panegyric. Their sermons vividly depict, and enable us to enumerate, the superstitions which they encouraged.

Basil, in his Oration on Barlaam, speaks of the martyrs as fishers of men after their death, drawing myriads as in a drag-net to their tombs, p. 139. On Mamas, he cuts short the praise of the martyr to proceed to the lessons he meant to enforce, but not to disappoint the expectations of his audience, who had come to hear an encomium, he says, "Remember the martyr (1) all who have enjoyed a sight of him in dreams, (2) all who have lighted on this place and have had him for a helper in your prayers, (3) all whom he has helped at work, when invoked by name, (4) all whom he has brought home from wayfaring, (5) all whom he has raised up from sickness, all to whom he has restored children already dead, all whose life he has prolonged. Bring all the facts together; work him up an encomium by common contribution. Distribute to each other, let each one impart his knowledge to the ignorant," p. 185. So Nazianzen in his sermon On Cyprian, in which by the way he goes wofully astray respecting that father's personal identity, bids them supply the tale of his good offices for themselves, as their own offering in his honour, (6) his knowledge of the future, (7) his overthrow of demons—"Cyprian's dust, with faith, can do all things, so they know who have tried it" (Greg. Naz i. 449).

Gregory Nyssen, Basil's brother, preaching in honour of Theodore, after describing the church, the carved wood, the polished stone, the painted walls, the mosaic pavement, the cherished and treasured sweepings, bids them beseech the saint as a satellite (δορύφορον) of God, as one that accepts their gifts just when He chooses. "He has gone away the fair and blissful road to God, leaving us the monument of his contest as a teaching-hall, gathering congregations, instructing a church, driving away demons, bringing down graceful angels, seeking for us from God the things profitable for us, having made this place a medicine-hall for various ailments, a haven for those tost with afflictions, a storehouse of abundance for the poor, a beacon of refuge for wayfarers, a ceaseless festival of such as keep holy days. The throng never ceases, coming and going like ants. He it is who in these late years has stilled the tempest raised by the savage Scythians, opposing to their inroad no common weapons, but the cross of Christ, which is almighty." The saint is invoked and asked to have his heavenly duties of song. "We dread calamities and look for dangers; the grievous Scythians threaten war and are not far off: fight thou for us as a soldier; as a martyr employ in aid of thy fellow-servants, thy own freedom of speech. Thou hast passed away from this life, but still knowest the passions and wants of men. Pray for peace. To thee we ascribe the benefit of our preservation hitherto, and to thee we pray for future safety. Or if need be of more numerous entreaty, gather the choir of thy brother martyrs; remind Peter; wake Paul." (Greg. Nyss. iii. 578 ff.) Ephraim Syrus entreats the mother of the forty martyrs to intercede for him with them (Eph. Syr. II. 355, 391).

Basil, in his sermon on these forty martyrs, cries, "You often labour to find one to pray for you, here are forty. Where two or three are met in the Lord's name, God is there, but where there are forty, who can doubt His presence? These are they who guard our country like a line of forts. They do not shut themselves up in one place, but they are sojourners already in many spots, and adorn many homes, and the strange thing is, that they are not divided asunder on their visits to their entertainers, but are mingled up one with another, and make choral progress unitedly. Divide them into a hundred, and they do not exceed their proper number; bring them together in one and they are forty still, like fire" (Basil, ii. 155).

So in the next century Theodoret. "Their noble souls roam round the heavens dancing with the unembodied choirs. But as for their bodies, it is not a single tomb apiece that covers them, but cities and villages share them, and call them saviours of souls and healers of bodies, and honour them as patrons and guardians. The least little relic has the same power as the undivided martyr, and all this does not persuade you to hymn their God, but you laugh and mock."

Basil, the Gregories, and Ephraim, did much else besides lauding the martyrs. But in the west the title of Prudentius to fame lies mainly in the "passionate splendours" of the verse in which he hymns them, and the solitary devotion of the poet is more contagious than the fervour of the orators. "I shall be purged by the radiance of thy propitious face, if thou fill my heart: nothing is unchaste, that thou, pious Agnes, deigned to visit and to touch with thy footstep of blessing (Peristeph. xiv. 130–153). Be present now and receive the beseeching voices of thy suppliants, thou efficacious orator for our guilt before the Father's throne. By that prison we pray thee, the increase of thy honour; by the chains, the flames, the prongs, by the stocks in the gaol; by the litter of broken sherds, whence thy glory sprang and grew; by that iron bed, which we men of after days kiss trembling, thy bed of fire; have pity on our prayers, that Christ may be appeased and bend a prosperous ear and not impute to us all our offences. If duly we venerate with voice and heart thy solemn day, if we lie low as a pavement beneath the joy of thine approaching footsteps, glide in hither awhile, bringing down with thee the favour of Christ, that our burdened senses may feel the relief of thine indulgence" (ib. v. 545–568). So when they tried to approach Christ through the martyrs instead of seeking the martyrs in Christ, the martyrs began to usurp Christ's place.

The existence of a notion that it was a wrong to a martyr to leave him uncelebrated, as though he had looked for honour from posterity rather than from the Lord, is abundantly evidenced not only in the poems of Prudentius, but in the labours of the factious and pompous prelate Damasus (A.D. 366–384), who was a mainstay of the true faith, a stickler for the supremacy of the Roman see, and a great champion of virginity, but who is recommended to posterity mainly by his devotion to the shrines of the martyrs. He endeavoured to clothe the naked ugliness of the new rag-and-bone worship, not only with the clamour of rhetoric and poetry, but with the adornments of decorative art. [CATACOMBS.]

It remained for the leaders of the church to correct or justify the heathenised character of Christian worship. In one respect, in the west at least, they set about correcting it. The Christians were accused by the heathens and Manichees of turning the ancient sacrificial feasts into agapae. In the east these were forbidden in the churches by the 28th canon of the council of Laodicea, and so were celebrated at the outdoor shrines (Chrys. Hom. xlvii.). So Chrysostom urges his hearers. "If you want recreation, go to the parks, to the river side, and the lakes; consider the flower-beds; listen to the song of the cicalas; haunt the shrines of the martyrs, where there is health for the body and good for the soul, and no damage nor repentance after the pleasure" (in Matth. Hom. 37, t. vii. 477). So Theodoret boasted that instead of the Pandia and Dionysia there were public banquets in honour of Peter and Paul, and Thomas and Sergius, and Marcellus and Leontius, and Panteleemon, and Antoninus and Maurice, and the other martyrs, and instead of the old foul deeds and words they were sober feasts without drunkenness and revel and laughter, but divine hymns and sacred discourses and tearful prayer (Theod. Graec. affect. Cur. viii. ad fin.). But in the west Ambrose forbade these agapae at Milan (Aug. Conf. vi. 2), Augustine moved Aurelius to abolish them at Carthage (Aug. ad Aurel. Ep. 22), then himself abrogated them at Hippo (ad Alyp. Ep. 29, A.D. 395), and finally procured their prohibition by the 3rd council of Carthage, in A.D. 397 (can. 30). In Africa the feast was called, not agape, but lactitia. There were dances all night in honour of Cyprian (Aug. Serm. 311, t. v. col. 1415). Some brought food to the altars of the martyrs to be blessed and sanctified and then took it to eat elsewhere or to throw (Aug. de Civ. Dei, viii. 27, t. vii. 255). At these feasts wine was sold in the churches. Paulinus of Nola was unable to get the custom done away, and tried to improve it by the introduction of sacred pictures (Paulin. Nat. Felicis, ix.).

Augustine rarely says anything to increase the popular devotion to the martyrs. In one sermon he exclaims, "In what Christian's mouth does not the name of the martyrs make a daily habitation. Would that it dwelt so in our hearts that we might imitate their passions, and not persecute them with our drinking cups" (de Exp. Justus. i. 2, t. iii. 1979). Again he says, "The martyrs hate your drinking bouts, but if they are worshipped they hate that much more. Who says, I offer to thee, Peter. Christ chose rather to be, than to claim, a sacrifice" (Serm. 273, t. v. 1250). Again he complains that the martyrs are more honoured than the Apostles (Serm. 296, t. v. 1365). But he observes that to rejoice at the virtues of our betters is no small part of imitation (Serm. 280, ib. 1283), and once he suggests, "If we are not quite worthy to receive let us ask through His friends (Serm. 332, ib. 1462).

In the 8th chapter of 22nd book de Civitate Dei Augustine enumerates the ascertained miracles of the martyrs, and in the 9th chapter he points out the difference between these and the admitted miracles of the pagan heroes. The demons worked wonders in pride to prove themselves gods; the martyrs, or God for them, for the growth of faith in the one God. Their memorials are not temples. They are commemorated, not invoked. There is no priest of the martyr. The sacrifice is the body of Christ, which the martyrs are.

Against Faustus the Manichee, who urges that the theoretical monotheism and practical polytheism of the Christians were alike borrowed from paganism, so that they were not a new creed but a mere set of schismatics—"desciscentes a gentibus monarchine opinionem primum vobiscum divulsistis, ut omnia credatis ex Deo, sacrificia vero eorum vertistis in agapes, idola in martyros, quos votis similibus colitis; defunctorum umbras vino placatis et dapibus"—Augustine answers that the martyrs are celebrated to excite our imitation that we may be associated with their merits and helped by their prayers, and that by the admonition of the places themselves a greater affection may arise to warm our love both to those whom we can imitate and to Him by whose help we are able. So we worship the martyrs with that worship of love and resort to this society with which holy men of God are worshipped in this life, but the more devoutly as the more securely. But with the worship of latria we worship only one God. But, he says, what we teach is one thing, what we have to put up with is another (Aug. c. Faust. xx. 4, 21, t. viii. 370, 384).

Theodoret says boldly that the Lord has raised the martyrs to the place of the heathen gods (Theod. Graec. aff. Cur. viii. ad fin.).

XI. Burial near the Martyrs.—Ambrose himself laid his bones beside Protasius and Gervasius (Ambr. Opp. ii. 1110). Damasus would fain have been buried in the crypt of Xystus, but that he feared to vex the ashes of the pious. "Our ancestors," says Maximus of Turin, "have provided that we should associate our bodies with the bones of the saints. While Christ shines on them, the gloom of our darkness is dispelled" (Max. Taur. Hom. lxxxi.). But this was a privilege that many desired and few obtained, as we read in an inscription, A.D. 301, given by De Rossi (Inscriptiones Christianae, i. 142). Augustine's work (De Cura Mortuorum) was written in answer to a question put to him by Paulinus, bishop of Nola, whether burial in such proximity to the saints were of benefit to the deceased. He answers that some are so good and others so bad that whatever is done for them after death is superfluous or useless, but many whose merits are only middling may be benefited by the actions of survivors; that sepulture in itself does no good to the soul, but that care for it is laudable, and the grave reminds people to pray for the deceased. The martyrs themselves did not care how they were buried. Men have visions of the dead, as they have visions of the living, but the souls of the dead are not concerned with what is done here, yet the dead may know what is passing on earth, for the martyrs do help their suppliants. The martyrs are perpetually praying, and God hears their prayers, and gives the suppliants who seek their intercession what He himself perceives that they want. The sacrifices of the altar, of prayers, and of alms are the only way of benefiting the departed (Aug. vi. 591 ff.). The epitaph of Sabinus the archdeacon, who was content to lie under the threshold of the church of St. Lawrence, is given by De Rossi (Bullettini, 1869, p. 33). See also Le Blant, Inscriptions Chrétiennes de la Gaule, t. i. pp. 396, 471, t. ii. p. 219.

XII. Vindication of martyrs.—The many false claims to martyrdom made a kind of canonization necessary. This was called vindication.

Before Diocletian's persecution one Lucilla at Carthage was said to taste (i.e. kiss) the mouth of some martyr, if martyr it were, before the spiritual meat and drink, and when rebuked by Caecilian, then deacon, for preferring the mouth of a dead man, and if a martyr, not however as yet vindicated, to the cup of salvation, she went off in anger (Optatus, i. 16).

The clergy were the wardens of the cemeteries, and kept the register of martyrdoms as they occurred, and we have also seen the rules laid down for the qualifications of martyrdom. Doubts seem only to have arisen in Africa where there were numerous false claims of the Donatists, and in Gaul which had been so free from persecution, and so unsettled by barbarian invasions, that it had many unauthorised shrines. The 2nd canon of the Council of Carthage in the times of pope Julius decrees, "Martyrum dignitatem nemo profanus infamet, neque ad passiva corpora, quae sepulturae tantum propter misericordiam ecclesiasticam commendari mandatum est, redigat, ut aut insania praecipitatos aut alia peccati ratione disjunctos martyrum nomine appellet. At si quis ad injuriam martyrum claritati eorum adjungat infamiam, placet eos si laici sint ad poenitentiam redigi, si autem sint clerici post commonitionem et post cognitionem honore privari" (Labbe, Conc. ii. 714). And the 14th canon of the 5th council of Carthage, in the time of Augustine, decreed that no monument of the martyrs should be accepted except where a body or relics or the origin of a martyr's habitation was faithfully handed down by tradition (ibid. 1217). In Gaul, St. Martin was troubled at the reverence paid to a tomb of which no certain account could be given, and he had a vision of the occupant as a black criminal. So he dissuaded the people from continuing their devotion to it (Sulpicius, Vita Martini, 11). The Council of Aix in A.D. 787 decreed that the altars which are set up everywhere through the fields and ways as monuments of martyrs, in which no body or relics of martyrs are proved to be buried, be removed by the bishops of the places if possible. "If popular tumults do not suffer this, yet let the people be admonished not to frequent those places." Then the African canon is repeated, scenes of passions being allowed as well as birthplaces or homes, and they proceed to condemn trust in dreams. "The altars which are set up by inane revelations are altogether to be reprobated" (Labbe, Conc. vii. 979). Arian martyrs, such as George, acquired such celebrity in the East that it was impossible to exclude them from Rome, but their acts were forbidden to be read by a council under Gelasius, A.D. 494 (Labbe, Conc. iv. 1263). [E. B. B.]

MARTYRARIUS, or Custos Ecclesiae, a keeper of a MARTYRIUM, or church of a martyr. The 13th canon of the second council of Orleans mentions them as a well-known class: "Abbates, martyrarii, reclusi, vel presbyteri apostolia dare non praesumant." These relics were often preserved in little shrines or chapels (sacella), divided from the main building, a practice familiar to classic times, and of which there are notices in Cicero and other heathen writers; and in the larger churches, at all events at Rome, a separate guardian or martyrarius was permanently attached to each of these, who came to be called capellanus, i.e. chaplain, and was usually a priest. The Liber Pontificalis states of Pope Silvester, "Hic constituit ut qui desideraret in ecclesiâ militare aut proficere, ut esset prius ostiarius, deinde lector et postea exorcista per tempora quae episcopus constituerit, deinde acolythus annis quinque, subdiaconus annis quinque, custos martyrum annis quinque," etc. The authority of this work, however, is not high for the early popes. Similarly, Zozimus, bishop of Syracuse, is said to have been in his earlier life "custos pretiosi loculi S. Virginis Luciae," apparently a shrine, and afterwards "ostiarius et templi custos." [S. J. E.]

MARTYRDOM, REPRESENTATIONS OF. The earliest representations of martyrdom with which the writer is acquainted occur in the Menologium of the Vatican library, which D'Agincourt places in the 9th or 10th century. See L'Art dans les Monuments, pl. xxxi. xxxii. xxxiii. The entire absence of any such pictures or carvings from the catacombs, or earliest Christian works of the days of persecution, has often been the subject of comment. Daniel between the lions unharmed, and the three children scatheless in the furnace, are the only tokens of the persecutions of the first two centuries.

The introduction of martyrdoms of saints not mentioned in Holy Scriptures probably synchronises with that of the Last Judgment, with its hell, in the 11th century. For the subject of the Holy Innocents, see INNOCENTS, p. 841. The writer knows of no representation of the latter earlier than the Chartres evangeliary, said by Rohault de Fleury (Evangile, i. 282, and plate) to be of the 9th century, but probably still later. Nor can he call to mind any representation, within our range, of the martyrdom of St. Stephen. [See CRUCIFIX, p. 511 ff.] [R. St. J. T.]

MARTYRIA, martyr; commemorated at Tomi June 20 (Hieron. Mart.). [C. H.]

MARTYRIUM (μαρτύριον). Originally the spot where a martyr endured martyrdom, and where his remains were buried. When chapels and churches came to be built over these consecrated places, they assumed the same name, and were known as "martyries." A martyry is defined by Isidore as "locus martyrum, graeca derivatione, eo quod in memoriam martyris sit constructum, vel quod sepulchra sanctorum ibi sint" (Isid. Etymol. lib. xv. c. 9). The term gradually gained a more extended application, "postea omnis Ecclesia titulo cujusvis sancti vocata est martyrium" (Suicer, sub voce),—partly justified by the fact that no church could be consecrated without containing the relics of a martyr. Thus we find the terms μαρτύριον or ἐκκλησία used without any distinction, and often applied to the same building. Thus the church built by Constantine on Calvary is called by Athanasius τὸ σωτήριον μαρτύριον (Apol. ii. tom. i. p. 801), and by Sozomen τὸ μέγα μαρτύριον (H. E. ii. 26), and Jerome says "cujus industria Hierosolymae martyrium exstructum est" (Hieron. Chron. 7; Euseb. Vit. Const. iv. 40; Theophanes, ann. 32 Const.). The same name is given to the church of St. Thomas at Edessa (Socr. H. E. iv. 18), and to those of St. John and of the Apostles at Constantinople (Pallad. pp. 63, 159), and to the basilica of St. Peter at Rome (Athanas. Epist. ad Solitar. tom. i. p. 834), and to the church at Constantinople where the relics of the 40 martyrs were discovered (Soz. H. E ix. 2). The church of St. Euphemia at Chalcedon, which was the place of meeting of the oecumenical council, called ἐκκλησία in the exordium of Acta i. and ii., is styled μαρτύριον in Acta iii. (Labbe, iv. 371). The Council of the Oak was also held in a "martyry" where the body of Dioscorus of Hermopolis, one of "the Tall Brethren," was subsequently interred (Socr. H. E. vi. 17), and it was in "the martyry" of Basiliscus, in the vicinity of Comana, that Chrysostom died (Pallad. 99). Though they are often regarded as synonymous, that μαρτύριον was not identical with ἐκκλησία appears from the complaint of the Eastern bishops at the council of Ephesus to the emperors that Cyril and the Western prelates had closed against them "both churches and martyries," τὰς ἁγίας ἐκκλησίας καὶ τὰ ἅγια μαρτύρια (Theodoret, Epist. 152, 153). The Theodosian code expressly sanctions the erection and adornment of martyr-chapels, "quod martyrium vocandum sit," over the graves of saints (Cod. Theod. de Sepulchris violatis, tit. xvii. lex vii. vol. iii. p. 152). [E. V.]

MARTYRIUS (1) Martyr; commemorated May 29 (Usuard. Mart.), at Rome (Hieron. Mart.).

(2) Martyr with Marcianus, notaries; commemorated Oct. 25 (Basil. Menol.; Daniel, Cod. Liturg. iv. 272). [C. H.]

MARTYROLOGY (Martyrologium, μαρτυρολόγιον). This word denotes a list of martyrs, especially one arranged according to the succession of their anniversaries. In the East such a list was more commonly called a menology.

[MENOLOGY.] A martyrography meant a tale of martyrdom (v. Ducange, s. voce).

In the earliest adducible example of the celebration of the anniversary of a martyr's death, the commemoration of Polycarp, who died Feb. 23, A.D. 155 (Mart. Polyc. c. 21; cf. Zahn, in loco), we may note a few points bearing on the history of martyrologies. (1) the celebration was local at the martyrium (ib. c. 18); (2) yet the anniversary was made known to a neighbouring church and all churches (ib. Salut.); (3) only the most notable of the martyrs was commemorated by name, and the others who suffered about the same time were joined with him and merely numbered; (4) the martyr was burnt on a public showday, which happened to coincide with a high sabbath of the Jews, the 7th Saturday before Easter: so the birth day of Geta (March 7) became to the Christians the birthday of Perpetua, and continually heathen festivals must have been hallowed by Christian martyrdoms, as butchering martyrs was a holiday sport; (5) on a subsequent coincidence of the same Jewish and heathen anniversaries in A.D. 250 the martyr Pionius was arrested; in like manner it must often have happened that a martyr's anniversary was honoured by another martyrdom. This was the case, for example, with Cornelius and Cyprian, Sept. 14 (cf. De Rossi, i. 275); with Fabian and Sebastian (Kal. Philocali, Jan. 20); with Fructuosus and Agnes, Jan. 21 (Aug. Serm. 273; Op. Migne, v. 1250). We note this, because a statement in the article on CALENDAR is liable to some misconception.

Martyrologies appear to have been originally indices to the martyr acts preserved in the archives of each church, arranged for convenience by the calendar, according to the anniversaries on which such acts would be read in public. Tertullian speaks as though the Christians had their own calendar (Habes tuos census, tuos fastos: nihil tibi cum gaudio saeculi, De Coronâ, c. 13). In Cyprian's time it was the practice "to celebrate the passions and days of the martyrs," who had suffered before the Decian persecution, "with anniversary commemoration" (Cypr. Ep. 39 or 34). Of Anteros, who was pope for a month and ten days (Nov. 24, A.D. 235, to Jan. 3, A.D. 236) in the persecution of Maximin, we are told that "he diligently sought out the acts of the martyrs from the notaries and laid them up in the church, for which thing he was made a martyr by the prefect (Pupienus) Maximus" (v. De Rossi, Rom. Sott. ii. 181). The anniversaries on which the acts would be read included not only those of the death, but those of the solemn entombment of the martyrs, as in the case of Pontianus and Hippolytus, buried on Aug. 13 by Pope Fabian (ib. 78). Fabian is said, in the lives of the popes, to have appointed seven subdeacons and seven notaries to collect the acts of the martyrs in their entirety. Cyprian directs his presbyters and deacons to note the days on which the martyrs depart this life, and adds that Tertullus, a brother who ministered to and buried the martyrs, had written and did write to signify to him the days on which the brethren died in the prison (Cypr. Ep. 12 or 37).

Martyrologies are of various kinds—

1. Lists contained in popular almanacs of such anniversaries as were observed as important festivals.—Of this kind is the earliest extant martyrology, that contained in the Almanac for the city of Rome, transcribed by the calligrapher Furius Dionysius Philocalus, A.D. 354, sometimes called after Liberius, who was then pope, sometimes after Bucherius, who discovered and published it in his commentary on Victorinus (Aegidius Bucherius, de Doctrina Temporum, Antwerp, 1634, pp. 236–288). It has been recently edited by Mommsen (Ueber den Chronographen vom Jahre 354, Abhandlungen der königlich sächsischen Gesellschaft, b. ii. Leipzig, 1850). The calendar contained in this almanac is the earliest that can be called Christian, inasmuch as it contains the dominical, as well as the nundinal, letters and a cycle for determining Easter, but it marks only heathen festivals. Then follow (2) the birthdays of the Caesars; (3) the series of consuls to A.D. 354 from the Fasti Capitolini; (4) a table of the days on which Easter would fall from A.D. 312 to A.D. 412; (5) the praefects of the city from A.D. 254 to A.D. 354; (6) Depositio Episcoporum, the list of the funeral days of the popes for the same century; (7) Depositio Martyrum; (8) the chronological catalogue of the popes down to Liberius; (9) a chronicle down to A.D. 334 [CHRONICON HOROSII, Dict. Christ. Biog.]; (10) a brief Roman history to Licinius; (11) the regions of Rome.

The list of episcopal funerals begins at precisely the same epoch as the lists of city praefects, A.D. 254, and was arranged, not chronologically, but in order of the calendar, in A.D. 336, the subsequent entries being appended at the close, not inserted in their places according to the calendar. It is manifest that the collection of documents belongs really to the reign of Constantine and was merely continued up to date in A.D. 354; and also that when the almanac was put together the epoch at which both the lists commence was not at the distance of an exact century.

De Rossi (Rom. Sott. ii. iii.–x.) infers that the two lists are probably drawn from the same source, the archives not of the church but of the state. Compare Tert. de Fuga in Persec. c. 13; Eus. H. E. vii. 13 and 30; Acta apud Zenophilum, App. in Augustin. v. 794: Cypr. Ep. 55 (52); from which passages it appears that the civil power took cognisance of the succession of the clergy.

Marcellus is not included among the popes in this list of anniversaries, and Xystus is to be found not among the popes but among the martyrs. The Depositio Martyrum also includes Fabianus, Jan. 20; Pontianus, Aug. 13; Calistus, Oct. 14; all of them martyr popes between A.D. 200 and A.D. 250, and De Rossi believes the entry Cornel. in Calisti, on Sept. 14, to have been accidentally omitted by the copyist. But it does not contain Telesphorus (Iren. ap. Eus. H. E. v. 6). We may probably conclude that all the popes mentioned in the Depositio Episcoporum died in peace, but we must not suppose that no earlier popes were martyred.

In both catalogues the cemetery is in each case specified. They are catalogues, not of deaths, but of entombments. In three instances in the second catalogue where consular years are added, the commemorations are of translations effected in those years (De Rossi, Rom. Sott. ii. 214–215). The same catalogue includes two feasts that are not entombments at all, the Nativity, Dec. 25, and the Chair of Peter, Feb. 22, and one feast of African martyrs, Perpetua and Felicitas, March 5, in which cases no cemetery is named, but in the case of the only other non-Roman martyr Cyprian, the note is added, "Romae vele[illegible] in Calisti." The second catalogue does not seem to include any martyrs earlier than the 3rd century, and is certainly not a complete list of Roman martyrs from that time forward. It is only the Feriale, Hieronymianum, or list of chief feasts of the Roman church. To pretend with Dodwell that it gives all the Latin martyrs, not only of Italy but of other provinces, is extravagantly absurd.

These two catalogues, which together form the earliest martyrology, are reprinted from Bucherius (p. 267), by Ruinart (Acta Sincera, p. 692, Paris, 1689), and from Mommsen (p. 631) by De Smedt (Introductio Generalis, p. 512). The Calendar of Philocalus is printed by Migne (Patr. xiii. 621) side by side with another that affords an interesting comparison, rather for the elimination of the heathen than for the introduction of a Christian element, namely, the calendar of Polemeus Silvius (A.D. 448). This latter, though it contains seven of the chief Christian holidays (LAVRENTIVS), is in no sense a martyrology. A Roman calendar of much later date (Migne, cxxxviii. 1189) will afford further interesting comparison.

II. Lists of anniversaries honoured by the church with special services.—That there were such, and that they differed in each different locality, we know from Sozomen (H. E. v. 3), who tells us that Constantia and Gaza, though only a couple of miles apart and for civil purposes forming one city, had each its own feast days of its own martyrs and commemorations of its own bishops. We can hardly say that we have any such extant that date from before the 6th century. It is almost certain that the ecclesiastical martyrology of the Roman church in the time of Liberius was fuller than the lists preserved in the work of Philocalus. These lists, however, prove one important point. While the civil year began on Jan. 1, the ecclesiastical year at Rome began a week earlier, on Christmas Day.

The fragment of an Ostrogothic calendar, discovered by Mai, and referred by him to the close of the 4th century, contains only local saints (for bishop Dorotheus, Nov. 6, and the emperor Constantine, Nov. 3, were specially Gothic saints) and apostles, Philip, Nov. 15; Andrew, Nov. 30. [CALENDAR.]

Information regarding the anniversaries of the church is chiefly to be drawn from the sacramentaries or from the sermons of the fathers. Basil only preaches in honour of Cappadocian, Chrysostom at Antioch of Antiochene saints. But Augustine at Hippo celebrated not only local or even African martyrs, but the Spanish bishop Fructuosus and the Roman virgin Agnes (Jan. 21), the Spanish deacon Vincent (Jan. 22), Protasius and Gervasius of Milan (June 19), the Roman Lawrence (Aug. 10), the Maccabees (Aug. 1), Stephen (Dec. 26), the Nativity of the Baptist and his Decollation, perhaps the conversion of Paul (Opera, v. 1247 E).

The sacramentaries of Leo (A.D. 440–461) and Gelasius (A.D. 492–496) are genuine and authentic monuments of their respective epochs, which the Gregorian sacramentary is not. (De Rossi, Inscr. Sotter. i. 126.) The sacramentaries, however, [illegible] significant in their additions to [illegible] their omissions only shew that the [illegible] not compose or find special prayers [illegible] omitted feasts that seemed worth preserving. The sacramentary of Leo in the nine months extant, retains seven and omits eleven of the anniversaries of Philocalus, adds six anniversaries of Roman martyrs at Rome, one of a Roman away from Rome, one or two of non-Roman martyrs, and four of Scriptural personages (John Baptist, Andrew, John, and the Innocents). (For the sacramentaries Muratori, Liturgia Romana Vetus may be consulted.)[a]

The calendar of Polemeus illustrates the same tendency to greater universality that was beginning to affect martyrologies. While retaining only two Roman anniversaries from the twenty-two of Philocalus, he adds a new foreign martyr (Vincent) and four celebrations of Scriptural facts (Epiphany, Passion, with the mission of the Apostles (Mar. 25), Stephen, the Maccabees).

The Carthaginian calendar or martyrology given in Migne (Patr. l. Lat. xiii. 1219) is probably later than A.D. 505.

III. General Martyrologies.

A. The Syriac Martyrology.—"The names of our lords the martyrs and victors, with their days on which they won crowns."

This is the title and description of an ancient Syrian martyrology discovered by Dr. W. Wright in the "well-known Nitrian MS. Add. 12,150," written A.D. 412, "extending from fol. 251 vers. to fol. 254 rect.," and published by him in the Journal of Sacred Literature, vol. viii., N.S.; London, 1866, pp. 45–56, with an English version, pp. 423–432.

It avowedly computes the months after the Greek, i.e. our present reckoning, but gives them Syriac names, [MONTH.] The latter Kânûn, Shebât, Adâr, Nisân, Iâr, Hazirân, Tâmûz, Ab, Hûl, the former Teshrî the latter Teshrî, the former Kânûn. This last, which is equivalent to December, begins the year. The martyrology opens, not with the Nativity, but with the apostles Stephen, Dec. 26, and John and James, Dec. 27, at Jerusalem, and Paul and Peter at Rome, Dec. 28. Thenceforward, with only two exceptions (Perpetua, March 7, and Exitus (i.e. Xystus), bishop of Rome Aug. 1), the martyrs belong to the eastern provinces of the empire. Thirty anniversaries are assigned to Nicomedia, twenty-one to Antioch, sixteen to Alexandria, six to Caesarea in Cappadocia, [illegible] to Ancyra, others to another Alexandria, to Amasea, Aphrodisia, Axiopolis, Bononia, Rhaetia, Byzantium, Caesarea in Palestina, [illegible]deed Corinth, Edessa, Eumenea, Hadria[illegible], Heliopolis, Heraclea in Thrace, Hierapolis, [illegible]odicea, Nestra, Melitene, Nicopolis, Nisibis, Pergamus, Perinthus, Salon e, Sirmium, Thessalonica, Tomi; also to Bithynia Galatia and Isauria; while twenty-four are named without specification of place. With Peter of Alexandria, Nov. 24, "Here end the martyrs of the West." Then follow "The names of our lords the martyrs who were slain in the East:" "Abd,

[a] The Capitulare published by Fronte and by Martene (Thesaurus) was composed at the end of the 7th century, before 682, and retouched between A.D. 714 and 742. (De Rossi, Rom. Sott. 126.)

the first, Dali, the second;" others, "of the number of the ancients;" others, "ancient martyrs;" next, "the bishops slain in the East;" by their sees, not their days; "then the priests," "the deacons," &c.

B. The Hieronymian Martyrology.

"The names of nearly all martyrs collected in one volume, with the passions marked for each day, without indicating how each one suffered, but only the name, place, and day of the passion, so that every day many of divers lands and provinces are known to have been crowned." This is the description given by Gregory the Great (Epist. viii. 39) of a volume that they possessed at Rome, and believed the church of Alexandria to possess likewise; "and daily," he adds, "in veneration of them we perform solemn rites of masses." This martyrology appears to have differed from the preceding in giving at least one martyr for each day, and being not only half but quite oecumenical. Two ancient extant martyrologies satisfy these conditions; the lesser Roman, and the Hieronymian; but the claim of the former to be that here intended is now universally disallowed.

The extant allusions to the Hieronymian martyrology are as follows. Walafrid Strabo, abbat of Reichenau (A.D. 842), tells us that the litanies of the saints are believed to have been taken into use after Jerome, following Eusebius, wrote a martyrology (de Reb. Eccl. c. 28; Patr. Lat. cxiv. 962). Aengus the Culdee professes to have used in his FELIRE "the great parts of Ambrose, the works of Hilary in full, all that was written by Jerome, the martyrology of Eusebius." Bede (Retract. in Act. Ap. c. i.; Patr. Lat. xcii 997) speaks of a book of martyrology taking its title from Jerome, and prefaced in his name (Hieronymi nomine ac praefatione attitulatur), though he is said to have been only the translator, and Eusebius the real author. Cassiodorus, in the earlier half of the 6th century, says, "Vitas Patrum, confessiones fidelium, passiones martyrum legite constanter, quas inter alia in epistola S. Hieronymi ad Chromatium et Heliodorum destinata procul dubio reperitis qui per totum orbem terrarum floruere" (de Inst. Div. Lect. c. 32; Patr. Lat. lxx. 1147). The preface in Jerome's name, mentioned by Bede and cited by Walafrid, is in the form of a reply from Jerome to a request of Chromatius and Heliodorus. And the passage of Gregory cited above is in reply to a request from Eulogius of Alexandria for Eusebius's collection of martyr acts, which could not be found.

Bishops Chromatius and Heliodorus inform their holy lord, brother Jerome, that they were present at the council of Milan (A.D. 390) when Theodosius, the most Christian prince, praised Gregory, bishop of Cordova, for being wont every day as he opened the mass, at morning if not fasting, at evening if he were, to mention the names of very many martyrs of whom it was the natal day. The council agreed to send a letter to Jerome to ask him to make inquiry for the most famous feasts (or festale) from the archives of Eusebius of Caesarea, and thence address to them a list of the feasts of the martyrs. Jerome replies that we read (legitur) that when Constantine came to Caesarea (probably in A.D. 335), and told Eusebius to ask any boon that would profit his church, the bishop answered that the church was enriched by her own resources, but that he personally could not rid himself of the desire that, whatever had been done anywhere in the Roman state regarding the saints of God, the judges and their successors throughout the Roman world might be directed to search through the public records with diligent scrutiny and discover what martyr had won the palm in each province or city, under what judge, on what day, and by what suffering, and to transmit the facts taken from the authentic archives to himself by royal order. Hence he rewrote his church history, and declared the passions of nearly all the martyrs of all the Roman provinces. "Since on single days," Jerome proceeds, "the names of more than 800 or 900 martyrs of divers provinces and cities are named, so that no day can be found with fewer than 500, except Jan. 1, I have briefly and succinctly concerned myself with those alone who are in chief honour among their own people." These numbers, of course, must be divided by ten, an easy change. "At the opening of the book we have written the feasts of all the apostles, that various days may not seem to divide those whom one dignity sublimes in heavenly glory."

Baronius (praef. ad martyrologium, cc. 5–7) brought sundry objections against the authenticity of these letters, which have been completely refuted by Fiorentini (Vetust. Mart. pp. 57–59). His conclusions are accepted, but the decision of Baronius has not been set aside, even by Fiorentini himself.

Two points may be regarded as quite certain: 1. Eusebius had not received this grant from Constantine when he wrote his church history as at present extant, still less when he made the collection of pieces concerning ancient martyrs, to which he there refers. An index to that collection would be a kind of martyrology, and it is possible that we have traces of such in the Syriac martyrology of Wright, where fourteen times western martyrs are said to be "of the number of the ancients," an addition that seems in no case to be applied to those who suffered in the persecution of Diocletian, just as it distinguishes the old martyrs of Persia from those who were put to death under Sapor. The same title is applied in the Hieronymian martyrology to Hippolytus of Antioch. The martyrs that we know to have been included in Eusebius's compilation are Polycarp, Pionius, Carpus, Pothinus and his fellows, Apollonius. The whole work seems to be included by Jerome along with the martyrs of Palestine as "some little works upon the martyrs" (Hieron. de Viris Illustribus; Eus. H. E. iv. 15; v. 4, 21).

2. When we have removed from the extant copies of the Hieronymian martyrology all the clear and valuable notices of facts long posterior to Jerome with which they are enriched, the residue is not such as can by any possibility be attributed either to him or to his master, at least in any form in which it can at present be found in any Mss. or deduced from comparison of all. The restoration needed is not merely the reparation of a damaged text; it is rather the recovery and redintegration of a perished book or books. The work is agreed to be not so much a single martyrology as a cento of martyrologies patched up of many ancient calendars, fitted together well or ill. The same martyrs and groups of martyrs often recur two or three times the same days, often for four or five days running. Places become people; and people are turned into places. Yet, however the martyrology has been swollen by impertinent accretions and inane repetitions, the more copious the text is the better. When it has been subjected to a reverse process of constriction and ignorant elimination, the confusion becomes hopeless.

The Martyrology consists chiefly of names of places in the locative case and of persons in the genitive, ranged under the several days from Christmas to Christmas, though a few further details are introduced.

The unabridged MSS. are (A), a MS. made at Corbie under one Nevelone in the 12th century, and printed, with arbitrary transpositions and silent conjectural supplementations, by D'Achery in his Spicilegium (ii. 1 folio; iv. 617, 4to ed.), and reprinted by Migne (Hieron. ix. 447). This MS. is now in the Paris library (Cod. Lat. 12, 410). (B) Nevelone's autograph copy, in the same library (Fond. Corbie 5), discovered by De Rossi. (C) A 9th-century MS. found at Lucca by Fioreutini, copied from one made at Fontenelle under Wando, and not interpolated since Wando's death in A.D. 757. (D) Codex Blumanus. Another copy of the same Fontenelle MS. made at Weissenburg in A.D. 770, and subsequently interpolated with insertions belonging to that town. (E) A MS. that belonged to the church of Sens, now in the Queen of Sweden's collection in the Vatican (Cod. 567). These five, though of very different date, are of nearly equal value. (F) Codex Antwerpiensis, or Epternacensis, a MS. in Anglo-Saxon letters, of the 8th century, made by one of the monks of St. Willibrord, the apostle of Friesland, in Epternach monastery, found by Rossweyd at Treves, now in the Paris library (Cod. Lat. 10,837). A page of facsimile is given in the Acta SS. for April (t. ii. p. ix.).

Of the above (C) is edited with a collation of (A) and (F) day by day, of (E) in fragments, and of (D) entire at the close, by Fiorentini (Vetustius Ecclesiæ Occidentalis Martyrologium, Lucæ, 1667).

The Epternach MS., though the earliest, is by common consent pronounced the least authentic. It represents a British form of the Martyrology, and seems to bear a close relation to the Martyrology of Donegal – partly published by Todd and Reeves (Dublin, 1856), but buried for the most part in St. Isidore's, Rome—in which the topographical notes are omitted.

(G) De Rossi has discovered in Berne library (Cod. 289) a 9th-century copy belonging to the church of Metz, which retains the topographical notices in larger characters, dividing the martyrs of each day into distinct local groups.

All these MSS. have in common sundry arbitrary interpolations and corrections relating to early saints, which De Rossi traces to the misunderstanding of a 7th-century list of papal interments. He considers therefore that the extant MSS. did not diverge from their common stock till it had been subject to interpolation in the 7th century.

They all contain a number of notices relating to Gaul. These are partly shared in common between them; partly peculiar to the several groups. Those which are common to them all do not extend beyond the end of the 6th century, and refer especially to Auxerre. Moreover they all open each month with the notice, "Litaniæ indicendas," and the proclamation of litanies on the calends, whatever connexion it may have with Jerome, was certainly an ordinance of Aunarius, Annacharius, bishop of Auxerre, circ. A.D. 600 (Acta SS. t. vii. Sept. p. 109).

Another principle is applied by De Rossi to confirm the conclusion to which these facts point. The ordination of a bishop was ordinarily only commemorated in his lifetime. The only ordinations of bishops noted in these martyrologies, besides that of the great St. Martin, are those of Aunarius (July 31), and of his contemporary Nicetas of Lyons (Jan. 19). The death of Aunarius is not noted; in some copies he is styled Dominus.

Hence De Rossi concludes that, in the time of Aunarius, "out of two or more tattered copies" of an earlier work that passed under the name of Jerome, "a clerk of Auxerre, ignorant of topography and history, put together the chaotic medley" from which our present copies are derived. (De Rossi, Roma Sott. ii. pp. x–xxi, xxv, 33–48.) Instead of keeping the texts of the fragments before him distinct, as parallel reproductions of the same, he has transcribed nearly the whole of each and run them into one. He seems also to have tried to piece two fragments together like a child's puzzle, and sometimes to have pieced them wrong.

The text, however, so ill restored by the monk of Auxerre, who, it may be observed, is supposed contemporary with Gregory the Great, was itself of the nature of a cento, according to the judgment of modern critics. The same principle that enabled De Rossi to refer the bungling recension to the time of Aunarius induces him to assign certain of the documents used in the compilation to the popedoms of Boniface I. (A.D. 418–422) and Miltiades (A.D. 311–314). On the 29th of December the martyrology has "Bonifacii episcopi de ordinatione," and this is certainly the right anniversary of the ordination of Boniface I. but not of his death, which is left uncelebrated. The burial of Miltiades is properly noted on Jan. 10; but again, and this time without mention of a cemetery, on July 2, the day of his ordination. (De Rossi, Rom. Sott. i. 112–114). These documents, he concludes, were far too rare and precious to have fallen into the hands of an obscure Gallican monk. The Martyrology also contains numerous accurate notes of the fresh festivals instituted in Rome in the 5th century, especially by pope Sixtus III., and there is evidence that the Auxerre compiler had before him two copies, both enriched with these insertions (ib. ii. 36).

We may observe that the popedom of Boniface coincides with the last days of Jerome, within a decade of Wright's Syrian MS., and within thirty years of the council of Milan, and again, that the popedom of Miltiades coincides with the restoration of the church under Constantine, and the first compilation of the calendar of Philocalus.

Now all the notices in the calendar of Philocalus are contained, and sometimes in an earlier form, in the Hieronymian Martyrology. The same is true of almost all the notices in Wright's Syrian Martyrology, except some commemorations of bishops of Antioch. The Hieronymian Martyrology contains moreover all, or almost all, the martyrs of Palestine, whose acts are recorded and dated by Eusebius, whereas only Pamphilus, and perhaps a few others, are inserted in the Syriac Martyrology. It contains also Antiochene festivals celebrated by Chrysostom that the Syriac omits. Of African martyrs it contains nearly all the names that are to be found in the extant Carthaginian Calendar, and a great multitude more. Often it supplies us with the proper names of martyrs whom that calendar groups together under some local designation.

Critics have agreed in considering the Hieronymian Martyrology as a canto compiled from many church calendars. The only great family of church calendars, according to De Buck, with which it has little or no connexion is the Constantinopolitan (Acta SS. Oct. xii. 185). Yet even here light may often be shed on its obscure notices by comparison of the Menology of Basil. The Syriac Martyrology is pronounced by the same scholar to be the key to the hitherto insoluble enigmas of the Hieronymian text (ib.). We might say that the lesser work was a sample of the greater. The consideration of this valuable document, which was undiscovered when De Rossi wrote, leads us to ask whether the traditional account of the origin of the Hieronymian Martyrology be not worthy of more attention than it has received of late.

There is abundant evidence of the existence of a tendency, at the close of the 4th century, towards closer intercommunion and greater uniformity between different churches. Formation of liturgies, translation of relics, performance of pilgrimages, all were leading up to the demand for a Martyrology that should be more than local. The influences were already at work that culminated in the dedication of the Pantheon. The two great families of Western liturgies beside the Roman, are said to owe their origin to Jerome's earlier contemporaries, Ambrose and Hilary: a third, the Mozarabic, owes something to Prudentius. The impulse towards the compilation of the Martyrology is said to have been Spanish. Jerome himself assisted Damasus in ordering the shrines of Rome; but while the shrines of the martyrs were most important there, the reading of their acts was more customary in the East. The materials that Aengus the Culdee professes to have used are similar to those assumed by the critics for the Hieronymian cento, with one exception: he had before him not only Ambrosian and Gallican liturgies, Damasian topographies, De Viris Illustribus, and the like, but the Martyrology of Eusebius.

The task of collecting and combining various church calendars from all parts of the world would be so arduous that it is difficult to understand how the tradition of the enterprise should have perished while the results remain. The tradition that is preserved is, as we have seen, quite different, and at least affords some explanation of the combination of Roman and Eastern features in the structure of the work. But however the compilation was effected, the epoch to which it should be assigned can hardly be later than the time of Jerome. The impulses towards unification received rude checks from the barbarian invasions, and were dispelled anew by the rise of the Nestorian controversy. If, however, we assign the Martyrology to the date towards which we are driven by historical considerations on either hand, it is difficult to discover any one more likely to have performed the work in the manner of which ample traces survive than the author to whom the tradition has assigned it, and for whom a claim has been put in, whether by a forger or by himself.

Whatever view may be ultimately adopted of the origin of the Hieronymian Martyrology, its connexion with ancient Christian life may be summarized as follows.

In its present form it is one of the two or three principal sources of all modern Western church calendars. There may have been, and probably was, some unintelligent commemoration, day by day, of the names marked in it at the celebration of the mass in certain Gallican, English, Irish, Flemish, and German monasteries, even in some Italian churches. But it is the corruption of a book that was similarly in liturgical use in Rome itself in the time of Gregory the Great. Corrupt as it is, it is one of the principal authorities to light us to the discovery of early festivals in various parts of the world. If a fresh and ancient martyrology be discovered, the first with which it should be compared is the Hieronymian, and the comparison is almost sure to be fruitful of interesting results. It contains many notices of ancient martyrdoms which would otherwise have been wholly lost to us. But, moreover, it is the extant representative of a work that resulted from an important movement in the church of the 4th century, and which forms the historic link between the heortologies of the ancient churches and the mediaeval monastic calendars.

It is much to be regretted that the compiler of the Martyrology thought only of honouring the martyrs and of profiting from their intercession, and did not attempt to edify the church by more copious extracts from their authentic and accessible acts.

C. The lesser Roman Martyrology was found at Ravenna by Ado, archbishop of Vienne, about A.D. 850, thought by him to be pretty old, reported to him to have been sent by a pope to an archbishop of Aquileia, transcribed by him and prefixed to his own Martyrology, as he tells us in the preface, omitted as superfluous by copyists, sought in vain by scholars, at last found at Cologne and edited by Rosweyd and claimed as the Martyrology mentioned by Gregory the Great, thrown into the shade by the discovery of the Hieronymian, supposed by Fiorentini a mere later epitome of Ado, maintained to be genuine but later than the Hieronymian by Sollier, proved genuine beyond doubt by De Rossi's discovery of another copy of Ado in the library of St. Gall (vol. 454) where this Martyrology follows the preface with the title, Incipit Martyrologium Romanum. This Martyrology is prefixed to Ado in Migne, t. cxxiii.

The whole tissue of this Martyrology, according to De Rossi, is that of a private historical essay, not of a public traditional calendar. The days assigned to the festivals in the old calendars are often exchanged for new dates, founded on histories that were in credit when the compilation was made, and most of the chief characters of Scripture have their set days, of which there is no trace in the ancient Fasti of any church whatsoever. The author has used Rufinus's version of Eusebius, and worked up the acts of the martyrs. The changes he has introduced in noting the festivals often coincide with the changes introduced into the pontifical book in the 8th century. The work seems to have been compiled in Rome, and notes some festivals there instituted at the end of the 7th and beginning of the 8th century. This does not prove it to have been publicly taken into use at the time. It is almost contemporary with Bede and with the last recension of Jerome. Its method of composition is similar to that claimed for Jerome, except that the Acts on which it is based are mostly religious fictions. See De Rossi, Rom. Sott. i. 125; ii. xxvii–xxxi, or De Smedt, Int. Generalis, pp. 134–137.

IV. Martyrologies that add some details of the martyrdoms.—The difference between the Hieronymian Martyrologies and the series headed by Bede may be thus expressed: the one are replete with fossil fragments of genuine antiquity, from which the skilled archaeologist can reconstruct and reclothe skeletons of ancient facts; the other present us with such miniature outlines of martyrs as were had in veneration by the church of the age of Charlemagne.

Bede, at the end of the 7th and beginning of the 8th century, was contemporary with the last recension of the Hieronymian Maryrology. He was acquainted probably with that form of it; but his work is chiefly drawn from the pontifical books and the Acts of the martyrs. It is the outcome of the same dissatisfaction with the chaos of the current books, as was felt by his anonymous contemporary who framed the Romanum parvum; but he struck more at the root of the evil. Instead of recasting the calendar to bring it into conformity with the supposed knowledge of the times, he has been content to confess ignorance. He was content to leave many days vacant rather than adorn them with a string of names without meaning. Describing his own work in the catalogue of his writings at the close of his Church History, he claims to have given all those martyrs of whom anything was known in the world in which he lived. Thus he heads the long series of martyrologies in which short histories were added to their names. People soon made up their minds that they knew something about some more. Bede's work was enlarged again and again. We only possess it in the enlarged edition.

These three Martyrologies, the Hieronymian, the Roman, Bede's, are the three original sources of almost all Western martyrologies and calendars. We must just distinguish the chief martyrologies of the 9th century, because it is only through Ado and Usuard that the lesser Roman work has become known.

Florus, subdeacon of Lyons, A.D. 830, first enlarged the work of Bede. The Bollandists, Henschen and Papebroch, published in the first volume of the Acta SS. for March a not very trustworthy, nor indeed feasible, attempt to purge the original Martyrology from the subsequent additions; but they remain indistinguishable, and we cannot even be sure that we have the work as it was left by Florus. This edition, Martyrologium Bedae in 8 antiquis MSS. acceptum cum Auctario Flori ex 3 codd. collatione discincto, is reprinted by Migne, Patr. xciv. 799.

Rabanus, archbishop of Maintz, further enlarged the Martyrology of Florus, and worked it up with the Hieronymian. His work is printed by Migne, Patr. cx. 1121.

Ado, archbishop of Vienne, was acquainted with Bede's work as enlarged by Florus, but not with Rabanus. His work was undertaken as an expansion of that of Florus, but was really modelled on the lesser Roman, and became rather a collection of brief lives of the saints than a martyrology. It answers more nearly to the menologies of the Greeks, except that it is not put forth authoritatively for ecclesiastical reading, but merely as a private manual. Yet the influence of his work through Usuard transformed ecclesiastical usage and recast the calendar.

Usuard, a monk of Paris, about A.D. 875, has faithfully epitomised Ado's work, which (according to Sollier) was known to him as 'The Commentary of Florus.' He does not seem to have been acquainted with the work of Rabanus. "Jerome," he says, "has studied brevity too much, Bede has left many days untouched." He endeavours to supply their deficiencies, and also to reconcile the discrepancies of various commemorations. He was the first really to popularise the works of Ado and the anonymous Roman, but his own book has assumed almost as many forms as those of Bede or Jerome, and has become the source of most existing Western calendars. The interpolations and variations are fully treated in the edition by Sollier, which forms the 6th volume for June of the Acta Sanctorum, and is reprinted in Migne, P. L. cxxiii.

Notker was a monk of St. Gall, who died in A.D. 912. He combined Ado and Rabanus. His work will be found in Migne, cxxxi. 1026.

Thus Bede was enlarged by Florus and Rabanus, from the first enlargement and the lesser Roman grew Ado's work, from the second and Ado's work grew Notker's, but Usuard's that grew out of Ado's alone became the most celebrated.

V. Metrical Martyrologies.—As the enlarged martyrologies that we have just been considering seem to be an imitation of the Greek menologies, so metrical martyrologies may have taken their rise from the Greek practice of reciting daily in the service iambic distichs, sometimes of much beauty, describing the triumph of each of the martyrs celebrated, followed, in the case of the chief of them alone, by an hexameter line fixing the day of the passion. A collection of such hexameter lines, which are always sad doggerel, would form a metrical martyrology. One such has been extracted from the Menaea by Godofredus Siberus (Ecclesiae Graecae Martyrologium Metricum, Leipzig, 1727), who has added the half rhythmical menology of Christopher of Mitylene.

The little poem ascribed to Bede (Patrol. Lat. xciv. 603) is hardly worth calling a martyrology, but seems to be genuine (De Smedt, p. 138; Binterim, v. i. 58). Wandalbert, a monk of the diocese of Treves, at the age of thirty-five, in or about A.D. 842, wrote a martyrology in hexameters, independent of Bede and the lesser Roman. It contains many things not to be found elsewhere, which he claims to have taken from authentic old books by the help of Florus of Lyons who possessed them, but critics are suspicious (Patrol. cxxi. 575).

The FEILIRE of Aengus the Culdee may be called a metrical martyrology. We have here only to add to the article on that head, that it exists in three vellum MSS., two in the Bodleian and one in the library of the Royal Irish Academy. There is a recent paper copy in the library of the university of Cambridge, and another of the 17th century made from an independent authority in the Burgundian library at Brussels. It differs from the Tamlaght or Tallaght Martyrology of the same Aengus and Macbruain, published by the Rev. M. Kelly, D.D. (Dublin, 1857), which has been generally supposed the earlier work, in giving only a selection of Irish martyrs and including many valuable notices concerning those of various lands (Forbes, Scottish Calendars, pp. xiv–xvii).

Literature.—Our article is mainly drawn from De' Rossi (Roma Sotterranea, t. i. pp. 111–118, 122–128; t. ii. pp. iii–xxxii). The preface by Baronius to the Roman Martyrology, the dissertations and notes of Sollier (Usuardinum Martyrologium, apud Acta SS. Bolland. Jun. t. vi. in Migne, Patrol. cxxiii.), and of Fiorentini (Vetustius Occidentalis Ecclesiae Martyrologium, Lucae, 1667) are to be consulted. De Smedt (Introductio generalis ad Historiam ecclesiasticam critice tractandam, pp. 127–140, 193–197, Louvain, 1876) translates De' Rossi on the lesser Roman martyrology (p. 130 ff.), reprints Matagne on the actual Roman martyrology (p. 141 ff.), and the pontifical and martyrology of Philocalus in his appendix. He had intended to give a list of all extant calendars and martyrologies, but found the task too arduous. De Smedt states that four Jacobite calendars are edited by the Assemanis, Bibliothecae Vaticanae MSS. t. ii. codd. 37, 39, 68, and three orthodox Syrian calendars (ibid. pp. 18, 114, 151), one of which is taken from Miniscalco's Jerusalem Evangelistarium (Verona, 1861). Two more of the orthodox Syrian are given by Mai (Scriptores Veteres, t. ii. pt. ii. pp. 46, 169). Four Coptic calendars are published, two by Mai (ibid. pp. 14, 93), and two by Selden (de Synedriis). The second of Selden's is re-edited by Ludolf, and collated with a far more valuable Ethiopic calendar of about the 12th century (Commentarius ad Historiam Aethiopicam, pp. 389–436). No ancient and authentic Armenian calendars are known. De Buck has written a treatise, Des Calendriers Orientaux, in De Backer, Bibliothèque des écrivains de la Compagnie de Jésus, t. iii. p. 383.

For Western Martyrologies we may refer to Binterim (Denkwürdigkeiten der Kirche, Mainz, 1829, t. v. pt. i. pp. 42–73). A number of monastic martyrologies and calendars are given by Martene (Collectio Amplissima, t. vi.), and by Migne—namely, a Gallican calendar, Patrol. lxxii. 607; one by Protadius of Besançon, A.D. 615, lxxx. 411; an English calendar, xciv. 1147; a calendar of Modena, cvi. 821; of Mantua, cxxxviii. 1257; of Brescia, 1285; two of Vallombrosa, 1279; of Lucca, 1291; one ascribed to Bede, 1293; of Fleury, 1185; of Stavelo, near Liége, 1194; of Werthen, near Cologne, 1203; of Auxerre, 1209.

An ancient Hispano-Gothic calendar is given by Migne at the end of the Mozarabic liturgy (Patrol. t. lxxxv.).

The Gothic calendar will be found in Mai (Vet. Script. Coll. v. i. 66), a mural martyrology, from the church of St. Silvester at Rome (ib. p. 56), another marble tablet with a complete calendar of the 9th century discovered at Naples (ib. p. 58), and the martyrology of Philocalus (ib. p. 54). The Naples marble has been discussed in three volumes 4to by Mazzochi and in twelve volumes 4to by Sabbatini. It is the most authentic example of an early Greek calendar.

The article on "Martyrologie" in the Dictionnaire des Persécutions in Migne's Theological Encyclopedia is merely a translation of Ruinart's answer to Dodwell's Dissertatio Cyprianica de Paucitate Martyrum. [E. B. B.]

MARY. [MARIA.]

MARY THE VIRGIN, FESTIVALS OF. In the Eastern Orthodox Church there are three classes of Festivals, the Great Festivals, the Middle Festivals, the Little Festivals. Among the Great Festivals are reckoned:—1. The Hypapante, Feb. 2nd; 2. The Annunciation, March 25th; 3. The Sleep of the Theotokos, Aug. 15th; 4. The Nativity of the Theotokos, Sept. 8th; 5. The Presentation of the Theotokos, Nov. 21st. Among the Middle Festivals is reckoned, in the Russian Church, the Protection of the Theotokos, Oct. 1st; and in the calendar of Constantinople there are the Depositing of the honourable Vestment of the Theotokos in Blachernae, July 2nd; the Depositing of the honourable Girdle of the Theotokos, Aug. 31; the Conception of Anne the Mother of the Theotokos, Dec. 9th; the Synaxis of the Theotokos and of Joseph her spouse, Dec. 26th. In the Russian calendar there are also fourteen commemorations of miraculous icons of the Theotokos.

In the Armenian calendar there occur:—1. The Purification, Feb. 14th; 2. The Assumption, on the Sunday following Aug. 15th; 3. The Invention of the Girdle, about Aug. 31st; 4. The Nativity, Sept. 8th; 5. The Presentation, Nov. 21st; 6. The Conception, Dec. 9th.

In the Ethiopic calendar there is a monthly festival of St. Mary, as there is of our Lord's nativity, of St. Michael, and of the three patriarchs; and the following specific festivals:—1. The Death of St. Mary, Jan. 16th; 2. The Purification, Feb. 2nd; 3. The Conception of Christ, March 25th; 4. The Nativity, April 26th; 5. The Purification of Anna, July 14th; 6. The Burial of St. Mary, Aug. 8th; 7. The Assumption, Aug. 9th; 8. The Nativity, Sept. 7th; 9. The Presentation, Nov. 29th; 10. The Conception, Dec. 12th

In the Roman calendar there are some festivals of St. Mary which are observed universally throughout Roman Christendom, some that are observed only locally; but these local festivals have for their sanction the full authority of the Roman see, and the offices to be used on them are published in the Breviary. The festivals of universal obligation are:—1. The Purification, Feb. 2nd; 2. The Annunciation, March 25th; 3. The Festival of the Seven Sorrows, on the Friday preceding Good Friday; 4. The Visitation, July 2nd; 5. The Feast of St. Mary of Mount Carmel, July 16th; 6. The Feast of the Dedication of St. Mary at Snows, Aug. 5th; 7. The Assumption, Aug. 15th; 8. The Nativity, Sept. 8th; 9. The Feast of the Most Holy Name of Mary, Sept. 15th; 10. The Festival of the Seven Sorrows (a second time), the third Sunday in September; 11. The Festival of Blessed Mary de Mercede, Sept. 24th; 12. The Feast of the Most Holy Rosary of the Blessed Virgin Mary, the first Sunday in October; 13. The Presentation, Nov. 21st; 14. The Conception, Dec. 8th. Every Saturday in the year and the whole of the month of May are also dedicated to her honour. The local, but yet authorised, festivals relating to her are:—1. The Espousals of the Blessed Virgin Mary, Jan. 23rd; 2. The Feast of the Blessed Virgin Mary, the Aid of Christians, May 24th; 3. The Most Pure Heart of the Blessed Virgin Mary, the next Sunday but one after the Assumption, that is, about the end of August; 4. The Maternity of the Blessed Virgin Mary, the second Sunday in October; 5. The Purity of the Blessed Virgin Mary, the third Sunday in October; 6. The Protection of the Blessed Virgin Mary, the fourth Sunday in October or a Sunday in November; 7. The Translation of the Holy House of Loretto, Dec. 10th; 8. The Expectation of the Blessed Virgin Mary's delivery of a child, Dec. 18th. The Feast of the Dedication of St. Mary at Martyrs, May 13th, has been allowed to drop from the calendar.

The Anglican calendar contains two classes of festivals. Among the red-letter or first-class festivals are reckoned:—1. The Purification, Feb. 2nd; 2. The Annunciation, March 25th. Among the black-letter or second-class festivals occur:—1. The Visitation, July 2nd; 2. The Nativity, Sept. 28th; 3. The Conception, Dec. 8th.

It will be seen from the above that the Festivals of the Purification, the Annunciation, the Visitation, the Nativity, the Conception, are common to the existing calendars of all churches that have calendars; that the Greek and Latin churches agree in celebrating the Assumption and the Presentation: that the Byzantine and Armenian churches agree in observing the Festival of the Girdle; that the Byzantine church stands alone in observing the Festival of the Vestment; the Russian in observing the Festival of the Protection (a different commemoration from that of the Latin church which bears a similar name), and the feasts of some icons; the Ethiopic in observing the days of St. Mary's death and burial as distinct from the Assumption, besides a monthly-recurring festival in her honour; the Roman church in observing the Seven Sorrows (twice), St. Mary of Mount Carmel, St. Mary at Snows, the Most Holy Name, the Protection, Blessed Mary de Mercede, the Rosary, the Espousals, the Help of Christians, the Most Pure Heart, the Maternity, the Purity, the Holy House of Loretto, the Expected Delivery, besides all Saturdays and, of late, the whole of the month of May.

We notice these festivals in the chronological order in which they were instituted.

1. THE PURIFICATION (Ὑπαπαντή, Ὑπαντή, Occursus, Obviatio, Praesentatio, Festum SS. Simeonis et Annae, Purificatio, Candelaria, Candlemas). As first instituted, this was not a Festival of St. Mary, but of our Lord; and so it has always remained in the Eastern church. Its original name, still retained in the East, was Ὑπαπαντή, sometimes written Ὑπαντή, rendered into Latin by "Occursus" or "Obviatio," meaning the "meeting" of our Lord with Simeon and Anna in the Temple (Luke ii. 27–38). In the West it came to be called the Feast of the Purification, and, except in the Ambrosian church, to be regarded as one of the Festivals of St. Mary, because this meeting took place on the occasion of the Purification of St. Mary.

Its institution.—It is not altogether certain whether it was instituted by Justin, emperor of Constantinople, in the year of our Lord 526, or by his son Justinian, in the year 541 or 542. Cedrenus, an historian of the 11th century, assigns its institution to Justin (Historiarum Compendium, p. 366, Paris, 1647); the other Byzantine historians, to Justinian (see Nicephorus Callistus, Hist. Eccles. lib. xvii. c. 28; Theophanes, Chronographia, p. 188, Paris, 1655; Historia Miscellanea, lib. xvi. apud Muratorium, tom. i. p. 108, Milan, 1723). It happens that the latter historians have made use of expressions which need not force us to conclude that the festival had no existence before the time of Justinian, but only that it was made by him of oecumenical observance, or of obligation in Constantinople, or of obligation on the 2nd of February.[a] Accordingly, Dr. Neale (Holy Eastern Church, Introd. vol. ii. p. 771, Lond. 1850) supposes it was only transferred by Justinian to Feb. 2nd from Feb. 14th, the day on which it is observed by the Armenians. But it is probable that Nicephorus and Theophanes meant to state that it was Justinian who originally instituted the festival. Sigebertus (Chronicon. in ann. 542, apud Bibl. Patr., De la Bigne, tom. viii. p. 1388, Paris, 1589), Calvisius (Opus Chronologicum, in ann. 541, Frankfort, 1650), Baronius (Martyrologium, Feb. 2, Rome, 1586), Basnage (Annales, tom. iii. p. 752, Rotterdam, 1706), Fleury (Hist. Eccles. liv. xxxiii. 7, Paris, 1732), and the great majority of authorities consider Justinian to be its author; and there is little doubt that they are right, though the idea of establishing it may have sprung up in the last year of the reign of his predecessor, and some steps may have been taken towards realising it, which were for the time abortive. The Centuriators of Magdeburg assign its institution to pope Vigilius, Justinian's contemporary (Cent. vi. col. 678, Basle, 1562). Baronius conjectures that "a way was opened towards its celebration in the West," and that possibly it was instituted there by pope Gelasius about thirty years before Justinian, on the abrogation of the Lupercalia; but his conjecture rests on no ground of evidence. The Oratio de Symeone et Annâ, seu, In Festum Occursûs et Purificationis B. Mariae, attributed to Methodius, bishop of Tyre, A.D. 290, which, if genuine, would imply that the festival was of a very early date, was probably written by a Methodius of Constantinople in the 9th century. Similar orations attributed to Cyril of Jerusalem, A.D. 350, and to Amphilochius, A.D. 370, and to Gregory Nyssen, A.D. 370, are spurious. So are a Sermo in Occursum Domini, attributed to St. Athanasius, A.D. 325, and a Sermo de Purificatione B. Mariae, attributed to St. Ambrose, A.D. 374, and many more sermons alleged to have been delivered on the day by different early writers. Baronius "does not hesitate to declare that no Greek or Latin father before Justinian has left a sermon on the day of the Occursus" (Martyr. Feb. 2).

Its date in the calendar.—The 2nd day of February is necessarily the date of the festival, because that is the fortieth day after Jan. 25th, which, since the time of St. Chrysostom, that is, a century and a half before the date of Justinian, had become accepted as the day of the Nativity of Christ in the East as well as in the West. It would consequently have been the day on which St. Mary, having borne a man-child, would have made the offering appointed by the law (Lev. xii. 4) for her (or their) (Luke ii. 22) purification. The Armenian church observes the festival on Feb. 14th, because it counts Jan. 6th to be the day of the Nativity, as the whole of the East once counted it.

The occasion of its institution is supposed to be the occurrence of earthquakes, plague, and famine, mentioned by the Byzantine historians as having taken place in Asia Minor and Constantinople in the reigns of Justin and Justinian.

It has been suggested that the purpose of its founders was to supply the place of the Amburbalia, Lupercalia, the Feast of Ceres, and other Roman festivities which had been abolished, and the loss of which was felt by the populace (Durandus, Rationale Divinorum Officiorum, lib. vii. c. 7, Venice, 1577; Belethus, Explicatio Divin. Offic. c. 81, ad calcem Durandi, Venice, 1577; Baronius, Martyrol. Feb. 2; Benedictus Papa XIV., de Festis, apud Migne, Theol. Curs. Compl. tom. xxvi. p. 144, Paris, 1842). It is, however, more probable that the primary object with which it was instituted was simply to commemorate an event in the life of our Lord which was believed to call for a special commemoration. After its establishment there was no unwillingness to regard it as a hallowed substitute for an unholy orgy, a Christian Purification Festival in place of a Pagan Lustration Feast, held as before in the early part of the month of February. (See Rabanus Maurus, de Institut. Cle ricorum, lib. ii. c. 33, apud Magn. Bibl. Patrum, tom. x. p. 602.)

Similarly the ceremony of consecrating and distributing candles, and marching in procession with them in the hands (whence the names Candelaria, Candlemas) probably arose from "a desire to put Christians in remembrance of Christ, the spiritual light, of whom Symeon did prophesy, as is read in the church that day" (L'Estrange, Alliance of Divine Offices, c. v. Oxf. 1846); in other words, to illustrate the 32nd verse of Luke ii. "a light to lighten the Gentiles." But after a time the idea was readily welcomed that it had been introduced with the view of assimilating the Christian festival to the heathen feast; so readily, indeed, that pope Benedict XIV. regards any other as almost heretical. Baronius attributes the introduction of the procession to Sta. Maria Maggiore to Sergius I., who lived in the 7th century. but he believes that the use of the candles originated before that time, as they are mentioned by Eligius (Hom. ii., Op. apud Migne, Patrol. tom. lxxxvii. p. 597), who lived A.D. 665. Fulbert, bishop of Chartres at the beginning of the 11th century, explains the symbolism which by that time it was believed might be found in the virgin wax of which the candles were made (Sermo, apud Magn. Bibl. Patrum, tom. iii. p. 502). The fifth council of Milan, A.D. 1573, enlarges on the manifold use and benefits of the candles (Hard. Concil. tom. x. p. 971). The procession came to be regarded as representing the walk of St. Mary and Joseph to the Temple on the day of the Purification.

2. The Annunciation (Εὐαγγελισμός, Annunciatio).

Its institution.—There is no historical account of the institution of this festival, as there is of the Purification. It is found existing in the 7th century, but the occasion of its establishment is not known. An attempt was made to claim a very high antiquity for it by appealing to three Addresses, delivered on the festival, which were assigned by Vossius to Gregory Thaumaturgus, and may yet be found bound up with the latter's genuine writings in some editions of his works (Sermones III. in Annunc. S. M. Virginis apud Op. Greg. Thaum. p. 9, Paris, 1622). Their spuriousness is undoubted (see Bellarmine, de Script. Eccles., Op. tom. vii. p. 39, Col. Agrip. 1617; Tyler, Worship of the Virgin, Appendix A, Lond. 1851). The same is to be said of an Address attributed to Athanasius, called Sermo in Annunciationem Sanctae Dominae Nostrae Deiparae, and printed with St. Athanasius' works (Op. tom. ii. p. 393, ed. Bened. Paris, 1698), which was not written till after the Monothelite controversy (see Baronius, apud Opp. S. Athanasii, p. 391; Cave, Historia Literaria, s. v. Athanasius). And the same must be said of many more sermons alleged to have been delivered on the occasion of the festival by fathers and early writers. The sermons attributed to Peter Chrysologus, A.D. 440 (apud Migne, Patrolog. tom. lii. p. 575, Paris, 1845), may possibly have been composed by archbishop Felix, one of his successors in the see of Ravenna, A.D. 708, or more probably by [illegible] namesake, Peter Damiani, in the 11th century (see Tillemont, Histoire Ecclésiastique, tom. xv. note vi. p. 856, Paris, 1711). Two homilies In Annunciationem Beatae Mariae, attributed to Anastasius of Sinai, A.D. 560, would appear to be the production of one Anastasius Abbas, who lived in the 8th century. The first trustworthy evidence of the existence of the festival is found in the first chapter of the Acts of the tenth council of Toledo, which was held A.D. 656. The council declares that, whereas the Feast of the Holy Virgin was kept at different times in different places in Spain, and could not be kept in Lent without transgressing traditional rule, it should be observed on the octave before Christmas day. The rule to which reference is here made is the 51st canon of the council of Laodicea, held in the 4th century, which forbids the observance of the Nativities of Martyrs (a phrase which at that time was equivalent to Holy days) in Lent.[b] The second reference to the festival is found in the acts of the council in Trullo, held A.D. 692, which permitted the observance of this holy day in Lent, while it continued the Laodicean prohibition of all others.[c] The date of the institution of the festival may therefore be fixed as being at the end of the 6th or the beginning of the 7th century. The council of Metz makes no mention of it among the festivals ordered by it to be observed in the year of our Lord 813 (can. xxxvi.); nor does it appear in company with the Purification in the list of festivals given in the Capitularies of Charles the Great or Ludvig (Capit. ab Ansegiso collecta, lib. i. § 158; ii. § 33).

The date in the calendar is March 25th, as being nine months before the nativity of Christ. St. Augustine speaks of March 25th as being the day on which it was believed that the conception of our Lord took place, inasmuch as Dec. 25th was regarded as the day of his birth (De Trin. lib. iv. c. v., Op. tom. viii. p. 894, ed. Migne). The Armenian church, which observes Jan. 6th as the Nativity as well as the Epiphany of Christ, has not the Festival of the Annunciation in its calendar.

Like the Feast of the Purification, this festival was instituted in honour of our Lord, and in commemoration of his conception; but it probably passed more readily and quickly than the sister festival from the list of the Dominican to that of the Marian Festivals, as the original idea is not preserved in its title (as it is in the Hypapante), except in the Ethiopian calendar, where it is not called the Annunciation but the Conception of Christ.

The purpose, therefore, of the festival is to commemorate (1) the announcement made by the angel Gabriel to St. Mary that she should conceive and bring forth the promised Messiah, and (2) the conception of our Lord which followed that announcement (Luke i. 26–38). The place where this announcement was made was the house in Nazareth in which St. Mary lived. The legend of Loretto has transferred this house to Italy; the exact spot where it took place is nevertheless pointed out both by Greeks and Latins, a different spot by each, as still existing in Palestine.

3. THE ASSUMPTION (Κοίμησις, Μετάστασις, Dormitio, Pausatio, Transitus, Depositio, Migratio, Assumptio).

Its institution.—This festival was instituted, according to the statement of Nicephorus Callistus (Hist. Eccles. lib. xvii. c. 28), by the emperor Maurice, who lived at the close of the 6th and the beginning of the 7th century. In the time of Charles the Great, two centuries later, its observance was not yet universal in the West (Capit. ab Ansegiso collecta, lib. i. § 158, apud Migne, Patrolog. tom. xcvii. p. 533, Paris, 1851).[d] But it appears to have been received after deliberation by Charles, and it is recognised by his son Ludvig in the year 818 or 819 (ibid. lib. ii. c. 35, p. 547). An octave was added to the festival by pope Leo IV., A.D. 847.

Its date in the calendar is August 15th.

The purpose of the festival is to commemorate the assumption of St. Mary into heaven in body and soul. The origin of the belief that she was so assumed, and the steps by which it grew are as follows:—

In the 3rd or 4th century there was composed a book, embodying the Gnostic and Collyridian traditions as to the death of St. Mary, called De Transitu Virginis Mariae Liber. The book exists still, and may be found in the Bibliotheca Patrum Maxima (tom. ii. pt. ii. p. 212). The legend contained in it relates how St. Mary, after her Son's death, went and lived at Bethlehem for twenty-one years, after which time an angel appeared to her, and told her that her soul should be taken from her body. So she was wafted on a cloud to Jerusalem, and the apostles, who had been miraculously gathered together, carried her to Gethsemane, and there her soul was taken up into Paradise by Gabriel. Then the apostles bore her body to the Valley of Jehoshaphat, and laid it in a new tomb; and suddenly by the side of the tomb appeared her son Christ, who raised up her body lest it should see corruption, and reuniting it with her soul, which Michael brought back from Paradise, had her conveyed by angels to heaven.

It will be seen that the Liber de Transitu Mariae contains already the whole of the story of the Assumption. But down to the end of the 5th century this story was regarded by the church as a Gnostic or Collyridian fable, and the Liber de Transitu was condemned as heretical by the Decretum de Libris Canonicis Ecclesiasticis et Apocryphis, attributed to pope Gelasius, A.D. 494. How then did it pass across the borders and establish itself within the church, so as to have a festival appointed to commemorate it? In the following manner:—

In the sixth century a great change passed over the sentiments and the theology of the church in reference to the θεοτόκος—an unintended but very noticeable result of the Nestorian controversies, which in maintaining the true doctrine of the Incarnation incidentally gave a strong impulse to what became the Worship of St. Mary. In consequence of this change of sentiment, during the 6th and 7th centuries (or later), (1) the Liber de Transitu, though classed by Gelasius with the known productions of heretics came to be attributed by one ("otiosus quispiam," says Baronius) to Melito, an orthodox bishop of Sardis, in the 2nd century, and by another to St. John the Apostle; (2) a letter suggesting the possibility of the Assumption was written and attributed to St. Jerome (ad Paulam et Eustochium de Assumptione B. Virginis, Op. tom. v. p. 82, Paris, 1706); (3) a treatise to prove it not impossible was composed and attributed to St. Augustine (Op. tom. vi. p. 1142, ed. Migne); (4) two sermons supporting the belief were written and attributed to St. Athanasius (Op. tom. ii. pp. 393, 416, ed. Ben. Paris, 1698). (5) an insertion was made in Eusebius's Chronicle that "in the year 48 Mary the Virgin was taken up into heaven, as some wrote that they had had it revealed to them." Thus the authority of the names of St. John, of Melito, of Athanasius, of Eusebius, of Augustine, of Jerome, was obtained for the belief by a series of forgeries readily accepted because in accordance with the sentiment of the day, and the Gnostic legend was attributed to orthodox writers who did not entertain it. But this was not all, for there is the clearest evidence (1) that no one within the church taught it for six centuries, and (2) that those who did first teach it within the church borrowed it directly from the book condemned by pope Gelasius as heretical. For the first person within the church who held and taught it was Juvenal, bishop of Jerusalem (if a homily attributed to John Damascene containing a quotation from "the Euthymiac history" (Op. tom. ii. p. 880, Venice, 1748) be for the moment considered genuine), who (according to this statement) on Marcian and Pulcheria's sending to him for information as to St. Mary's sepulchre, replied to them by narrating a shortened version of the De Transitu legend as "a most ancient and true tradition." The second person within the church who taught it (or the first, if the homily attributed to John Damascene relating the above tale of Juvenal be spurious, as it almost certainly is) was Gregory of Tours, A.D. 590, who in his De Gloriâ Martyrum (lib. i. c. 4) writes as follows: "When Blessed Mary had finished the course of this life, and was now called away from the world, all the apostles were gathered together at her house from all parts of the world; and when they heard that she was to be taken away they watched with her, and behold! the Lord Jesus came with his angels, and taking her soul, gave it to Michael the Archangel, and went away. In the morning the apostles took up her body with the bed, and placed it in a monument, and watched it, waiting for the coming of the Lord. And behold! a second time the Lord appeared, and commanded her to be taken up and carried in a cloud to Paradise, where now, having resumed her soul, she enjoys the never-ending blessings of eternity, rejoicing with her elect." The Abbé Migne points out in a note that "what Gregory here relates of the death of the Blessed Virgin and its attendant circumstances he undoubtedly drew (procul dubio hausit) from the Pseudo-Melito's Liber de Transitu B. Mariae, which is classed among apocryphal books by pope Gelasius." He adds that this account, with the circumstances related by Gregory, were soon after introduced into the Gallican Liturgy. It is very seldom that we are able to trace a tale from its birth onwards so clearly and unmistakably as this. It is demonstrable that the Gnostic legend passed into the church through Gregory or Juvenal, and so became an accepted tradition within it. The next writers on the subject are Andrew of Crete, who is supposed to have lived about A.D. 635; Hildephonsus of Toledo, A.D. 657; and John of Damascus, who lived about A.D. 730, if writings attributed to any of them are genuine, which is quite doubtful. Pope Benedict XIV. says naively that "the most ancient Fathers of the Primitive Church are silent as to the bodily assumption of the Blessed Virgin, but the fathers of the middle and latest ages, both Greeks and Latins, relate it in the distinctest terms" (De Fest. Assumpt. apud Migne, Theol. Curs. Compl. tom. xxvi. p. 144, Paris, 1842). It was under the shadow of the names of Gregory of Tours and of these "fathers of the middle and latest ages, Greek and Latin," that the De Transitu legend became accepted as a catholic tradition (see Alban Butler, Lives of the Saints, Aug. 15).

[c] The words are: Παρατὸς σαββάτου καὶ κυριακῆς καὶ τῆς ἁγίας τοῦ εὐαγγελισμοῦ ἡμέρας (Hard. Concil. tom. iii. p. 1681).

[d] Charles the Great's Capitulare, after recounting the festivals, says: "De Assumptione Sanctae Mariae interrogandum relinquimus." The treatise De Assumptione B. V. Virginis, attributed to St. Augustine and bound up with his works (tom. vi. p. 1142, ed. Migne) has been thought to have been a reply by one of Charles's bishops to his inquiry on the subject, as it begins, "Ad interrogata de Virginis et Matris Domini resolutione temporali et assumptione perenni quid intelligam respondeatis."

The history, therefore, of the belief which this festival was instituted to commemorate is as follows:—It was first taught in the 3rd or 4th century as part of the Gnostic legend of St. Mary's death, and it was regarded by the church as a Gnostic and Collyridian fable down to the end of the 5th century. It was brought into the church in the 6th, 7th, and 8th centuries, partly by a series of successful forgeries, partly by the adoption of the Gnostic legend on the part of accredited teachers, writers, and liturgists. And a festival in commemoration of the event, thus come to be believed, was instituted in the East at the beginning of the 7th, in the West at the beginning of the 9th century.

4. The Nativity (Γενεθλιον τῆς Θεοτόκου, Nativitas).

Its institution.—This festival is said to have been established by pope Sergius I., in the year 695, on the representation of a monk (religiosus quidam) that he had for several years following heard the angels singing on the night of Sept. 8, and that it had been revealed to him that the reason for which they sang was that St. Mary had been born on that night. The pope, says Durandus, established the festival in order that we and the angels might commemorate the event at the same time (Divin. Offic. lib. vii. c. 28). Belethus confirms Durandus' statement (Explic. Divin. Offic. c. 149). Baronius has thrown out a suggestion, as he has done with regard to the date of the "Ave Maria," that it might have been instituted soon after the Council of Ephesus, "because from that time the worship of the most Blessed Virgin grew and increased more and more every day throughout the world;" he does not however presume to say that it was established then, but, on the contrary, acknowledges that "it was unknown in the Gallican church in the time of Charles the Great and Ludvig the Pious" (Martyrol. in Sept. 8); as indeed may be seen by its absence from their lists of the festivals (Capit. ab Ansegiso collecta, lib. i. § 153; ii. § 33). In a calendar of Milan, supposed by Muratori (tom. ii. pt. ii. p. 1021, Milan, 1723) to be of the date A.D. 1000, the Nativity is noted as being specially observed at Foligno, as though it were not yet general even in Italy. A sermon attributed to St. Augustine, and quoted by the Breviary as delivered on the Feast of the Nativity of St. Mary, is, of course, spurious (Serm. exciv. alias De Sanctis, xviii. tom. v. p. 2104, ed. Migne).

The purpose of the festival is to commemorate the birth of St. Mary as it is recounted in the apocryphal gospels, the Protevangelion, and the Gospel of the Birth of Mary. Nothing whatever is known of St. Mary's birth. We do not know the names of her parents, or anything at all about her early life. When we have stated that she was of the tribe of Judah and descended from David, that she had a sister named, like herself, Mary, and that she was connected by marriage with Elizabeth, we have said all that can be known with respect to her previous to her betrothal to Joseph. But as early as the 2nd or 3rd century there were composed and disseminated among the Gnostics, the Protevangelion, and the Gospel of the Birth of Mary, which are an application and adaptation of the history of our Lord's birth and childhood to St. Mary. The legend, as contained in these apocryphal gospels, narrates that Joachim and Anna, of the race of David, lived piously together as husband and wife for twenty years at Nazareth; that at the end of this time Joachim was roughly rebuked by the high priest, and Anna bitterly jeered at by her maid, because they had no child; that Joachim went into the wilderness and fasted for forty days, and Anna went into her garden and prayed that she might have a child as Sarai had; and two angels appeared to Anna, and promised her a child; and Joachim returned, and the child was born, and her name was called Mary (Giles, Codex Apocryphus Novi Testamenti, pp. 33, 47, Lond. 1847). These legends of St. Mary's birth were repudiated by the early church, and regarded by it as belonging to a body external and hostile to itself. Like the legends of her death, they crept into the church in the 6th, 7th, and 8th centuries. Pope Benedict XIV. allows that "there is nothing about her nativity in Holy Scripture, and all that is said about it is drawn from turbid fountains," which he explains to mean the Protevangelion and the other legends (De Fest. Nativ. B. Virginis, apud Migne, Theol. Curs. Complet. p. 611).

5. THE PRESENTATION (Τὰ εἰσόδια τῆς θεοτόκου. Praesentatio Beatae Mariae Virginis).

Its institution.—The Festival of the Presentation of St. Mary at the Temple is supposed by some to have been established at Constantinople about A.D. 730. There is certain evidence of its existence there in A.D. 1150. But it did not pass into the West till A.D. 1375. (See Launoius, Regii Navarrae Gymnasii Parisiensis Historia, pt. i. c. 10, p. 77, Paris, 1677.) It was withdrawn from the Roman calendar by Pius V., but restored by Sixtus V. on the prayer of Turrianus.

Its purpose is to commemorate the presentation of St. Mary as narrated in the Gnostic legend which is embodied in the Protevangelion and the Gospel of the Birth of Mary. The legend states that when St. Mary was three years old her parents brought her to the Temple to dedicate her to the Lord; and that she walked up the fifteen steps leading into the Temple by herself, and the high priest placed her on the third step of the altar; and she danced with her feet; and all the house of Israel loved her. She is said to have remained at the Temple till she was twelve or fourteen years old, food being brought to her by the angels. This legend, like that of her nativity and her assumption, crept into the church during the 6th, 7th, and 8th centuries.

6. THE DEPOSITING OF THE HONOURABLE VESTMENT OF THE THEOTOKOS IN BLACHERNAE (Κατάθεσις ἐσθῆτος τιμίας τῆς θεοτόκου).

This festival claims to have been instituted at the date of the events commemorated by it, in the 5th century, but it would appear to have been first observed in the 9th century. Its date in the calendar of the Byzantine church is July 2nd. Its purpose is to commemorate the laying up or depositing in the church of Blachernae in Constantinople of (1) the grave-clothes of St. Mary (τὰ ἐντάφια), supposed to have been sent (according to Nicephorus Callistus' statement) by Juvenal of Jerusalem from Palestine to Marcian and Pulcheria, and (2) her vestment (τιμία ἐσθής) said to have been stolen from Galilee by Calvius and Candidus in the time of Leo Magnus, successor to Marcian (Menaeon for July 2, Constantinople, 1843).

7. THE DISCOVERY AND DEPOSITING OF THE HONOURABLE GIRDLE OF THE THEOTOKOS (Κατάθεσις τῆς τιμίας ζώνης τῆς θεοτόκου).

This festival, like the last, claims to have been instituted at the date of the event commemorated by it, but there is no evidence of its observance before the 9th century. Its date in the calendars of the Byzantine and Armenian churches is August 31. Its purpose is to commemorate (1) the discovery of the supposed girdle of St. Mary in the time (according to the Menaeon) of Arcadius, (2) its translation to Constantinople in the time of Justinian, and (3) a miraculous cure supposed to have been wrought by it on Zoe the wife of Leo the Philosopher, A.D. 886. (Nicephorus Callistus, Hist. Eccles. lib. xiv. 2; xv. 14, 24. Du Fresne, Notae in Annae Comnenae Alexiadem, p. 329, ad calcem Joannis Cinnami Historiae, Paris, 1670; Menaeon for August, p. 189, Constantinople, 1843.)

8. THE SYNAXIS OF THE THEOTOKOS AND OF JOSEPH HER SPOUSE.—This festival was probably instituted, at Constantinople, at about the same date as the two previously named festivals, though, like them, it claims a much earlier date, appeal being made to a spurious sermon of Epiphanius, supposed to have been delivered on the day. The date in the calendar and the purpose of its institution are closely connected. It is observed on Dec. 26, as being a continuation of the Christmas festival, the mind being turned on the first day to the Son, and on the second day to the mother. The word 'Synaxis,' derived from συνάγειν, means in the first place an assembly of worshippers, and thence (in the present connexion) a commemoration festival held by those so assembled.

9. THE PROTECTION OF THE MOST HOLY MOTHER OF GOD.—This festival was instituted at the beginning of the 10th century. The day in the calendar of the Russian church on which it is observed is Oct. 1. Its purpose is to commemorate a vision which St. Andrew, surnamed "the Foolish," or "the Idiot," said that he had in the church of Blachernae, Constantinople, in which he supposed himself to have seen St. Mary, with prophets, apostles, and angels, praying for the world and spreading her ὠμοφόρος (ecclesiastical vestment) over Christians. The Russian church accounts for the festival not being found in the Byzantine calendar by the great troubles which in the 10th century were encompassing and pervading Constantinople. (Russian calendar, Oct 1.)

10. THE CONCEPTION (Σύλληψις τῆς ἁγίας Ἄννης. Conceptio Beatae Mariae Virginis).

Its institution. — Legend relates that this festival was instituted A.D. 1067 by abbat Helsinus, who had been sent by William I. of England to Denmark, and being caught in a storm on his return, and addressing prayers for help to St. Mary had a vision of a grave ecclesiastic upon the waves, who promised him safety on condition of his establishing the Festival of the Conception of St. Mary on Dec. 8. This legend is assigned to St. Anselm as its author in the Legenda Aurea, and the synod of London held under archbishop Mepeham, A.D. 1328, appears to have believed it to rest on his authority (Const. 2). It may be found in Migne's Patrologia (tom. clix. p. 325), relegated to the appendix of St. Anselm's works. Another form of the same legend puts St. Anselm himself in the place of Helsinus as the hero of the story, and represents the scene to have occurred as he was returning from England to Bec (Petr. de Natalibus, Catal. Sanct. lib. i. c. xiii.). Passing from legend to history we find that the festival originated in the 12th century. It was at once condemned by St. Bernard as (1) novel, (2) heterodox, (3) unauthorised (see Epist. clxxiv., Op. tom. i. p. 169, ed. Ben. Paris, 1690). This was in the year A.D. 1140. St. Bernard's contemporary Potho also condemned it as (1) novel, (2) absurd (De Statu domûs Dei, lib. iii. apud Magn. Bibl. Patr. tom. ix. p. 587, Paris, 1644), and in the following century Durandus (De Divin. Offic., lib. vii. c. 7) and Belethus (Exp. Divin. Offic. c. 146) repudiated it as heterodox. "Some," says Belethus, "have kept the Feast of the Conception, and perhaps even still keep it, but it is not authorised or approved; nay, it ought rather to be prohibited, for she was conceived in sin." In the 14th century it was made obligatory in England by the following constitution of Simon Mepeham, archbishop of Canterbury, which was accepted by a Provincial synod held in London in the year 1328. "That the memory of the Blessed Virgin Mary, the mother of our Lord, may be oftener and more solemnly celebrated, in proportion to the greater favour which she among all the saints hath found with God, who ordained her conception to be the predestinated temporal origin of His only begotten Son and the salvation of all men; that by this means the remote dawnings of our salvation, which raise spiritual joys in pious minds, might increase the devotion and salvation of all; following the steps of our venerable predecessor Anselm, who after other more ancient solemnities of hers thought fit to add that of her conception, we ordain and firmly command that the Feast of the Conception aforesaid be solemnly celebrated for the future in all the churches of the province" (Const. ii., Hook, Lives of the Archbishops of Canterbury, vol. iii. p. 499, Lond. 1865).

The purpose of the festival was originally, as Bellarmine acknowledges, and the above quoted constitution of archbishop Mepeham plainly states, not to celebrate an immaculate or even a holy conception, but simply to commemorate the fact of the conception of St. Mary, the mother of Christ, in imitation of the Festival of the Annunciation, which commemorates the conception of her Son. But, as St. Bernard clearly saw, its tendency from the beginning was to induce a belief in the supernatural character of the conception of St. Mary, and so to lead on to the doctrine of the Immaculate Conception. For this reason he sharply reproved the canons of Lyons for having admitted it. "It has been vouchsafed," he writes, "to a very few of the sons of men to be born holy, but to none to be conceived holily; that the prerogative of a holy conception might be kept for One only who should sanctify all and make a cleansing of sins, being himself the only One who comes without sin. It is the Lord Jesus Christ alone that was conceived by the Holy Ghost, for He alone was holy before His conception. Excepting Him, the humble and true confession of one who says, 'I was shapen in iniquity and in sin did my mother conceive me,' applies to every one else of Adam's children. Then what can be the meaning of a festival of her conception? How can a conception be said to be holy which is not of the Holy Spirit, not to say, which is of sin? or how can it be regarded as a matter for festivity when it is not holy? The glorious woman will be ready enough to go without an honour which seems either to honour sin or to attribute a holiness which did not exist" (Epist. clxxiv.). The dogma which St. Bernard opposed was that of a holy conception of St. Mary. The idea of her immaculate conception had not arisen in his time. This was first proposed as a possibility by J. Duns Scotus at the end of the 13th or the beginning of the 14th century, and six centuries later, on Dec. 8, 1854, it was pronounced a dogma necessary for all adherents of the papacy to believe if they desire salvation.

The original purpose of the festival was simply to commemorate the first beginning of the life of her who was the mother of our Lord, but since A.D. 1854 the immaculateness of her conception, that is, her exemption from original sin, has been regarded the chief subject commemorated by it. The steps by which the belief grew which culminated in the dogma now supposed to be commemorated by the festival are briefly as follows:—From apostolic times to the end of the 5th century it was taught and believed that St. Mary was born in original sin, that she was liable to actual sin, and that she fell into sins of infirmity. We may take as witnesses for the 2nd century, Tertullian (de Carn. Christi, vii. 315, and Adv. Marcian. iv. 19, Op. p. 433, Paris, 1695); for the 3rd century, Origen (Hom. in Luc. xvii., Op. tom. iii. p. 952, Paris, 1733); for the 4th century, St. Basil (Ep. 260, Op. tom. iii. p. 400, Paris, 1721) and St. Hilary (in Ps. cxix., Op. p. 282, Paris, 1693); for the 5th century, St. Chrysostom (Op. tom. vii. p. 467, Paris, 1718) and St. Cyril of Alexandria (Op. tom. iv. p. 1064; tom. vi. p. 391, Paris, 1638). From the 6th to the 12th century it was taught and believed that St. Mary was born in original sin, but was saved from falling into actual sin. In the 13th century it was taught and believed that she was conceived in sin, and so subjected to original sin, but, like John the Baptist, sanctified before her birth. From the 14th to the 18th century teaching and belief in the Latin church wavered between a maculate and an immaculate conception according as the Dominicans or Franciscans were most powerful at Rome. In the 19th century it was formally declared by pope Pius IX. that St. Mary, having been conceived immaculately, was absolutely exempt from original and from actual sin. This belief of the Latin church is regarded by the Greek church (see Conference between the Abp. of Syros and the Bp. of Winchester, Lond. 1871), and by the Anglican church (see Bp. Wilberforce, Rome, her new Dogma and our Duties, Oxf. 1855), not only as untrue in fact, but as heretical in its tendencies.

The day in the calendar fixed for this festival is Dec. 8, as being nine months before Sept. 8, which was regarded in the 12th century as the Nativity of St. Mary. The Eastern churches observe it on Dec. 9.

11. ST. MARY AT SNOWS (Festum Dedicationis S. Mariae ad Nives).

Its institution.—This festival was instituted as a local anniversary, and observed in the basilica of Sta. Maria Maggiore as early, it would seem, as the 12th century. Its observance was extended throughout Rome in the 14th century, and made obligatory on all Roman Christendom by Pius V in the 16th century.

Its purpose is to celebrate the legendary foundation of the church of Sta. Maria Maggiore in Rome. The legend says that in the 4th century one John and his wife, having no children, were anxious to devote their substance to St. Mary, but did not know how to do so acceptably to her, until they each had a dream telling them that they would find snow on the ground marking out the spot whereon they were to build a cathedral. They went to Liberius, the pope of Rome, and found that he had had the same dream; and behold, the snow was lying (on the 5th of August) on the Esquiline in the shape of a cathedral. So they built Sta. Maria Maggiore. The Breviary (Aug. 5) contains the legend. It probably arose from an attempt to explain the name ad Nives, which may itself be the corruption of some lost word—possibly of ad Liv. or ad Liviae—as the church was built juxta macellum Liviae; or of Liber., as it was known by the title Liberiana; or of in Esq., as it was built on the Esquiline Hill. The story rests on the authority of manuscripts belonging to the cathedral body, which might easily have become difficult to decipher in the lapse of centuries, and of Peter de Natalibus, a collector of worthless legends, who lived in the 15th century. The miracle is first mentioned by Nicholas IV. in the year A.D. 1287, that is, 927 years after it was said to have taken place. Gregory XI., A.D. 1371, and Pius II., A.D. 1453, have given the sanction of their authority to it. The original legend stated that the earth opened of its own accord for the foundations, on Liberius beginning to dig them. But this part of the miracle was expunged from the Breviary by Pius V., while he left the part relating to the snow. The date in the calendar is Aug. 5.

There was a sister festival, called ST. MARY AT MARTYRS, held on May 13, to commemorate the dedication of the Pantheon, or Rotunda, to St. Mary and the Holy Martyrs, by Boniface IV. at the beginning of the 7th century. This festival has been allowed to become obsolete, perhaps because there was not so powerful a body as the chapter of Sta. Maria Maggiore whose interest it was to maintain it.

12. THE VISITATION (Visitatio Beatae Mariae Virginis).

Its institution.—This festival was instituted by Urban VI. during the schism in the papacy and promulgated by a constitution of his successor Boniface IX., A.D. 1389 (Bulla Bonifacii ix. apud Bollandi Acta Sanctorum, July 2) About half a century later, A.D. 1441, it was again established by the council of Basle, no reference being made to its previous institution, because Boniface's authority was not acknowledged by all the members of the council. The whole of session 43 is occupied with the matter (Conc. Basil. apud Harduin, Concil. tom. viii. p. 1292).

The purpose of the festival is to commemorate the visit paid by St. Mary to Elizabeth before the birth of John the Baptist at Juttah or, it may be, Hebron. Joachim Hildebrand says, that "it was instituted at the council of Basle to supplicate Mary to trample down the Turks, the enemies of the Christians, as she trod upon the mountains of Judaea on her way to her cousin" (De Priscae et Primitivae Ecclesiae sacris publicis templis ac diebus festis, Helmstadt, 1652). As it is a scriptural fact commemorated by it, the festival is retained in the Anglican calendar in spite of its late date. The date in the calendar is July 2.

13. THE ESPOUSALS (Desponsatio Beatae Virginis Mariae cum S. Josepho).

Its institution and purpose.—A canon of the cathedral of Chartres, in the 14th century, charged the chapter in his will to institute a commemoration of St. Joseph, with the view of pleasing Mary. Gerson, chancellor of the university of Paris, proposed to the chapter to carry out this object by using an Officium Desponsationis Beatae Virginis cum S. Josepho composed by himself. In the 16th century Paul III. desired an office to be prepared for the day, and he gave his approbation to it after it had been drawn up. The observance of the festival was extended by Benedict XIII., A.D. 1725. It is of obligation in Spain, Italy, England, and in all congregations of the Jesuits. The ring used at the espousals is said by Benedict XIV. to be still preserved at Perugia (In Fest. Desponsationis apud Migne, Theol. Curs. Compl. tom. xxvi. p. 531, Paris, 1842). The date in the calendar is Jan. 23.

14. THE NAME OF MARY (Festum SS. Nominis Beatae Mariae).

This festival was instituted in Spain at the beginning of the 16th century. It was removed from the calendar by Pius V., and restored by Sixtus V., on the prayer of cardinal Deza. It was made of universal obligation by Innocent XI., A.D. 1685, in gratitude for the defeat of the Turks before Vienna. Its purpose is to encourage putting confidence in the name of Mary. Its date in the calendar is the Sunday following the Feast of the Nativity, that is, about Sept. 15.

15. THE SEVEN SORROWS (Festum Septem Dolorum Beatae Mariae Virginis).

This festival is conjectured by Benedict XIV.

to have been instituted by Theodoric, bishop of Cologne, at a provincial synod, A.D. 1413, to make up for the insults offered by Hussites to sacred images of our Lord and St. Mary. He has no grounds for his conjecture. George Haller, dean of the Benedictine monastery of Kiebach in Bavaria, assured Bruschius that he instituted it in the district committed to his pastoral charge in the year of our Lord 1545. (See Bruschius, Chron. Monasteriorum Germaniae, p. 658, Sulzbaci, 1682.) It was made of universal obligation throughout Roman Christendom by a decree of Benedict XIII., A.D. 1727.

The purpose of the festival is to commemorate St. Mary in her character of Mater Dolorosa.

This is the only festival in the Roman calendar which is observed twice in the course of the year. The second commemoration is of very late institution. Its dates are the Friday preceding Good Friday, and the third Sunday in September.

16. THE ROSARY (Festum SS. Rosarii Beatae Mariae Virginis).

This festival was first instituted on the occasion of the defeat of the Turks at Lepanto, Oct. 7, 1571. As a memorial of this event Pius V. ordered that a commemoration of St. Mary of Victory should be held every year. Gregory XIII. changed the title to that of the Rosary of St. Mary, because the companies of the most Holy Rosary had been walking in procession and saying the Rosary or Psalter of St. Mary on the day of battle. Clement X. made its observance obligatory throughout Spain, A.D. 1575. Innocent XII. was requested by the emperor Leopold to make it of universal obligation, but he died before the emperor's desire could be complied with. It was made of universal obligation by Clement XI., on the occasion of the defeat of the Turks by Prince Eugene, A.D. 1716.

Its date in the calendar is the first Sunday in October.

Its purpose is to recommend the devotion of the Rosary or Psalter of the Virgin, which consists of the recitation of 150 Ave Maria together with 15 Pater Nosters. This devotion is supposed, but without sufficient evidence, to have been instituted by St. Dominic, A.D. 1210, who is stated by St. Alfonso de' Liguori to have proved its efficacy in the following manner: "When St. Dominic was preaching at Carcassone, in France, an Albigensian heretic, who for having publicly ridiculed the devotion of the Rosary was possessed by devils, was brought to him. The saint obliged the evil spirits to declare whether the things which he said about the most Holy Rosary were true. Howling, they replied: 'Listen, Christians; all that this enemy of ours has said of Mary and of the most Holy Rosary is true.' They moreover added that they had no power over the servants of Mary, and that many by invoking her name at death were saved contrary to their deserts. They concluded, saying, 'We are forced to declare that no one is lost who perseveres in devotion to Mary and in that of the most Holy Rosary; for Mary obtains for those who are sinners true repentance before they die.' St. Dominic then made the people recite the Rosary; and, O prodigy! at every Hail Mary, evil spirits left the body of the possessed man under the form of red-hot coals, so that when the Rosary was finished, he was entirely freed" (Glories of Mary, Lond. 1852). [HAIL MARY.]

17. BLESSED MARY OF MOUNT CARMEL (B. Mariae Virginis de Monte Carmelo).

This festival was instituted or approved for the Carmelites by Sixtus V., A.D. 1587; and it was made of universal obligation in Roman Christendom by Benedict XIII. at the beginning of the 18th century.

Its purpose is to commemorate an alleged appearance of St. Mary to Simon Stock, an Englishman, the general of the Carmelites, A.D. 1251. St. Alfonso de' Liguori, the latest Doctor of the Roman church, states that St. Mary gave the general a scapular for the use of the Carmelites, saying:—"Receive, my beloved son, the scapular of thy order, a badge of my confraternity, a privilege granted to thee and to all Carmelites: whoever dies clothed with it shall not suffer eternal flames" (Glories of Mary, p. 485, Lond. 1852). Fifty years afterwards "she appeared to pope John XXII. and ordered him to make known to all that on the Saturday after their death she would deliver from purgatory all who wore the Carmelite scapular. This, as Father Crasset relates, was proclaimed by the same pontiff in a bull which was afterwards confirmed by Alexander V., Clement VII., Pius V., Gregory XIII., and Paul V." (ibid. p. 196).

The date in the calendar is July 16.

18. THE EXPECTED DELIVERY OF ST. MARY (Expectatio Partûs Beatae Mariae Virginis).

This festival grew up in Spain at the end of the 16th century. Its observance was extended to Venetia, A.D. 1695, and to other parts of Italy, by Benedict XIII., A.D. 1725.

Its purpose is indicated by its name.

Its date in the calendar is December 18.

19. THE TRANSLATION OF THE HOUSE OF LORETTO (Translatio almae domus Lauretanae).

This festival was instituted and approved for the province of Picenum, A.D. 1669. Its observance was extended by Benedict XIII., A.D. 1719, and 1729 to Italy and the Spanish dominions.

Its purpose is to commemorate the alleged fact that the house in which St. Mary lived in Nazareth, in which the Annunciation took place, was carried through the air, A.D. 1294, first to Dalmatia, and then to three different sites in Italy. This legend is still vouched for by historians such as Rohrbacher (Hist. Univ. de l'Eglise Catholique, vol. xix. p. 321, Paris, 1851). All that can be said for or against it is compressed into an article by the Rev. E. S. Ffoulkes in the Christian Remembrancer (April, 1854, Lond.).

Its date in the calendar is December 10.

20. THE PROTECTION OF ST. MARY (Patrocinium Beatae Mariae Virginis).

This festival, which has nothing to do with the Russian festival of similar name, was instituted A.D. 1679, and confirmed by Benedict XIII. at the beginning of the 18th century.

Its purpose is to encourage prayer to St. Mary and confidence in her protection.

Its date in the calendar.—It is appointed to be observed in Spain on a Sunday in November, in England on the fourth Sunday in October.

21. BLESSED MARY DE MERCEDE (Beatae Mariae de Mercede).

This festival was instituted in the 17th century, first for the order de Mercede, then for Spain, and then for France. Its observance was extended to all Roman Christendom by Innocent XII.

Its purpose is to commemorate an alleged appearance of St. Mary, which is said to have caused the institution of the order de Mercede. The members of the order, besides taking the vows of chastity, poverty, and obedience, bound themselves to redeem captives by delivering themselves into slavery.

The date in the calendar is Sept. 24.

The remaining festivals, the HELP OF CHRISTIANS, the MOST PURE HEART, the MATERNITY, the PURITY, have special masses, sanctioned by popes, and appointed to be said in England and in the Jesuit congregations, but they have hardly yet become recognised festivals.

The Saturday began to be appropriated to St. Mary's honour by an appointment of Urban II., A.D. 1096. This was made of universal obligation by Pius V., A.D. 1568.

It will be seen from the above that the two festivals of the Purification and the Annunciation were instituted as early as the 6th century, and that they were originally festivals of our Lord rather than of St. Mary. The Assumption, the Nativity, and the Presentation, which illustrate the early Gnostic legends of St. Mary's birth and death, belong to the 7th and the beginning of the 8th century. The Vestment, the Girdle, and the Synaxis belong to the 9th century; the (Russian) Protection to the 10th; the Conception and the Dedication of St. Mary at S[illegible] the 12th; the Visitation, the Espousals, the Name of Mary to the 14th; the Seven Sorrows, the Rosary, Mount Carmel, the Delivery, to the 16th; the House of Loretto, the (Latin) Protection, the de Mercede, to the 17th; the Aid of Christians, the Most Pure Heart, the Maturity, the Purity, and the Immaculate Conception, to the 18th and the 19th centuries.

MARY, ST., THE VIRGIN (IN ART). The history of the Virgin Mary in Art corresponds to that of our Blessed Lord in the complete absence, in the early ages of the church, of any representations of her person having the smallest claim to authenticity. The words of St. Augustine (de Trinitate, lib. viii. c. 5) are express on this point: "Neque novimus faciem Virginis Mariae;" while what he says of the different ideas formed by different persons of her lineaments, all probably widely at variance with the truth, indicates not only the absence of any recognised type of portrait, but also that pictures of her were of extreme rarity, if indeed they existed at all.

When found the Virgin Mary appears in all the earliest representations as a member of an historical group depicting a scriptural subject, such as the Annunciation, the Visitation, the Nativity, the Adoration of the Magi, the Presentation in the Temple, and Christ among the Doctors. By far the most frequent is the Adoration of the Magi, which recurs in countless examples of all the various forms of Christian art—carved on sarcophagi, sculptured on ivories, or depicted in the mosaics of the basilicas, and the frescoes of the catacombs, thus evidencing the hold that subject had gained on the mind of the early Christian church. [MAGI, ADORATION OF THE.] The Nativity without the Magi is of very rare occurrence, being only found on minor works of art, such as coins, gems, ivories, or sarcophagi [NATIVITY]. The Annunciation also appears very seldom. It is represented in one of the compartments of the vast mosaic composition that clothes the western face of the arch of Triumph in S. Maria Maggiore in Rome (c. A.D. 483). In this the Virgin, richly robed, but without a nimbus, is seated in a chair, behind which two nimbed angels stand; the archangel Gabriel stands in front, while the Holy Dove hovers above in the air, together with a second Gabriel. This mosaic also includes two other subjects, in addition to the Adoration of the Magi (see woodcut ANGELS, Vol. I. p. 84), in which the Virgin appears, viz., the Presentation in the Temple, and Christ among the Doctors. In all these subjects the Virgin has her head uncovered, is without the nimbus, and is very richly clad in a gold robe, and is decorated with earrings, necklace, and head jewels. (See Ciampini, Vet. Mon. vol. i. p. 207, tav. li.; D'Agincourt, Peinture, pl. xvi. no. 4, S. Kens. Museum, no. 7445.) The Annunciation is also found on the north wall of the apse of the Cathedral of Parenzo, in Istria, with the Visitation opposite to it. The Virgin is here seated, with her head encircled by a nimbus, at the door of a small gabled cottage, and the angel stands before her. A later example is seen in the mosaics of St. Nereus and St. Achilleus at Rome, A.D. 796. The catacomb of St. Priscilla contains a fresco, which may very probably be identified with this same subject. In this, the drawing of which is excellent (see woodcut No. 1), we have a young man fully clothed, without wings or any of the later angelic attributes, with extended right hand, addressing a seated female, who with downcast eyes and uplifted left hand seems to be receiving the speaker's message with devout submission. The earlier illustrators of the catacombs were far from expressing the certainty now exhibited as to the subject of this picture. Bosio says that it is impossible to determine what story it represents. Bottari (p. 141) expresses his opinion with hesitation, that this may be intended for the Annunciation, which is considered probable by Mr. Wharton Marriott (Test. of Catacombs, p. 24), and is positively affirmed by Garrucci. (See Bosio, 541; Bottari, tav. 176; Garrucci, tav. 75, no. 1; Parker's Photogr. no. 541.) In the same catacomb there is another fresco, the subject of which, though its reference to the Virgin is unquestionable, it is very difficult to determine; nor is its date accurately fixed. It forms "a very small portion of a piece of decorative work which," according to Mr. Wharton Marriott (u. s. p. 26), "with the single exception of this group, might have been found in the tomb of the Nasos, or any other purely pagan building." The beauty of the composition, and the dignity and grace of the figures, together with the freedom of their action, so unlike the poverty and stiffness which characterise the later frescoes, point to an early date. De' Rossi assigns it to the reign of Trajan or Hadrian, or at the latest to the time of the Antonines, i. e. the close of the 2nd or beginning of the 3rd century, while Mr. J. H. Parker, with less probability, brings it down as late as A.D. 523

No. 2. Virgin and Child and male figure. From the Cemetery of St. Priscilla. Northcote, 'Roma Sott.' pl. 10.

The fresco in question (see woodcut No. 2) consists of a seated figure of the Virgin, veiled, clothed in a tunic with a pallium over, unnimbed, clasping her Infant, also destitute of the nimbus, to her naked bosom. Before her stands a young man, with a pallium over his naked body, holding a roll in his left hand, and with the index finger of his outstretched right hand pointing towards the Virgin, and a star (discovered by De' Rossi) in the sky above. This is very reasonably interpreted by Mr. Wharton Marriott (u. s.) of the Holy Family, the conventional representation of Joseph as an old man, with which we are so familiar, being of later date. De' Rossi however, less probably, identifies the young man with one of the prophets of the old covenant, perhaps Isaiah, pointing to the Star of Bethlehem and to the Virgin and the Infant Saviour as the great subject of prophetic testimony. (De' Rossi, Imagines Selectae Virginis Deiparae; Garrucci, Arti cristiane primitive, tav. 81; Northcote, Roma Sott. p. 258, pl. x. fig. 1.) The Visitation given by Bosio (p. 579), from the catacomb of pope Julius, or St. Valentinus on the Flaminian Way, is evidently of late date (Aringhi, i. 181; Munter, Sinnbilder, ii. p. 26). We may also mention a group of three figures given by Bosio (p. 279), and Bottari (tab. 82), from an arcosolium in the cemetery of Callistus, which is not unreasonably identified by Garrucci (Macarius, Hagioglypta, p. 242), De' Rossi, and Martigny (Dict. des Ant. chrét. p. 266) with the Holy Family. It presents a bearded man clothed in a tunic and pallium in the centre, a veiled female to the left, and a child of about eight years old, with his hands extended in prayer, to the right. It should, however, be mentioned that the earlier school of antiquaries, Bosio, Bottari, and Aringhi, considered that these figures were representations of the persons buried in the tomb below. De' Rossi gives an analogous picture from a mutilated fresco in the cemetery of Priscilla (Imag. Select. Virg. Deiparae, tab. iv.), and refers to a sarcophagus in the museum at Arles (No. 26), where a child is conducted by the hand by a male figure towards a female, which he considers represents the same sacred group. Martigny (Famille Sainte).

Symbolical representations of the Blessed Virgin are of the greatest rarity in Early Christian art. Among the innumerable paintings which decorate the walls and ceilings of the cubicula of the catacombs, the subjects of nearly all of which can be at once identified without the slightest question, there are very few which are even claimed as representations of the Virgin. De' Rossi, who has devoted a special treatise to this subject, has done his best to demonstrate the early date and the frequent occurrence of pictures of the Virgin Mary, either alone or with her Divine Son, as an object of religious reverence (Imagines Selectae Virginis Deiparae); but the evidence he produces is both so meagre and so questionable as rather to prove the extreme rarity of such representations, before the rise of the Nestorian heresy had elevated the Θεοτόκος into the outward and visible expression of the orthodox faith.

The symbolical pictures of the Virgin, as distinguished from the historical, may be divided into two classes, (a) those in which she appears with her Divine Son, and (b) those in which she is represented alone, standing as an "orante," with arms outstretched and hands upraised in attitude of prayer. The most famous of the pictures of the first class is the fresco on the plafond of an arcosolium in the cemetery of St. Agnes on the Via Nomentana (woodcut No. 3). It is thoroughly Byzantine in character, its stiff religious symmetry contrasting most strongly with the freedom and grace of those just described, from the cemetery of St. Priscilla. It can hardly be placed earlier than the first years of the 5th century, though De' Rossi assigns it to the time of Constantine. It represents quarter-length figures of a mother and child, the latter standing in front, clothed in a blue tunic up to the neck. The mother stands behind, vested in a green tunic, and a pallium falling over her arms, with her head covered with a veil and circlet of beads round her neck, and extends her arms in the attitude of prayer. Neither have the nimbus. The sacred monogram ☧ on either side is turned towards the group. This picture is generally recognised as that of the Virgin Mary and the infant Christ, but the identification cannot be considered beyond question. Bottari, following Bosio, considered it merely a memorial of the persons buried in the sepulchral recess. This idea is strengthened by the frequent occurrence of portraits in the same position in other arcosolia which are unquestionably of that character (cf. Bosio, pp. 473, 499). Its identification with the Virgin and her Divine Son is asserted by Garrucci (Arti cristiane primitive, vol. ii. tav. 66, no. 1), by Marchi (p. 157), (who has some excellent remarks on the infinite distance between the Mother and the Son, indicated by the fact that she alone is represented as in the act of prayer), and De' Rossi (Imag. Select. pl. vi.), and is accepted by the judicious Munter (Sinnbilder, tom. ii. p. 128) and Wharton Marriott (u. s. pp. 28, 29). (See Bosio, p. 471; Bottari, cliii.) There is also a seated female figure with unveiled head giving suck to a naked infant, given by Bosio (p. 549), and Bottari (tav. 180), from the cemetery of St. Priscilla, which may be reasonably identified with the Virgin and Holy Child. It deserves remark that this group occupies a subordinate position in the right-hand corner of the lunette, a tall and stately matron, as an orante, identified by Bosio with Priscilla herself, being the central object. But the whole subject of this lunette is obscure. Among the few undoubted pictures of the Virgin, furnished by the catacombs, there are two of late date given by Perret. In both she is accompanied by her Son. Neither can be placed earlier than the 9th century. That from the baptistery of Valerian under the church of St. Urban alla Caffarella, a rude and ignorant work, represents the Virgin in a blue veil over a red tunic, holding Christ on her knees in the act of benediction. $\overset{\frown}{\text{MP}}$ $\overline{\Theta\text{V}}$ is inscribed above the group (Perret, vol. i. pl. 83). In the other, known as the "Madonna della Stella," from a catacomb on the Appian Way, near Albano, Christ is placed between his Mother to his right, and St. Smaragdus to his left. Her hands are outspread in prayer, and MITER THEV is written above her (Perret, ib. pl. 84; Agincourt, Peinture, pl. v. no. 23). A fresco of the Virgin and Child, discovered by Mr. Parker in the corridor, or sentinel's path, in the Wall of Aurelian, near the Appian Gate (now the Porta di San Sebastiano), is perhaps one of the earliest examples of the Virgin and Child extant. From the style of the painting, which is Byzantine of the 6th century, it may probably be regarded as the work of some Greek artist for the religious benefit of the troops of Belisarius during the siege by Vitiges, A.D. 538, when the fortifications of the city were generally repaired. It is executed on a piece of lath and plaster stretching across the corridor, through which the guards would pass. The painting possesses "a kind of solemn grace, characteristic of the best Byzantine art." The Virgin is represented standing, holding her Son on her right arm. She is veiled, and both have the nimbus. (Cf. Mr. Tyrwhitt's remarks in Mr. Parker's Church and Altar Decorations and Mosaics, p. 157; Parker's Photographs, no. 1208.)

The second class of representations, viz. those in which the Virgin appears alone, without her Divine Son, while it supplies a very large number of possible examples, furnishes very few that can be certainly identified with the Mother of our Lord. No object is of more frequent occurrence in every form of early Christian art, on sarcophagi and monumental slabs, on gilded glasses, in mosaics, and especially in the catacomb frescoes, than the so-called "oranti," i. e. standing figures, with the arms extended in what was of old the ordinary attitude of prayer. These figures are of both sexes, but the females largely predominate, and are represented either alone, which is the more usual practice, or supported by a male figure on either hand. These "oranti" were generally unhesitatingly regarded by Bosio, Aringhi, Boldetti, and the earlier investigators, as memorial pictures of the individuals interred below. Others consider the female "oranti" to be symbolical representations of the Church. This view is stated by Martigny (Eglise, p. 226, § 2) as well as by Garrucci (Vetri, tav. xxxix. n. 3) and is far from improbable. One or two are considered by Bosio to be pictures of the Virgin, though it is difficult to see on what principle he distinguishes them from the others De' Rossi, on the other hand, and his translators, Messrs. Northcote and Brownlow, have adopted the opposite rule of interpretation, and have thus enlarged the list of supposed catacomb-frescoes of the Virgin to an almost indefinite extent, and certainly far beyond what the facts admit. Dr. Northcote allows that the female oranti may possibly in some instances have "denoted some martyr or person of distinction buried in the principal tomb of the cubiculum where the painting is found" (R. S p. 255). But in forgetfulness of the fact that male oranti and children are often found in precisely the same positions and with the same surroundings, and that the names of the individuals are not unfrequently given, he speaks of this as only a "conjecture" which "may possibly be sometimes correct," but which he "feels certain is inadmissible in the great majority of cases" (u. s.). The combination of the figure of a female orante in the same system of decoration with that of the Good Shepherd, which is deemed by Dr. Northcote as evidence that the former was intended for that of the Virgin, may be rather regarded as a conventional rule of ornamentation, on which nothing can be safely built. The example selected by Dr. Northcote as one of his illustrations (Roma Sotterranea, pl. viii.) in which a female orante is placed side by side with the Good Shepherd, so as to form one picture, was previously identified by Bosio (p. 387) with the Virgin. There is, however, nothing whatsoever to distinguish this female figure from the countless similar examples given in his work, while the erroneousness of the identification here is proved by the occurrence of a scourge loaded with lead or iron (plumbata) painted by the side of the orante, indicating her unmistakeably as a Christian martyr. This attribute of martyrdom has been unfortunately omitted by Dr. Northcote's draughtsman in his plate, and thus the meaning of the drawing has been unintentionally misrepresented. The dove which we find as an adjunct to some oranti—e. g. one from St. Agnes (Bosio, p. 461)—might be supposed to indicate the Virgin did we not find it in precisely the same combination on the closing slab of ordinary loculi, with the name of the person represented annexed, e. g. Bosio, p. 508, "Constantius Decine conjugi quae vixit mecum annos xxxiii." Neither are the supporting male figures to the right and left of the orante—usually, and with great probability, identified with St. Peter and St. Paul, whose names are often, especially on the gilded glasses, inscribed above them—altogether infallible marks. One from the catacomb of St. Cyriaca, on the Via Tiburtina, presenting a group of two bearded men with extended arms supporting those of a matron, though almost identical with others referred unquestioningly to the Virgin, did not receive this interpretation from Bosio, who simply describes it as "qualche sagra vergine o matrona" (some holy virgin or matron) (p. 405). We have other analogous examples in Bosio (p. 381), where the supporting figures are young men, running up to a matron, and (p. 389). In fine the result of a careful investigation of the supposed representations of the Virgin as an orante is that so far from "the majority of instances," as stated by Dr. Northcote, bearing an unquestionable reference to the Mother of our Lord, the number where there is no room for doubt as to the subject is exceedingly small.[a]

There is no department of early Christian art in which the representations of the Blessed Virgin are more abundant and more unquestionable than the gilded glasses from the catacombs, which it is hardly possible to place later than the first quarter of the 5th century. [GLASS.] But even here the difficulty of accurately distinguishing the ordinary orante from the Blessed Virgin is candidly acknowledged by De' Rossi (Imagines Selectae). While desiring to make the number as large as possible he confesses that it is never possible to assert that the Virgin is the person represented, except when the name "Maria" occurs, or when she is accompanied by St. Peter and St. Paul. Even this last test is not deemed a true one by Garrucci, who remarks (Vetri Ornati, pp. 26, 27) that other perfectly similar examples of a female figure bearing a different name, Peregrina, Agnes, etc., standing between two apostles (particularly a sarcophagus at Saragossa, where "Floria" is the central name) suggest the doubt whether when "Maria" occurs it necessarily indicates the Blessed Virgin. This doubt seems hardly well grounded. The frequency with which the name Agnes occurs on these gilded glasses—Garrucci gives no fewer than fourteen (u. s. tav. xxi. xxii.)—points to the conclusion that it was not any ordinary female bearing that name, but the holy maiden St. Agnes, who was intended. The same argument holds good with still greater cogency for the name Maria, although the entire absence of any conventional attributes forbids absolute certainty on the point. We give two examples from Garrucci (tav. ix. fig. 6, 7) of these gilded glasses. On both we have the Virgin, depicted as an orante supported by the two chief apostles. No. 4 was discovered in the cemetery of St. Agnes. The rolls on either side of the Virgin's head are symbols of the Holy Scriptures. In No. 5, from the Borgian Museum at the Propaganda, it will be observed that the relative positions of St. Peter and St. Paul are reversed. Another gilded glass (Garrucci, tav. ix. fig. 10; Perret, iv. pl. xx.; Arinchi, ii. p. 689) in the Vatican Library, gives a female figure with the name "Maria" above her head, standing alone between two trees with birds resting on pillars by her side. Another (Garrucci, ib. fig. 11) gives the name "Mara" above the female figure. It is doubtful whether this is a mistake for "Maria" or is a distinct name. "Mara" is found in epitaphs given by Boldetti, 482, 547. Some of the glasses present St. Agnes and the Blessed Virgin standing side by side as examples of holy virginity. These glasses supply one example of the

[a] That the orantes may be often regarded as memorial representations of persons interred in the cemetery where they appear is proved by instances in which a name is inscribed over the figure the same name being found in the epitaph below. E. g., Grata (Perret, vol. iii. pl. 7); Juliana on a sarcophagus (ib. v. pl. 46). Garrucci has some wise cautions against regarding all orantes as pictures of the Virgin (Macarius, Hagioglypt. p. 170 note). On the subject of orantes in general, see Munter (Sinnbilder, ii. p. 114 ff.); Grimouard de Saint-Laurent (Art chrétien, vi. p. 328, note F).

To pass from glasses to monumental slabs. A very curious example, which can hardly be placed later than the 4th century, is found in the crypt of St. Mary Magdalene at St. Maximin in Provence (Martigny, art. Vierge, p. 660; Macarius, Hagioglypta, 36; Le Blant, Inscr. Chrét. de la Gaule, ii. 277; Faillon, Monumens inédits sur l'Apostolat de St. M. Magd. i. p. 775). Here the Virgin is represented alone, unnimbed, in the attitude of prayer, with long hair flowing down upon her breast. The inscription, rudely incised on the slab, runs thus, "Maria Virgo Minester de Tempulo Gerosale." There is an evident reference here to the legend recorded in the apocryphal gospels of the Virgin having spent her early years in holy ministrations in the Temple. (Protevang. Jacobi, § 7, 8; Evang. Pseudo-Matth. § 4–6; Evang. Nativ. Mariae, § 6, 7.)

The earliest instance of a single figure of the Virgin in mosaic is that in the vault of the tribune of the chapel of St. Venantius at St. John Lateran. This is the work of Byzantine artists under the Greek popes John IV. and Theodore, 640–649. The upper portion of the mosaic gives a medallion bust of Christ supported by two angels, immediately below stands the Virgin with her arms outstretched and the palms expanded, as the central figure, with six of the apostles on either side of her. Both she and they have the same nimbus with Christ and the angels. She is dressed in a dark blue tunic and white veil, with a small cross on her bosom. (Ciampini, ii. p. 107, tab. xxxi.; D'Agincourt, Peintures, xvii. 1.) Similar but rather later mosaic pictures of the Virgin as an orante exist above the altar of the archiepiscopal chapel at Ravenna, saved from the wreck of the former cathedral, and in the Capella Ricca, in the church of St. Mark, Florence, brought from the old church of St Peter, at Rome, dated A.D. 703. There is also at Ravenna, in the church of Sta. Maria in Porto, a bas-relief of the Virgin as an orante (woodcut No. 6), of Greek workmanship, probably of the 6th or 7th century.

Her features are very regular and beautiful, quite of the Greek type. Crosses are embroidered on the wrists, shoulders, and knees of her tunic, and on the borders of the mantle. Her head is veiled and surrounded by a nimbus. The contracted forms of Μήτηρ Θεοῦ are inscribed above on either side.

The condemnation of the Nestorian heresy by the council of Ephesus, A.D. 431, gave a powerful impulse to the production of pictures of "the Mother of God," which was never subsequently lost. From this period the Virgin and Infant Christ became the symbol of the orthodox faith, which was represented in every possible way in paintings and mosaics, in sculpture, and [illegible] garments, personal ornaments, and [illegible]. There was no attempt to produce a portrait, but simply to portray the ideal Θεοτόκος as a theological symbol. The type adopted was probably not a new one. It has been observed by Mrs. Jameson (Legends of the Madonna) that St. Cyril of Alexandria, who played so important a part in this controversy, and had so much to do in fixing the dogma, must in his episcopal city have become familiar with the Egyptian group of Isis nursing the infant Horus, which may have suggested the analogous Christian subject, even as at an earlier date the Good Shepherd was derived from a classical type. It is just after the council of Ephesus that we meet with the first professedly authentic portrait of the Virgin—an interesting instance of the new demand creating a supply. This is the famous Hodegetria (Ὁδηγητρία), which was for so many centuries regarded with the deepest reverence by the Greeks, as an imperial palladium, and borne in a superb car or litter to the battle-field when the emperor led the army in person. It had been originally sent from Jerusalem in 438 by the young empress Eudocia as a present to her sister-in-law Pulcheria, and was placed by the latter in the church of the Hodegi, Ὁδηγοί, erected by her. (Niceph. Callist. xiv. 2, xv. 14.) The picture was on panel, ἐπὶ σανίδι, and was asserted to have been painted from the life by St. Luke. This picture held the first rank among the so-called portraits of the Virgin, and was repeatedly copied as an authentic portrait. The true type is given by D'Agincourt (Peinture, pl. 87), by Garrucci (Arti cristiane primitive, tav. 107, fig. 3, 4), and by Grimouard de Saint-Laurent (Art chrétien, vol. iii. pl. iv. no. 1). It is characterised by the true Byzantine rigidity and flatness. The Virgin is standing, and holds our Lord seated on her left arm, carrying a roll in His left hand and blessing with His right. His nimbus is cruciform; hers a plain circle. The figures are superscribed ΜΡ ΘΥ ΗΟΔΗΓΗΤΡΙΑ: ΙC ΧC. A very diffuse account of this sacred treasure, the veneration paid to it, and its variously reported fortunes, is given by Ducange (Constantinopolis Christiana, lib. iv. c. 24, p. 88).[b] Another almost equally celebrated portrait of the Virgin belonging to the same epoch is that known as Blachernitissa, from its being preserved in the church built by Pulcheria in the suburb of Constantinople, known as Blachernae. The type, according to Garrucci (u. s. vol. iii. p. 13 ff.), is given on coins of Constantine XII., Monomachus (Sabatier, xlix. 12), and Leo IV. (ib. xlv. 11). She appears with extended arms as an orante. A third famous early Byzantine Virgin is the Θεοτόκος τῆς Πηγῆς, Vergine della Fonte (Garrucci, u. s. No. 2), so called from the miraculous spring Leo the Thracian caused to be included within the church erected by him outside the walls of Constantinople, in honour of the Mother of God, in which it was treasured. (Niceph. Callist. xv. 26; Ducange, Const. Christ. lib. iv. p. 183.) In this she is also represented as an orante, but the Holy Babe is in her lap. The type, according to Garrucci, is given by Garampi (de Numm. Arg. Benedict III. p. 50), and Oderici (Dissert. Acad. Corton. vol. ix. p. 282).

All these pictures and the coins of the Eastern empire exhibit the same hieratic type which established itself in Byzantine art. "This type," writes Dean Milman (Hist. of Christianity, iii. p. 394), "gradually degenerates with the darkness of the age and the decline of art. The countenance sweetly smiling on the child becomes sad and severe. The head is bowed with a gloomy and almost sinister expression, and the countenance gradually darkens till it assumes a black colour. At length even the sentiment of maternal affection is effaced, both the mother and child become stiff and lifeless, the child is swathed in stiff bands, and has an expression of pain rather than of gentleness, or placid infancy."

According to De' Rossi (Imag. Selectae, p. 14) there was no fixed rule for the representation of the Virgin on the coins of the Byzantine emperors, on some of which she is represented with the Holy Babe, sometimes alone, as an orante. On a coin of Leo VI. Philosophus, A.D. 886–911, she stands veiled and draped, with outstretched arms. Her head is noble in character, and is not nimbed. On a coin of Romanus II., A.D. 959–963, she is nimbed and crowns the emperor, an office she is represented as performing almost constantly on the imperial coins of the two next centuries. The earliest coin on which the Virgin and Child appear together is one of John Zimisces, A.D. 969–976. She holds against her bosom a circular nimbus, within which is the bust of the Infant Christ.[c] [MONEY.]

A very characteristic Byzantine picture, placed by Garrucci (u. s. iii. 15, tav. 107) in the first half of the 5th century, is preserved in the church of Sta. Maria Maggiore at Rome. It presents the usual type. The Virgin stands en face, veiled, with the customary cross on the veil. She holds the Infant on her left arm. He has the usual book in His left hand, and blesses with His right. Both have a simple nimbus. For a plate of this celebrated picture see Grimouard de Saint-Laurent (Art chrétien, vol. iii. frontispiece, and Perret, vol. i. frontispiece. See also Milochau, La Vierge de St. Luc à Sainte-Marie-Majeure, Paris, 1862). In the early picture preserved at the church of Ara Coeli, Rome, the child is absent. The Virgin raises her right hand in benediction.

From the obliteration or destruction of Christian mosaics by the picture-hating Mussulmans, mosaic representations of the Virgin are of the extremest rarity in the East. We can, however, refer to one in St. Sophia, of which we give a cut (No. 7) from Salzenberg's great work (Altchristliche Baudenkmale von Constantinopel), taken during the temporary removal of the whitewash from the interior of the mosque. According to a very usual Byzantine type (cf. the fresco from St. Agnes, No. 3) the Holy Child is represented standing in front of His mother, not seated on her lap. The Virgin's face is youthful and characterised by calm beauty. She

[b] It is not certain whether there were one or two of these sacred pictures of the Virgin ascribed to St. Luke preserved at Constantinople. Garrucci distinguishes the Virgo Hodegetria from the Virgo Nicopoeia, regarding the latter, which he asserts was reverenced from the time of Justinian, as the national palladium captured by the Venetians in A.D. 1204, and according to him still preserved at St. Mark's. Ducange (p. 89) refers to the difficulty without pretending to settle it. If, he says, it is true that the Hodegetria was preserved at Constantinople till the final fall of the city in 1453 it is vident that the picture taken by Dandolo must have been a different one; unless indeed, it may be added, by a pious fraud a copy was substituted for the original to satisfy the demands of devotees. A further uncertainty arises as to the place where the holy picture, whichever it was, that was captured, was deposited. A letter of Baldwin shews that it was promised by him to the monks of Citeaux. "If," writes Gibbon (ch. lx.), "the banner of the Virgin shewn at Venice as a trophy and relic is genuine, the pious doge must have cheated the monks of Citeaux." (Cf. Grimouard de Saint-Laurent, Art chrétien, vi. 317.)

is supported by St. Paul and St. John the Baptist on either hand. This beautiful mosaic may be safely ascribed to the original erection of the church by Justinian in the 6th century. The cupola of the church of St. Sophia, at Salonica (Thessalonica), ascribed by M. Texier to the same date as its namesake at Constantinople, i.e. the middle of the 6th century, contains a mosaic of the Ascension, the Blessed Virgin and the Apostles being ranged round the base of the hemisphere. She alone is nimbed, and wears the conventional veil and purple dress.[4] In the semidome of the apse she is also represented, holding the infant Saviour (Texier, Eglises byzantines, pp. 142–144, pl. xl.). A medallion portrait of the Virgin in a blue veil and robe, with her hands outstretched in prayer to the enthroned figure of Christ, which occurs over the royal door in the narthex of St. Sophia, at Constantinople, belongs to the time of Constantine Pogonatus, 668–685. This mosaic is very inferior to the former both in design and execution.

The earliest mosaic picture of the Virgin in the West is, as we have said, that in the chapel of St. Venantius at the Lateran, which may be placed about A.D. 642. She is entirely absent from the early mosaics of St. Maria Maggiore (c. A.D. 433), except in the historical scenes of the Annunciation, Presentation in the Temple, Adoration of the Magi and Christ among the Doctors, as well as from those which decorated the basilica of St. Paul's-without-the-Walls before its destruction by fire; she is not anywhere represented in the mosaics of the 5th century at Ravenna, except as a member of the Magi group; nor does she appear in those of St. Cosmas and St. Damian, c. A.D. 530, or St. Lawrence, c. A.D. 578, in Rome. Indeed the absence of representations of the Virgin in the earlier Roman churches is remarkable. The earliest example in which we find her occupying the position of chief dignity, formerly reserved for our Blessed Lord, in the centre of the conch of the apse, and exchanging her primitive attitude of prayer and adoration for that of a throned queen, is the mosaic of the apse of the cathedral of Parenzo in Istria, the work of bishop Euphrasius, A.D. 535–543. She is throned and nimbed, and supported by angels, holding her Son in her lap, rather as a diminutive man than as an infant (Neale, Notes on Dalmatia, frontispiece, pp. 79, 80; Eitelberger, Kunstdenkmale des österreichischen Kaiserstaates, Heft 4, 5; Lohde, Der Dom von Parenzo). The church of St. Maria de Navicella, or in Domnica, built by Paschal I., c. A.D. 820, is the first in Rome, in which this new type is found. The vault of the apse is here occupied by a colossal figure of the Virgin in a blue robe sprinkled with crosses, seated on a golden and jewelled throne, surrounded by a throng of angels and archangels in attitudes of adoring praise. Christ is seated on His Mother's lap in a golden robe, as at Parenzo, rather as a dwarfed man than as an infant, and blesses with His right hand. The builder, pope Paschal, distinguished by the square nimbus as being alive at the time of the execution of the work, kneeling, humbly holds the Virgin's right foot to kiss it. The whole composition is coarse and tasteless, without shadow, or any attempt at grouping, but the general effect is imposing. (Ciampini, Vet. Mon. ii. p. 140 sq., pl. xliv.; D'Agincourt, Peintures, pl. xvii. fig. 15; Vitet, Histoire de l'Art, vol. i. p. 255.) In the mosaics of the church of St. Cecilia, the work of the same pope, we see another significant advance in the cultus of the Virgin. The face of the Arch of Triumph is here richly decorated with mosaics, recalling the design of several of the earlier works. Below are ranged the four-and-twenty elders in their white robes, offering their crowns in adoration. Above, ten crowned virgins between palm-trees advance with their offerings; an angel stands on either side of the central compartment. But that compartment is not occupied, as in earlier times, by Christ, or by the Holy Lamb, but by a crowned and throned figure of the Virgin bearing the Child Jesus on her knees. (Ciampini, Vet. Mon. ii. p. 153, cxxvii. tab. 50; D'Agincourt, Peinture, pl. xvii. no. 14; Wharton Marriott, Testimony of the Catacombs, p. 49.) We have a similar representation of the Virgin crowned and enthroned as Queen of Heaven in the vault of the apse of St. Francesca Romana (originally St. Maria Antiqua), rebuilt by pope Leo IV., and decorated with mosaics by pope Nicholas I., A.D. 858–868 (Ciampini, ii. p. 102, c. xxviii. tab. 53), and in the cathedral of Capua, constructed by bishop Ugo at the end of the 8th or beginning of the 9th century, of which we give a woodcut (Ciampini, ii. p. 165, c. xxix. tab. liv.). It took three centuries more to reach the climax we see in the mosaics of the church of Sta. Maria in Trastevere, where we find the Virgin seated on the same throne with her Son, and on His right side. He lays His right hand on His Mother's shoulder, and in His left is a book inscribed with the words "Veni electa Mea, et ponam in te thronum Meum." But the date of this is far beyond our limits, A.D. 1130–1143, and with this our notices of the pictorial representations of the Blessed Virgin Mary must conclude.

MASS. [MISSA.]

MASSA CANDIDA. In the persecutions under Valerius it is said that 300 Christians in the district of Carthage who refused to sacrifice to the emperor were compelled to leap into a burning lime-kiln, where they were suffocated. This body of Christians was called Massa Candida, the White, or Bright, Mass (Prudentius, Peristeph. v. 87; Sidonius, Epit. vi. i.). Augustine (Sermo 311 [al. 115]) calls it the White Mass of Utica, because (according to Baronius) these martyrs were specially commemorated at that place, and (Sermo 306 [al. 112], c. 2) refers the epithet "candida" to the brightness of the cause for which the martyrs suffered. Compare Enarr. in Ps. 49, c. 9; Ps. 144, c. 16. The Carthaginian calendar places their commemoration in August, and most later martyrologies Aug. 24. The Mart. Rom. Vet. has on that day simply "Massae Candidae Carthagini." Usuard and Ado give the number as 300, and the latter adds some particulars. The Hieronymian Martyrology has this festival on Aug. 18. [C.]

MATHANA. [MARTHA, (6).]

MATHEMATICUS, an astrologer. The name was assumed and popularly conceded from the first century downwards, as masters of legerdemain are now sometimes called "professors." It is employed by Juvenal (vi. 562; xiv. 248, Nota mathematicis genesis tua), by Tacitus (Hist. i. 22), both about 100, and by their contemporary Suetonius (Tiber. 14). The last named uses "mathematica" of the art itself: "Circa deos et religiones negligentior, quippe addictus mathematicae" (ibid. 69). Similarly Sextus Empiricus, about 220: "De astrologia aut mathematica" (Adv. Mathem. 21). Aulus Gellius, probably about 160, after explaining the true meaning of the word, viz. one devoted to the study of the arts and sciences, proceeds to say, "But the vulgar call those mathematici whom they ought to call by a name of nation Chaldeans" (Noct. Att. i. 9). Elsewhere he speaks of those who "call themselves Chaldeans and genethliaci [see ASTROLOGERS; GENETHLIACI], and profess themselves able to declare the future from the motion of the stars" (xiv. 1). But though Gellius and several others say expressly that the name was given to astrologers by the vulgar, it is evident from others that they affected it themselves. Thus Sextus Empiricus (u. s.): "Genealogia, which the Chaldeans decorating with magnificent names call themselves mathematici and astrologers." Firmicus (about 360), who wrote on judicial astrology under the name of Mathesis (comp. Tertullian, de Idol. 91; Prudentius, c. Symmachum, ii. p. 296, ed. 1596; etc.), claims the title for his fraternity. See Mathes. i. praef. and c. 2.

Among Christian writers, St. Augustine speaks of those "who were called genethliaci, because of their observation of days of birth, but are now commonly (vulgo) called mathematici" (De Doctr. Christ. ii. 21, § 32). "The ancients," he says, with Gellius, "did not call those men mathematici who are now so termed" (De Divers. Quaest. xlv. 2). Yet he used the word freely in the later sense, probably because it was better understood than astrologi, etc. See De Gen. ad Litt. ii. 17, § 36; De Civ. Dei, v. 1, etc.). This popular use of the term is also insisted on by St. Jerome: "Among the Chaldeans I think that they are called γενεθλιαλόγοι, whom the vulgar call mathematici" (Comment. in Dan. ii. 2). Again: "The Astrologers of the sky (Sept. Isai. xlvii. 13), who are commonly called Mathematici, and believe the affairs of men to be controlled by the course and falling of the stars" (Comm. in Isai. c. 2. lib. xiii.). Quite in accordance with these authorities, Ammianus, probably a heathen, about 380, says of Heliodorus, whom he had described (Hist. xxix. 1) as "fatorum per genituras interpretem," that he was "mathematicus ut memorat vulgus" (ibid. 2).

The council of Laodicea, however, about 365, appears to distinguish between astrologi and mathematici, when it forbids persons in orders to be "magi or enchanters, or mathematici or astrologers" (can. 36). Balsamon explains here that "the mathematici are those who think that the heavenly bodies have dominion over the universe, and that all our affairs are regulated by their motion;" while "astrologers are persons who with the aid of demons divine by the stars and believe them" (Comm. in can.). Of the four μαθήματα, Arithmetic, Music, Geometry, Astronomy, he therefore thought the last only to be forbidden; but Zonaras (Comm. in can.) was of opinion that the canon only forbids excessive addiction to any of them. From their comments we may infer that the bad conventional sense of the word was better known to the Latins than to the Greeks.

Mathematici are condemned by name without explanation in laws of Constantius of the years 357, 358 (Codex Theodos. ix. 16; de Malef. 4, 6), of Valens, 370 (ibid. 8), and of Honorius, 409 (ibid. 12). The last consigned them to perpetual banishment, unless they burned their books before the bishop and made a profession of Christianity. Comp. Ammianus (Hist. xxix. 1, 2), who relates the burning of numberless books under Valens, 371, on the pretence that they were "illiciti," and of whole libraries burnt by their owners in the panic caused by the persecution.

From the opinion that astrologers were in league with demons there arose at a later period the belief that the "mathematici," identified with them, practised the black art in every form. Thus, in a very ancient penitential preserved at Fleury: "If any one has been a mathematicus, i. e. has invoked a demon, and taken away the minds of men or driven them mad, let him suffer penance five years," etc. (c. 33; Martene, de Rit. Eccl. Ant. i. vi. vii. 5); in another: "If any one be a mathematicus, i. e. has taken away the mind of a person through invocation of demons, let him," etc. (Pœnitentiale Rom. in Morin. de Pœnit. App. 566. See also Cigheri, Eccl. Dogm. x. 223, 7.) [W. E. S.]

MATINS (Matutina oratio, solemnitas; Matutinum officium; Matutinæ Laudes), the office anciently said at dawn of day, before sunrise; the nocturnal office being so arranged that the lauds, which formed part of it, should be said at this time. There is an interesting indication of the nature of this office in Gregory of Tours' account of the death of St. Gall: "At ille psalmo quinquagesimo et benedictione decantata et alleluiatico cum capitello expleto consummavit officium totum temporis matutini." That is, he said, the 50th (51st A.V.) Psalm, the Benedicite (often known as Benedictio), the 148th with the two following (alleluiatic) Psalms, and the Capitulum. MATISCONENSIA CONCILIA. [MÂCON, COUNCILS OF.]

MATRICIA, wife of presbyter Macedonius; commemorated at Nicomedia March 13 (Hieron. Mart.). [C. H.]

MATRICULA. A catalogue or index. In ecclesiastical writers the word means:

1. The roll of the clergy belonging to any church. The fourth council of Carthage (Cod. Eccl. Afric. c. 86) speaks of the roll (matricula et archivus) of the African church, containing the dates of the ordinations of the bishops, by which their precedence was determined, copies of which were to be kept by the primate and in the metropolis. The Council of Agde, A.D. 506 (c. 2), orders that contumacious clergy on repentance shall have their names replaced on the "matricula," and so be restored to their grades and offices. The fourth council of Orleans, A.D. 541 (c. 13), claims certain privileges as belonging to all the clergy whose names are inserted in the "matricula."

2. The poor who received stipends from the revenues of the church. The widows who received allowances were sometimes called "matriculae." Gregory the Great (Ep. ii. 45) speaks of a widow "de matricula" who had been severely beaten for some fault. [MATRICULARII.] Hence Matricula came to mean the fund from which the stipends were paid; as when it is said that vows must be paid either directly to the poor or to the Matricula (Conc. Autissiod. Auxerre, c. 3).

3. The house in which the poor were lodged, often built at the door of the church, and with revenues attached to it. St. Remigius of Rheims in his will (Flodoard, Hist. Rem. i. 18) leaves certain funds for the maintenance of twelve poor persons, living in the "matricula" and waiting at the church doors for their allowance ("ante fores expectantes stipem"); and, in another part of the same will, mentions the guest-houses and "all the matriculae." Ducange (Gloss.), quoting from a tabulary of the church of Autun, speaks of a "matricula" built at the door of the church of St. Nazarius. Gregory of Tours (de Mirac. ii. 37) speaks of feeding the poor belonging to the "matricula" of a certain church, and (Hist. Franc. c. 11) of the poor belonging to a matricula close in front of a church. Adrevaldus (de Mirac. S. Benedicti, i. 20) speaks of a matricula as among the property of the church of Orleans. King Dagobert I. is said to have founded a matricula and xenodochium for the poor of either sex, especially for those who, having been thought worthy to be restored to health by the grace of the saints, wished to remain there in the service of the church (Gesta Dagoberti, c. 29; Migne, Patrol. tom. xcvi. 1395).

4. For Matricula in another sense see MOTHER CHURCH.

MATRICULARII. The poor who were borne on the matricula or roll of the church. Gregory of Tours (Hist. Franc. vii. 29) speaks of the matricularii and other poor. Aldhelm (de Laud. Virgin. c. 51) relates that certain women gave their necklaces and other ornaments to the maimed and the matricularii. Hincmar of Rheims (Capitul. de Reb. Mag. c. 17) enjoins that matricularii should be fittingly selected, not swineherds nor herdsmen, but from among the sick and poor; and, according to Flodoard (Hist. Rem. vii. 23), complained that the matricularii had been driven away from the matricula which he had founded, and the house itself sold for the price of an ass. Again (Capit. d. t. in Synod. Rem. c. 2), he forbade presbyters to exact any kind of service at harvest or any other time from the matricularii in return for their place in the matricula, and orders that they should receive as their stipend the allotted portion of the tithes which believers paid as fine or weregeld for their crimes. In the Gesta Dagoberti (c. 34) a modiety of certain revenues is left to the matricularii and those who served the church, and (c. 42) certain sums of money are left to the matricularii belonging to the church of the Blessed Martyrs. Isidorus Mercator, in his note on the eleventh canon of the Council of Laodicea (Bruns, Canones, i. 74) says that the women whom the Greeks called presbyterae were among the Latins called matriculariae, as maintained by the church. Certain definite rules appear in later years to have been made for their direction, probably differing in different churches. Chrodegang (Regula Canonic. last chapter) says that in the church of Metz the matricularii were made to come to church twice a month in the early morning, and remain there till the bell sounded for the third hour, when the bishop, if at leisure, was to come to them, and cause them to read edifying books. If the bishop did not attend, then the presbyter who was "custos" of the church of St. Stephen was to teach them, and to hear their confessions twice a year. On these conditions they were to receive a certain allowance of food. Those who refused to comply with these regulations were ejected from the matricula. Each matricula was to have a primicerius, whose duty was to exercise a general supervision over the inhabitants, and to whom, or to the archdeacon, was entrusted the distribution of the food. In later years distinct duties appear to have been allotted to them. A History of the Church of Autun (in Labbe's Nova Bibliotheca MS. Librorum, vol. i. p. 487), says that it was the duty of the sacrist to provide one matricularius in holy orders, and others who should be able to ring the bells and perform other duties connected with the church. The bishop was also to institute three matriculi, one of whom was to be in holy orders and serve the altar of the Holy Cross in the church. To that office was assigned as a stipend half the revenues of that altar for ever and a hundred pieces of gold. The two others were to be laymen, and had also certain revenues allotted to them. MATTHAEUS (1) [MATTHEW, ST.]

(2) Martyr with Gusmaeus at Grabedona, by Lake Larius, perhaps under Maximian; commemorated Sept. 11 (Boll. Acta SS. Sept. iii. 774). [C. H.]

MATTHEW, ST., LEGEND AND FESTIVAL OF. Of the history and labours of St. Matthew, as of so many of the apostles, but little is known beyond the brief notices of him in the New Testament. The question as to his identity with Levi falls within the province of the Bible Dictionary, and we shall therefore not dwell on it here; and for the history and special characteristics of his gospel, and for the question as to its original language, reference may be made to the article in that Dictionary.

We may here, however, allude briefly to some points of tradition respecting him. As regards the scene of his labours, Eusebius tells us that he first preached to his Hebrew fellow-countrymen and then went to other nations (Hist. Eccles. iii. 24). Eusebius merely gives the locality generally as ἀφ' ἑτέρους. The region, however, is by Socrates (Hist. Eccles. i. 19) styled Ethiopia, whatever that term may be supposed to mean. Some light may be thrown upon it by noticing that the Ethiopia of St. Matthias was in western Asia, in the neighbourhood of Colchis, with which agree generally the notices of martyrologies mentioned below, which place the apostle's death in Persia (cf. also Ambrose, Enarr. in Psal. xlv. 10; Patrol. xiv. 1198). The Mart. Hieronymi gives in its prologue, "in Ethiopia, civitate Thartium," and on September 21, "in Persida (sic), civitate Tarrium." Paulinus of Nola speaks of Parthia as the scene of St. Matthew's labours (Poems xix. 81, where see Muratori's note; Patrol. lxi. 514), and Venantius Fortunatus (Poemata, lib. viii. 6; Patrol. lxxxviii. 270) specifies the name of the town, "Matthaeum eximium Naddaver alta virum." This place is mentioned by the Pseudo-Abdias (Vita S. Matth.) as in Ethiopia, probably used in a very vague way. On the other hand, Isidore (de ortu et obitu Patrum, c. 76; Patrol. lxxxiii. 153) says that St. Matthew, after preaching in Judaea, went into Macedonia, and at last died "in montibus Parthorum."

It cannot be definitely said whether St. Matthew suffered a martyr's death. Clement of Alexandria, quoting Heracleon the Gnostic, seems to acquiesce in the statement that he died a natural death (Strom. vi. 9). Later writers generally take the other view, in accordance with the natural tendency to amplify. Not to allude at present to the martyrologies, we find Nicephorus (Hist. Eccles. ii. 41) describing the work, sufferings, and death of St. Matthew in Myrmene, the city of the Anthropophagi. We meet with this also in the Apocryphal Acts, to which we shall again refer. One other tradition about St. Matthew may be mentioned here, which we are told by Clement of Alexandria (Paedag. ii. 1), that the apostle abstained altogether from flesh, and lived on berries, fruits, and herbs.

We need not do more than allude in the most passing way to the story of the translation of the body of St. Matthew to Brittany (where it was conveyed from Ethiopia in the 9th century!), and thence, at the expense of a startling anachronism, to Lucania by the emperor Valentinian. In or about the year A.D. 954, it was removed to Salernum (Leo Ostiensis, in Acta Sanctorum, infra), where May 6 is observed as the commemoration of the translation. Strangely enough, a second finding at Salernum is recorded in the time of Gregory VII. about A.D. 1080.

When a festival of St. Matthew first arose, distinct from the collective festival of all the apostles, it is impossible to say definitely, but it is certainly late. It is absent from many forms of Western liturgies, which we shall mention below, and it would appear that there are scarcely any sermons or homilies found for this day, even in writers of the 9th and 10th centuries, among the few being one by Nicetas Paphlago (Combefis, Auctarium, p. 401). The day specially associated with St. Matthew in the Western church is September 21. This festival, however, is wanting in the Leonine, Gelasian, and Gallican liturgies, and in the Orationale Gothicum. It is found in the Gregorian Sacramentary in the edition of Menard (col. 130), but is obelised as doubtful in that of Pamelius, and omitted in that of Muratori. Menard's edition also gives a mass for the vigil, but it cannot be doubted that both masses are a later addition. Menard himself remarks (not. in loc.) that both masses, especially that for the vigil, are wanting in some of the best MSS. On the other hand, the festival is recognised in the Ambrosian Liturgy, as we now have it (Pamelius, Liturgg. Latt. i. 423), and in the Mozarabic Liturgy and Breviary (Patrol. lxxxv. 861, lxxxvi. 1205). We also find it in the Latin martyrologies generally, as in the Mart. Hieronymi, Romanum, Bede, Ado, Usuard, and Notker. The notice in the metrical martyrology of Bede is, "Undecimas capit at Matthaeus doctor amoenus" (Patrol. xciv. 605); that of Wandalbert (Patrol. cxxi. 611):—

"Deseruit Christo mundi qui lucra vocante Undecimum Matthaeus evangelico ore sacravit."

Besides, however, the commemoration on September 21, the Mart. Hieronymi, as edited by D'Achery (Spicilegium, vol. iv. pp. 617 sqq.), gives the name of St. Matthew several times. Thus we have on May 1, "Nat. Matthaei et Jacobi;" on May 6, "In Persida, nat. S. Matthaei apostoli et evangelistae;" on May 21,[a] "S. Matthaei apostoli;" on September 21 (supra); and on October 7, "Nat. S. Matthaei evangelistae." What these multiplied commemorations mean, it is very hard to say; possibly they point to the conclusion that we have here a collection of various partial and local commemorations. It may be noted here that the Cdd. Hagenoyensis and Vaticanus, cited by Soller among the various auctaria to Usuard's Martyrology, associate May 6 with the traditional translation of the apostle's body to Salernum (Patrol. cxxiv. 29). With this statement, however, though found in Baronius's Mart. Rom., we need not concern ourselves, for the alleged date of this translation is, as we have seen, very late.

The calendars of the Greek and Russian Churches commemorate St. Matthew on November 16 (Neale, Eastern Church; Int. p. 784). The notice for this day in the Greek metrical calendar prefixed by Papebroch to the Acta Sanctorum for May (vol. i. p. liii.) is, ἀπόστολον Ματθαῖον πὺρ δεκάτῃ κτάνεν ἕκτῃ. The Ethiopic and Egyptian calendars published by Ludolf put the festival of St. Matthew on October 9 (Comm. ad Hist. Aeth. p. 394). The same is also the case in the Egyptian calendars published by Selden (de Synedriis veterum Ebraeorum, pp. 212, 222, ed. Amsterdam, 1679), one of which also gives another commemoration on August 30 (ib. p. 210). Ludolf's Egyptian calendar has also a commemoration of St. Matthew on November 16 (p. 394); and in the list of commemorations of saints in the Armenian Church this last day is associated with St. Matthew (Assemani, Bibl. Or. iii. 1. 648).

As regards the pseudonymous literature attributed to St. Matthew, we may mention (1) the apocryphal Latin gospel of Matthew, on the birth of the Virgin and the infancy of the Saviour, edited in part by Thilo, and fully by Tischendort (Evangelia Apocrypha, pp. xxv, 50). A majority of the MSS. of this gospel prefix two letters, according to which it is a translation by Jerome from the Hebrew. It is on the authority of this preface that the gospel is referred to St. Matthew. It is impossible to say whether we are to connect this with the reference made by Innocent I. (Epist. vi. ad Exuperium Tolosanum, c. 7; Patrol. xx. 502) to sundry apocryphal writings professing to be due to some of the apostles, among them perhaps being Matthew. The reading, however, varies between Matthew and Matthias,[b] the latter being apparently to be preferred. (2) The acts of Andrew and Matthew [Greek] in the city of the Anthropophagi, first published separately by Thilo and since by Tischendorf (Acta Apostolorum Apocrypha, pp. xlvii, 132). Here, as in the previous case, it is very doubtful whether we are to read Matthew or Matthias. Tischendorf, following his oldest Greek MS., gives Matthias; but the other Greek MSS. and the Latin give Matthew; so also do the Syriac acts, published by Dr. Wright [MATTHIAS]. (3) We have also another book of the acts and martyrdom of St. Matthew, first published by Tischendorf (op. cit. pp. lx, 167); the passage we have already cited from Nicephorus gives an account closely resembling that of these acts. (4) There is extant a Syro-Jacobite liturgy, bearing the name of Matthew, a Latin translation of which is given by Fabricius (Codex Pseudepigr. N. T. iii. 211 sqq.) and Renaudot (Liturg. Orient. Collectio, ii. 346, ed. 1847). By a curious carelessness, some have spoken of this liturgy as associated with the name of the apostle, the professed name of the author being really "Matthew the Shepherd," and the date of its composition being probably the end of the 11th century (Neale, op. cit. p. 330).[c] (5) Lastly, with the name of Matthew is associated the regulation for the ecclesiastical order of readers, given in the Apostolical Constitutions (viii. 22).

[a] This only occurs in some MSS.; the Cdd. Corbeiensis, Epternacensis (Acta Sanctorum, September, vol. vi. p. 194).

[b] This statement as to the various reading is given on the authority of Tischendorf (op. cit. p. xxvi.).

[R. S.]

MATTHIAS, ST., LEGEND AND FESTIVAL OF. Of this apostle the New Testament tells us nothing beyond the fact of his election to fill the place of the traitor Judas, and that previously he had been a follower of our Lord throughout the whole of his ministry. Nor is there any great amount of trustworthy tradition concerning him. It is indeed asserted that he was one of the seventy disciples, and this is by no means improbable. (Eusebius, Hist. Eccles. i. 12; Sophronius, in the Appendix to Jerome de Viris Illust. [vol. ii. 958, ed. Vallarsi]; Epiphanius, i. 20; Dorotheus, Synopsis [in Magn. Bibl. Patr. iii. 148, ed. 1618]; Rabanus Maurus, infra.)

According to Isidore (de Vita et Obitu Patrum, c. 79; Patrol. lxxxiii. 153), Judaea was the scene of St. Matthias's labours. The same statement also is generally found in the Latin martyrologies (see e.g. those of Bede [Patrol. xciv. 848], Rabanus Maurus [ib. cx. 1133], Usuard [ib. cxxiii. 791], and Notker [ib. cxxxii 1048]). The general tenour of the language of the above would seem to imply that the apostle died a natural death.

Other witnesses, again, speak of St. Matthias as labouring in Ethiopia (Sophronius, l. c.; Dorotheus, l. c.; Nicephorus, Hist. Eccles. ii. 40; see also the Martyrology of Sirletus in Canisius, Thesaurus, iii. 456). We must assume, however, that we have here an exceptional use of the word Ethiopia, for the locality is further defined (see e.g. Sophronius, l. c., Dorotheus, l. c.) as being by the mouth of the Apsarus (which flows into the Euxine), and the haven of Hyssus, which would identify the country with Cappadocia. Here he died and was buried (ἕως τῆς σήμερον, Sophronius), the more minute statement being given by Dorotheus that he died in Sebastopolis, and was buried there near the temple of the sun. It may be noted here that the Ethiopia is differently named by the above writers; Sophronius speaks of ἡ δευτέρα Αἰθιοπία, Nicephorus of ἡ πρώτη Αἰθ., and the Menaea of ἡ ἔξω Αἰθ.

It is uncertain when a festival of St. Matthias first came to be celebrated. It does not occur in the Gelasian Sacramentary, or in the Comes Hieronymi, but is found in some forms of the Gregorian Sacramentary (col. 29, ed. Menard), under the heading Natalis S. Matthiae Apostoli, and is doubtlessly to be viewed as one of the later additions to this sacramentary.[a] The Hispano-Gothic calendar does not give the festival, but we find it in the Mozarabic Missal and Breviary. The day associated with St. Matthias in the Western church is February 24, and his festival on that day is recognised in most Western martyrologies and calendars (see e.g. in addition to those specified above, the Mart. Hieronymi [Patrol. xxx. 445], the Mart. Rom. Vet., and the St. Gall MS. of the Mart. Gellonense [D'Achery, Spicilegium, xiii. 422]). Henschenius, however (Acta Sanctorum, May, vol. iii. 436), mentions an ancient MS. Mart. Hieronymi, which omits the festival altogether.

In consequence of February 24 having been chosen as the day for the festival, it followed that in leap-years it would fall on February 25.[b] The reason of this is, that a day was intercalated in such years, so that the "vi. Kal. Mart." came twice over, whence the name bissextile. Thus in a leap-year, the real "vi. Kal. Mart." would be February 25, the preceding day being viewed as the supernumerary one.[c]

It may be noted that in one MS. of the Mart. Hieronymi (the Cod. Lucensis), May 21 is marked "alibi Matthiae apostoli." As all other MSS., however, read Matthaei, this must be viewed as evidently a mistake (Patrol. cxviii. 791).

In the calendar of the Greek Church, the festival of St. Matthias falls on August 9.[d] The notice for this day in the Greek metrical Ephemerides, prefixed by Papebroch to the Acta Sanctorum for May (vol. i. p. xxxix.), is ἥρθη ἀμφ' ἑνάτῃ ξύλῳ ἰούδεος Ματθίας. The epistle and gospel in the Greek Church are Acts i. 12–17, 21–26, and Luke x. 16–21. The Ethiopic calen-

[a] Some writers have appealed to the calendar of Athelstan's Psalter as proving that the festival of St. Matthias existed in England by A.D. 703. It has been shewn, however, by Heurtley (Harmonia Symbolica, pp. 74 sqq.) that this calendar is, in all probability, to be referred to the period A.D. 901–1008.

[b] A curious instance is mentioned by Southey (The Doctor, c. 90), in which the emperor Maximilian failed in an enterprise against Bruges through forgetfulness of this fact. Southey himself, however, would seem not to have been aware of the true explanation.

[c] In the English Prayer Books of 1549, 1552, 1559, it is ruled that on Feb. 25, which in leap-years counts as two days, the same Psalms and Lessons shall serve for the two days. The Calendar of 1561, followed by the Prayer-Book of 1604, reverts to the old plan, and so the Psalms and Lessons of the 23rd are read again the following day, except this latter be Sunday. In 1662, the intercalated day was taken as the 29th, according to the present plan.

[d] In the Menology of Cardinal Sirletus, already referred to, the name of St. Matthias occurs at the end of the entry for Aug. 8, which is doubtless due to a mere error of the transcriber, who should have put it at the head of the following day.

[c] Assemani (Bibl. Or. iii. 1, 637) mentions a MS. of this Liturgy in the Vatican, at the end of which it is styled the "Liturgy of Matthew the Shepherd, who is called Hermas, one of the Seventy."

dar published by Ludolf (Comm. ad Hist. Aeth. p. 410) fixes the festival on March 4 [Magabit 8].

A certain amount of pseudonymous literature is associated with the name of this apostle. An apocryphal gospel under the name of Matthias is mentioned by Origen (Hom. i. in Luc. vol. v. 87, ed. Lommatzsch) and Eusebius (Hist. Eccles. iii. 25); and in the acts of a council held at Rome in the episcopate of Gelasius (A.D. 494), we find "Evangelium (al. Evangelia) nomine Matthiae apocryphum" (Patrol. lix. 162, 175). This may, perhaps, be the same as the παραδόσεις of St. Matthias referred to several times by Clement of Alexandria. From him it would appear that the work was written in the interests of some Gnostic sect, for he speaks of the followers of Valentinus, Marcion, and Basilides, boasting that they quoted the opinion of Matthias (Strom. vii. 17). Clement several times quotes this book (Strom. ii. 9, iii. 4, vii. 13).[e] Besides this, there are apocryphal acts of Andrew and Matthias, published by Thilo in a separate form, and also by Tischendorf (Acta Apostolorum Apocrypha, pp. xlvii, 132). Thilo refers the origin to Leucius, and speaks of the book as used specially by the Gnostics and Manichaeans. It should be added, however, that it seems very doubtful whether we should read the name Matthias or Matthew. Tischendorf, following the oldest Greek MS., gives Matthias, but the other Greek MSS. and the Latin give Matthew. So also do the Syriac acts recently published by Dr. Wright. We may add here that Innocent I. (Epist. ad Exs. erium Tolosanum; Labbe, ii. 1256) condemns sundry writings ascribed to Matthias and other apostles, but referred by him to Leucius. Besides these, we have Acts of St. Matthias extant in Latin, professing to be translated from the Hebrew by a monk of Treves, it would seem in the 12th century (Acta Sanct. supra, p. 447). Finally, the name of St. Matthias[f] is connected in the Apostolic Constitutions with the regulations as to the blessing of oil and wine, and firstfruits and tithes (Apost. Const. viii. 28 sqq.). [e] This passage is not distinctly referred to the παραδόσεις, but it is probably to be connected therewith.

[f] Some MSS. here read Matthew, but this is an obvious error, since the name of this latter apostle has already been given.

MAUNDY THURSDAY (Dies Mandati), the Thursday in Holy Week, the day of the institution of the Last Supper and of our Lord's betrayal, so called with reference to the antiphon "Mandatum novum do vobis, ut diligatis invicem" (Joh. xiii. 34) appropriated to it. The name, which is not a very early one, probably contains also an allusion to the other command of our Lord in the same chapter (Joh. xiii. 14–16), as well as to the τοῦτο ποιεῖτε of Luke xxii. 19; 1 Cor. xi. 24. The collect at the giving of the Kiss of Peace in the Gothic missal (Muratori, Liturg. Roman. Vetus, ii. 578) speaks of "commands" in the plural "inter praecipua mandatorum tuorum Patribus nostris Apostolis reliquisti." In later times "Mandatum" by itself stood for the "Footwashing," which had been instituted on this day, and even for the apartment in a monastery appropriated to it (Ducange, sub voc.). Other names for this day are ἡ μεγάλη πέμπτη, ἡ ἁγία πέντας, feria quinta paschae; also, as the day of the institution of the Eucharist, Coena Domini, dies coenae Domini, feria quinta in coena Dominica, dies natalis Eucharistiae, natalis calicis, dies panis, lucis, mysteriorum; also, with reference to the other ceremonials belonging to the day, dies competentium, dies indulgentiae, dies pedilavii. The more recent title, dies viridium, to which the German name Gründonnerstag corresponds, is of uncertain origin. The references to a supposed introit (Ps. xxii. 2), and to our Lord's words (Luke xxiii. 31), are purely conjectural (Herzog, Real-Encycl. xviii. 223; Augusti, Christ. Archäol. i. 549).

The ceremonials specially belonging to Maundy Thursday which call for notice are those relating to the candidates for Baptism, the Reconciliation of Penitents, the Consecration of the Chrism, and the Administration of the Eucharist.

(a) Catechumens.—In some churches the redditio symboli took place this day; i.e. the catechumens were required to repeat the creed which had been given them by the bishop and presbyters to learn by heart (traditio symboli). We find this ceremony fixed for Maundy Thursday in the canons of Laodicea (can. 46; Labbe, i. 1504), and in the "capitula" of Martin, bishop of Braga (cap. 49; ib. v. 911), and in the canons of the Quinisext or Trullan council (can. 78; ib. vi. 1175). The more usual time for this repetition was Easter-even (Martene, de Rit. Ant. Eccl. i. 116, lib. i. c. i. art. 13, § 2). The pedilavium or washing of the feet of the catechumens, of which some traces appear in the ritual of the early church, was in some cases performed on this day, the washing of the head, capitilavium, having taken place on Palm Sunday. There is a reference to this ceremony in two letters of Augustine to Januarius (Epist. cxviii. cxix. c. 18); but in the former he speaks of the custom of the catechumens bathing the whole body and not only of washing the feet on this day, and that merely for purposes of cleanliness "quia baptizandorum corpora per observationem quadragesimae sordidata cum offensione sensus ad fontem tractarentur, nisi aliquo die lavarentur. Istum autem diem potius ad hoc electum quo coena Domini anniversarie celebratur," and adds that this liberty being granted to the catechumens, many others claimed it also, and bathed with them on this day—a luxury forbidden during Lent. In the second letter he makes particular mention of washing the feet of the catechumens on the day when our Lord gave this lesson of humility "quo ipsa commendatio religiosius inhaereret," but adds that lest it should appear to be in any way essential to the sacrament many churches had never admitted the custom at all; others had discontinued it, while some had postponed it till a later day. Although this custom was never received by the church of Rome (Ambros. de Sacram. iii. 1), it prevailed for a time widely among other churches, as those of Gaul, Milan, and Spain, but it soon fell out of favour, and was expressly prohibited by the canons of the council of Elvira, A.D. 306 (can. 48; Labbe, i. 976), which prohibition passed into the "Corpus Juris canonici" (c. civ. causa i. q. 1, lib. i. c. i. art. 13, § 1; Bingham, bk. xii. c. iv. § 10; Herzog, vol. iv. p. 630; Martene, tom. i. pp. 116, 141). BAPTISM, vol. i. p. 164.

(b) Reconciliation of Penitents.—At a very early time Maundy Thursday was appointed as the day for the public absolution of penitents. The letter of Innocent I. to Decentius, bishop of Eugubium (c. 7) (if indeed it is rightly given to him and is not to be assigned to a later period) states that the custom of the Church of Rome was to grant absolution either of venial or mortal sins only, "quinta feria ante Pascha," unless the penitent was attacked by severe sickness (Labbe, ii. 1247). St. Ambrose, writing to his sister Marcellina, names this day as the usual one for the relaxation of penance, "erat dies quo Dominus sese pro nobis tradidit, quo in ecclesia poenitentialia relaxantur" (Epist. 33 ad Marcellin. cf. Hexaemeron, lib. v. c. 25), and St. Jerome speaks of Fabiola as standing in public penance on this day, "quis hoc crederet . . . ut tota urbe spectante Romana ante diem paschae staret in ordine poenitentium?" (Hieron. Epist. 30, Epitaph. Fabiol.). The same custom is evidenced by the various homilies, "ad reconciliandos poenitentes," delivered "in Coena Domini," referred to by Martene (Ant. Eccl. Rit. lib. i. cap. vi. art. 5, § 10, tom. ii. p. 31; tom. i. p. 284). A letter of Gilbert "Lunicensis Episcopus," contained in Ussher's Epistolae Hibernicae (Ep. 30, p. 86), states the custom of the Irish church to be that venial sins were absolved "in capite jejunii," mortal sins "in Coena Domini." The penitents first assembled outside the church doors, where they heard a sermon from the bishop; they were then admitted into the church and heard the "missa pro reconciliatione poenitentium," absolution being granted them before the offertory. In the "Ordo agentibus publicam poenitentiam," assigned in the Sacramentary of Gelasius to this day, the deacon pleads the cause of the penitents, which, after certain collects, is followed by the "ordo ad reconciliandum poenitentem," and the "oratio post reconciliationem" when the penitent has communicated (Muratori, Lit. Rom. Vet. i. 548–551).

(c) Consecration of Chrism.—The sacred oil being needed in large quantities for the anointing of the newly-baptized at Easter, it naturally became the custom to consecrate it shortly before that festival. Gradually the consecration was limited to one day, and by the 5th century it had become the rule that the whole of the chrism that was required for the use of the year should be consecrated on Maundy Thursday. In the Comes Hieronymi we find under this day "Chrisma conficitur," and in the sacramentary of Gregory (Pamel. ii. 251) is the rubric "in ipso die item conficitur chrisma," followed by the proper collects and exorcism, and the "benedictio chrismatis principalis." The Gelasian Sacramentary supplies a "missa chrismalis" for Maundy Thursday, containing the "benedictio olei," and the "olei exorcizanti confectio," corresponding very closely with those in the Gregorian rite (Muratori, Lit. Rom. Vet. i. 554 sq.). A similar form appears in the Missa Ambrosiana given by Pamelius (Liturgicon, i. 340). The fullest directions for the ritual relating to the consecration of the Chrisma on Maundy Thursday are to be found in the Ordo Romanus i. (Muratori, Lit. Rom. Vet. ii. 991 sq.). [CHRISM.]

(d) Eucharist.—Maundy Thursday was the only day in the year when, throughout the whole Christian world, the Eucharist was celebrated in the evening and partaken of after a meal, and that, as far as we know, only in the African church. The 29th canon of the third council of Carthage, A.D. 397, specially excepts this day from the rule that the sacrament of the altar should be celebrated fasting, "ut sacramenta altaris nonnisi a jejunis hominibus celebrentur excepto uno die anniversario quo coena Domini celebratur" (Labbe, ii. 1171). St. Augustine also, while insisting on fasting communion generally, mentions that some, to make the commemoration more striking, were accustomed to offer and receive the Body of the Lord after meat on the day when the Lord Himself gave His supper. We learn from him also that in some places there was on this day a double celebration, "in the morning for the sake of those who dine, and in the evening for the sake of those who fast" (Augustine, Epist. cxviii. ad Januar. c. 7). The practice of an evening celebration on this day was regarded with increasing disfavour, and was distinctly prohibited by the Quinisext or Trullan Council (can. 29), A.D. 692, with express reference to the above-mentioned canon of the council of Carthage (Labbe, vi. 1155). At the ordinary celebration on Maundy Thursday a portion of the consecrated bread was reserved for the communions on Good Friday and Easter Eve, Missa Praesanctificatorum. "Pontifex servat de Sancta usque in crastinum" (Ordo Romanus, i. Muratori, ii. 993).

(e) Other Observances.—The bells of the churches were silent from midnight on Wednesday till matins on Easter Day (Ordo Roman. i. u.s.). The altars were stripped after vespers (ibid.). There was no chanting, and the salutation "Dominus vobiscum," etc., was intermitted, as well as the Kyrie Eleison, and Et ne nos inducas, etc., after matins (Muratori, u. s. i. 548, ii. 992). At 3 P.M. a light was struck outside the church, and a candle lighted from it, which was borne on a reed in procession through the congregation to the sacristy, where a lamp was kindled and kept burning till the Saturday morning, when the Paschal taper was lighted from it (Ordo Roman. u. s.; cf. Zacaria, Epist. xii. ad Bonifacium. Labbe, vi. 1525). There are canons of several councils forbidding the Jews to appear in public, or to mix with Christians from this day till Easter Monday: e. g. the third council of Orleans, A.D. 538 (can. 30, Labbe, v. 303), and the first council of Mâcon, A.D. 581 (can. 14, ibid. 969). (Hospinianus, de Festis, pp. 48, 49.) [E. V.]

MAYENCE, COUNCIL OF (Moguntinum Concilium), A.D. 753, at which Lullus was substituted for St. Boniface, who was going back to Friesland, in the see of Mayence. [E. S. Ff.]

MEALS (IN ART). The arrangements of a Christian table do not seem to have been very different from the current habits of the time, except in greater care for moderation, sobriety, and gravity of conversation. The guests sat at table; so at least they are represented in all the representations of agapae, or other meals, which are found in the catacombs. The classic example of an apparently secular or ordinary meal is the well-known fresco from the catacomb of SS. Marcellinus and Peter (Bottari, tav. cxxvii.), given in Martigny, p. 579. Raoul Rochette (Discours sur l'Origine et le Caractère des Types imitatifs qui constituent l'Art du Christianisme) selects this, with two others, as representative examples. They are found in Bottari, tav. cviii. and cxxvii., and at vol. iii. p. 218; and Rochette has no doubt of their relation to pictures in Herculaneum and Pompeii. Nor can this be wondered at, if we consider the at times inconvenient and awkward connexion between the Christian love-feast and the heathen funeral banquet. It is acknowledged on all hands that the former reminded untaught or recent converts too strongly of the ancient hearth-worship, and of past banquets to the lares of their families. It is a sign, not yet fully appreciated, of the great vitality of the faith, that it was able to withdraw the population of Italy (even so far as it did) from Etrurian or Greco-Etrurian habits of sepulchral worship, and teach them to commemorate the death of One only. See Fergusson's History of Architecture (bk. iv. c. i. p. 281, and c. ii. p. 293, ed. 1874) and Coulange's La Cité Antique (Introd. and chapters i. ii.). On this subject the student should compare Bottari (tavv. cviii. cxxvii.) with the Pitture d'Ercolano (i. tav. xiv.); R. Museo Borbonico (t. i. tav. xxiii). The chief difference is that in the Christian picture, of which the Gentile one is a type (Bott. tav. cviii.), a round bowl is substituted for the horn or rhyton (drunk from at the small end). It seems quite clear, that except for inferior painting, and the decent dress of persons represented, Christian pictures of the same subject greatly resemble these. In the S. Marcellinus' example (known also as that of the Via Labicana, and of the catacomb Inter duas Lauros), men and women sit at meat together. The provisions and wine appear to have been handed by servants, and are not placed on the table; and the requests of two of the guests are strangely painted above their heads, "Irene da cal(i)da(m)" "Agape, misce mi." (Compare Juv. Sat. v. 63.) The names, as Rochette observes, are probably significant. The semicircular table was called sigma from the C form of that letter. The sigma may have been considered an improvement on the ordinary triclinium. Within a semicircle there is a smaller three-legged table with a large amphora. There are two or three knives, a large goblet, two little loaves, apparently, and a small animal, resembling a squirrel, is being carved. Athenaeus (iv.) describes a table of this kind, and Varro (iv. 26) calls it sibilla; others mensa escaria. A young man, apparently the carver or structor dapis, stands by in a long tunic with purple stripes. The two seated female figures at the ends of the semicircle are directing him, and may be the servants named by the guests; they would act as carptores, or prægustatrices. (Seneca, Epist. xlvii.) See woodcut.

MEDIATORS (PRIESTS). The Greek writers, when they speak of Christian priests, frequently call them μεσῖται, i.e. mediators between God and man. St. John Baptist is styled mediator by Gregory of Nazianzum, Ὁ παλαιᾶς καὶ νέας μεσίτης, as coming between the Old and New Testaments (Orat. xxxiv. p. 638). Others repeat the same idea.

The author of the Apostolical Constitutions applies this title to the priesthood (lib. ii. c. 25), as does also Origen, St. Chrysostom, St. Basil, and others of the Greek fathers. But by this they seem to have intended, not that the priest was properly a mediator independently and by his own inherent authority, but merely and by a figure of speech as an internuncius or medium of communication. In this sense St. Basil (de Spiritu Sancto, c. 14) and Theodoret, commenting on Gal. iii. 19, 20 (where the word μεσίτης is repeatedly employed), teach that Moses was a mediator between God and the people of Israel. The true mediator is, of course, the Lord Jesus. The article μεσίτης in Suicer's Thesaurus may be consulted with great advantage. He has collected a large mass of quotations from the Greek fathers, shewing that they constantly and uniformly applied the term μεσίτης, in all its varieties of meaning, to Jesus Christ.

The Latin fathers avoid the use of mediator in this sense (as applied to the priesthood). St. Cyprian uses it "discurrant ad judices, blandiantur mediatoribus" (de Cardinal. Operib. Christi Prolog.—the authorship is uncertain), but not of priests. St. Augustine strongly protests against it in his treatise against Parmenian, a Donatist bishop, who had said that the bishop was a mediator between God and the people, "Si Johannes diceret . . . mediatorem me habetis apud Patrem, et ego exoro pro peccatis vestris (sicut Parmenianus quodam loco posuit episcopum mediatorem inter populum et Deum) quis eum ferret bonorum atque fidelium Christianorum" (contra Parmen. lib. ii. c. 8).

MELOTES (μηλωτὴ from μῆλον, a sheep). The μηλωταί of Heb. xi. 37 are probably indications of distress rather than of asceticism; but when monasticism arose, a sheepskin garment, hanging down on one side, came to be the usual dress of monks in Egypt and elsewhere. Thus Eucherius says: "Melote, in Regum libro, pellis simplex qua monachi Aegyptii etiam nunc utuntur, ex uno latere dependens." This word also denotes an upper garment of goatskin; thus Cassian says (Instit. i. 8) that the outer garb of monks is a goatskin, which is called melotes; and Aelfric, "Hircinus vel fractus roccus;" or, indeed, of any kind of skin (Macri Hierolex.). Gregorius Monachus makes the melotes to have been a hood or cowl of sheepskin. (Ducange, Glossary.) [S. J. E.]

MENAEA (τὰ μηναῖα). These are office books of the Greek church which contain the variable parts of the offices for fixed festivals. Thus they contain, together with other less prominent matter, the Stichera and other similar hymns, the Lections, and the other variable parts of vespers; the Canons, with all that depends on them, of Lauds, the Synaxaria, or Lections from the Lives of the Saints, the rubrical directions from the Typicum; and on a few great festivals, such as the Epiphany, the Antiphons of the Liturgy, and the order of the three lesser hours (the 3rd, 6th, and 9th), called on these days αἱ μεγάλαι ὧραι. The Menaea are usually bound in twelve volumes, each containing the Menaeum for a month, and they correspond approximately to the Proprium Sanctorum of a Western breviary. The word is met with both in the singular and the plural, with the same signification. The office books however use the singular to denote the compilation for a single month, and the plural (τὰ μηναῖα) to denote the entire series of those for the several months. [H. J. H.]

MENAS (1) Commemorated Jan. 24 (Cal. Byzant.).

(2) Martyr with David and John, three monks; commemorated by the Greeks Ap. 12 (Boll. Acta SS. Ap. ii. 821).

(3) or MENNAS, archbishop of Constantinople, "Our father;" commemorated Aug 24 (Basil. Menol.); Aug. 25 (Boll. Acta SS. Aug. v. 164).

(4) or MENNAS, an Egyptian martyr, spoken of as "Magnus" and "Glorious;" suffered at Cotyaeum in Phrygia under Diocletian and Maximian, with Victor, Vincentius, and Stephanides; commemorated Nov. 11 (Hieron. Mart.; Basil. Menol.; Usuard. Mart.; Cal. Byzant.; Cal. Armen.; Bed. Mart.; Daniel, Cod. Liturg. iv. 274); suffered in Scythia, transl. to Constantinople (Vet. Rom. Mart.). His natalis, on Nov. 11, commemorated in Gregory's Sacramentary, and his name mentioned in the Collect (Greg. Mag. Lib. Sacr. 140). His commemoration was on Nov. 10 according to Surius (De Probat. Sanct. Hist. t. iv. p. 241, ed. Colon. 1618). A church at Constantinople was dedicated to him (Codinus, de Signis CP. 18 b).

(5) A solitary in Samnium, A.D. 583; commemorated Nov. 11 (Greg. Mag. Dial. l. iii. c. 26; Mabillon, Acta SS. O. S. B. Saec. i. p. 255, Venet. 1733).

(6) or MENNAS, martyr with Hermogenes and Eugraphus, under Maximian; commemorated Dec. 10 (Basil. Menol.; Cal. Byzant.; Daniel, Cod. Liturg. iv. 276); Dec. 3 (Cal. Armen.). [C. H.]

MENDICANCY. The frequent almsgiving inculcated upon Christians not unnaturally led the idle and the worthless to depend upon charity rather than upon their own labour. That the poor should congregate round the doors of the churches to solicit alms was regarded as a laudable custom from early times. Several passages in Chrysostom contain strong exhortations to the people to bestow money in charity before entering church. As the Christian in his day had water standing before the door that the worshippers might first wash their hands, so their forefathers placed the poor there that the power of charity might purify the soul (Chrys. Hom. xxvi. de Verb. Apost.; Hom. i. in 2 Tim.; Hom. iii. de Poenit.). With such indiscriminate almsgiving it was impossible that charity should not be abused. Ambrose found it necessary to admonish (de Offic. iv. 16) the bishops and priests, who had the treasures of the church to dispense, to be careful that they are not wasted upon importunate beggars. Many come to ask for alms out of mere idleness; they are well able to take care of themselves, and if they are indulged they will soon exhaust the provision of the poor and helpless. Moreover, they are not content with a little, they dress themselves as gentlemen, and pretend to be of good birth, and on this ground obtain a greater share. Care and moderation must, therefore, be exercised in the distribution, that those who are really in want may not be sent away empty, and that designing beggars may not make a spoil of the maintenance of the poor. Idleness has never been regarded in quite the same light in the south and east of Europe as among the more industrious nations of the north; and among the northern tribes after their conversion the conditions of life were such that habitual mendicancy must have been rare. Hence disciplinary canons against begging are not found in the Councils or Penitentials. There are, however, certain forms of the evil corrected in the Theodosian code. A law of Valentinian II. (Cod. Theod. XIV., xviii. 1, de mendicantibus non invitandis) directed the cases of all able-bodied beggars who fled from their masters to Rome in order to live on charity to be investigated, and those who were found able to work were either to be returned to their original masters or become the possession of the informer who discovered them. This law was re-enacted by Justinian (Cod. Justin. II. xxv. 1.

With regard to the clergy themselves the church was careful that they did not abuse the liberality of the people and sink into a life of idleness supported by charity. The term βακάντιβοι, or vacantivi, applied (Synesius, Ep. 67) to clergy who deserted their posts and wandered from place to place, was a stigma affixed to idleness. And it was probably with a view to check clerical mendicancy, as well as for the sake of ecclesiastical regularity, that the council of Agde, A.D. 506, decreed (c. 52) that clergy moving about from one diocese to another without commendatory letters were denied communion. The council of Epaon, A.D. 517 (c. 6), has a similar decree against clerical vagrants. And the same rule is laid down in the Spanish council of Valencia, A.D. 524 (c. 5). The tendency to idleness, inseparable from the monastic life, found no support from the early church writers. Cassian (de Coen. Instit. x. 23) quotes a saying of the Egyptian fathers, that a working monk was tempted with one devil—an idle one with a legion. Of Anthony the celebrated ascetic of the Thebaid, it is related (Vita, c. 4) that he laboured with his own hands, and gave away all he could spare. The Coenobites, or ascetics, living in communities, and of whom there were not less than 50,000 in Egypt in the 4th century, supported themselves by their own industry (Cassian, de Coen. Instit. x. 22). They employed themselves in agriculture, and in making baskets, ropes and sandals, their produce being sent down the Nile for sale in Alexandria, and what was not required for their own maintenance was given to the poor. In general it may be said that industrial occupation was the rule among the monks in the East (see Robertson, Ch. Hist. ii. 6; Monasticism). Augustine wrote a special treatise (De Opere Monachorum) directed against monks being exempted from labour. In some instances, however, manual labour was regarded with less favour. Martin, who introduced monasticism into Gaul, discouraged labour in the monasteries which he established about Poitiers and Tours. The younger brethren were allowed to transcribe books, but this was the only manual work permitted (Sulpicius Severus, Vita Martini, 10). In the great monastic system established in the West by Benedict in the first half of the 6th century manual labour was one of the distinguishing rules of the order. Seven hours daily was the time allotted to work (Regula, c. 48). The manner in which the injunction to work has been carried out by the Benedictines, both in the service of civilization and literature, is a matter of history. In the great monastery of Bangor, disciples from which contributed so much to the evangelization of the north-west of Europe, Bede states (Hist. ii. 2) that the monks supported themselves by the labour of their own hands. The exaltation of poverty into a virtue and the rise of the mendicant friars lie outside our period. [G. M.]

MENOLOGIUM (μηνολόγιον). This book corresponds with the Martyrology of the Roman church, and, like it, contains the lives and acts of the saints and martyrs. The practice of reading publicly the acts of the saints dates from very early times, and was confirmed by the 47th canon of the 3rd council of Carthage (A.D. 397), which after directing that nothing be read in the churches, "sub nomine divinarum scripturarum," except the canonical scriptures, adds, "Licet etiam legi passiones martyrum cum anniversarii dies eorum celebrantur."

Among early ecclesiastical biographers may be mentioned Eusebius (†A.D. 338), who made one of the earliest collections of the acts of the saints, also Palladius Bishop of Helenopolis in Bithynia (cir. A.D. 401), a friend of St. Chrysostom, who wrote lives of Saints and the Hermits of the Desert, the reading of which in the church was prescribed during Lent.

Many changes were made in the Menology, and great variations naturally exist in different copies. The emperor Basil the Macedonian (A.D. 867–886) caused one to be compiled; and Constantine Porphyrogenitus (A.D. 911) directed Simeon Metaphrastes,[a] the Logothete or Chancellor of the empire, to compile the lives of the saints and acts of the martyrs, arranged in order according to the months of the year. Selections from the menologium, under the name of Synaxaria (συναξάρια) are inserted in the Menaea, and read in the course of the office after the sixth ode of the canon for the day. In modern usage the term menologium is often confounded with, and used for menaeum. Thus Goar (not. 29 in Laud. Off.), "Volumen singulorum mensium officia complectens μηναῖον est, et vulgo Menologium dicunt," and (not. 33) he uses Synaxarion in the sense of Menologium, "Sanctorum vitas volumen brevibus verbis complectens, συναξάριον est: et Martyrologio correspondet, fitque in Laudibus ex eo lectio, etc. . . ." Correctly, μηνολόγιον is the entire book, and συναξάριον the extract from it. [H. J. H.]

MERIDA, COUNCIL OF (Emeritense concilium), held A.D. 666, at Merida in Estremadura. Twelve bishops, including Proficius bishop of that see, their metropolitan, subscribed to its twenty-three canons or chapters. In the first of these the creed of Constantinople, with the "Filioque" clause, is rehearsed, and followed by heavy denunciations against all who recede from, or will not assent to it. By the second, the invitatory, or "Venite" (sonus), is directed to be sung at vespers in the place assigned to it in other churches. By the third, the sacrifice is directed to be offered daily for the king and his army when engaged in war. By the ninth, fees are forbidden to be taken either for giving the chrism or for administering baptism. By the tenth, every bishop of the province is directed to have an archpresbyter, an archdeacon, and a chief-clerk (primicierum) in his cathedral church. By the sixteenth, the third part of the revenues of parish churches, anciently due to the bishop, is to be spent on repairs (Mansi, xi. 75 sq.). [E. S. Ff.]

MESSENGER. Polycarp is desired in the Ignatian epistle to him (c. 7) to choose some one who may be worthy to bear the name of θεόδρομος, to carry to Syria the tidings of his (Polycarp's) love of Christ. The word θεοπρεσβύτης is used in a precisely similar sense in the Ignatian epistle to the Smyrnaeans (c. 11); and similarly Polycarp (ad Philipp. 13) speaks of sending one to be an ambassador (πρεσβεύσοντα). These emissaries were probably in most cases deacons of the church. Baronius (Ann. A.D. 58, c. 108) wrongly supposes these θεόδρομοι to be CURSORES (p. 521) for the summoning of assemblies. METATOR. An officer sent before the sovereign when on a journey to take care that proper preparations were made for his reception. [See METATUS.] Cyprian (Ep. 81, al. 6, § 4) applies the word to Rogatian, the first martyr sent to prison in the Decian persecution, who, he says, went before the rest as a harbinger (metator) to prepare their place in the dungeon. See also Optatus, de Schism. Donat. iii. 4, § 61. [P. O.]

METATORIUM (μετατόριον, μιτατώριον, μεσατώριον) one of the subordinate buildings of an oriental church, usually regarded as identical with the diaconicum [DIACONICUM]. Thus, in the Euchologia we read of the patriarch going down "into the metatorium or diaconicum," and passing from it to the altar from the right-hand side. Cedrenus records that when the emperor Leo the Philosopher was forbidden by the patriarch Nicolas to enter the church, on account of his having contracted a fourth marriage, he performed his devotions in the metatorium, on the right side of the altar (Cedren. Histor. p. 483, ed. Par. p. 602). The metatorium erected by Justinian at the church of St. Sophia, was used by him and his successors as a place of retirement and repose, in which the emperors also sometimes partook of a meal (cf. Theodor. Lect. Eclog. ii. p. 165, and the other references to Byzantine historians given by Ducange, Constantinopolis Christiana, lib. iii. No. 84). Goar is of opinion that the metatorium was also used by the ministers of the church for rest and refreshment, and that they there partook of a slight repast. He regards the word, as does Suicer (sub voc.) as a corruption of μισατώριον, derived from μίσος, ferculum, or from mensa, "a table." But Ducange is probably right in regarding it as a Graecized form of the low-Latin "metatum" frequent in Gregory of Tours, Gregory the Great, and contemporaneous writers, in the sense of "a dwelling." The Greek form μιτάτον, or μετάτον, is of not unfrequent occurrence: e. g. νομίζοντες καὶ ἐν τῷ μιτάτῳ αὐτοῦ ἐν ᾧ πάλαι κατέμειναν εὑρισκέσθαι αὐτὸν ἐζητήσαμεν (Concil. Constantinop. sub Menna, act. ii. Labbe, v. 57;) ἐπεζήτησε μίτατον (aliter κελλίον) μεῖζον ὁ Χριστιανὸς (Athanas. de Imag. Beryt.). Augusti, with far less probability, considers it another form of "mutatorium," in the sense of "a vestry," camera paramenti, where the ministers of the church changed their habits (Augusti, Handb. der Christ. Archäol. i. 390; Binterim, Denkwürdigkeit, vol. iv. i. p. 140).

METATUS. The duty of providing food and lodging for the sovereign and his retinue when on a journey, or for the judges and others travelling on public business. Under the Roman law the clergy were exempted from this obligation Cod. Theodos. xvi. tit. 2, leg. 8). According to Gothofred (Com. in Cod. Theodos. vii. tit. 8; de Onere Metatus) this exemption was given to the clergy, to senators, to Jewish synagogues, and all places of worship. The capitularies of the Frank kings, on the other hand, appear to lay the burden chiefly on the clergy. One reason of this undoubtedly was to be found in the frequent bestowal of fiefs upon the church, to be held by this and other feudal tenures. Thomassin (Vet. et Nov. Eccl. Discip. iii. 1, c. 48, § 3) says that under the Roman law the obligation was considered to be a badge of servitude, but among the Franks such exercise of hospitality was esteemed an honour and a token of the alliance between church and state.

Bishops especially appear to have been expected to receive the sovereign. Thomassin (ib. iii. 1, c. 39, §§ 1, 2) gives instances of farms bestowed by Charles the Great on bishops who had received him with such hospitality as was in their power, and of punishments inflicted by him on certain bishops and abbats who had neglected to receive some ambassadors from Persia on their way to his court. This custom appears to have brought with it certain inconveniences. A curious canon of the Council of Meaux, A.D. 845 (c. 26), reminds the reigning monarch, Charles the Bald, that women were strictly forbidden to enter the houses of any of the clergy, and that especially the dwelling of bishops should be free from their presence, and implores them not to compel bishops to turn their palaces into lodging houses for women during a royal progress. The right was also claimed for those who were travelling on public business. A capitulary of Louis the Pious (ii. tit. 16, ed. Baluz) sets forth that certain places had been appointed by himself and his father for the special exercise of hospitality, and ordains that officers should be appointed to these places to see that this duty was carefully discharged. Special mention is made of the reception of embassies, and those who neglect to provide with fitting entertainment and provision for the way (paravereda) are threatened with deprivation of any offices that they may hold. The second council of Rheims, A.D. 813 (c. 42), entreats the emperor to enforce by statute that no one should dare to deny lodging (mansionem) to those travelling on his service, or on any duty enforced on them by law (quibus incumbit necessitas).

It appears that this right was often abused. Sometimes by the sovereign using it more than was equitable. Thus Hincmar of Rheims, in his Instruction to Louis the Stammerer (Opp. ii. p. 182), exhorts him not to harass the church by continual progresses ("circadas") and other exactions which were not customary in the time of his predecessors. Sometimes by bishops making it a pretext for illegal claims upon the presbyters of their dioceses. A form of instruction delivered by the metropolitan to the French bishops on their institution (Sirmond, Gall. Conc. ii. p. 660), especially forbids them to demand rights of lodging from their presbyters for their friends or attendants, or to extort under the name of free gifts ("accipiat, id est rapiat") any supplies of horses or carriages on pretence of making provision for the sovereign or his embassies. Sometimes this was claimed by those who had no title to it, or from persons who were exempt. An edict of Charles the Great (Sirmond, Gall. Conc. ii. 242) prohibits a practice which had sprung up among the officers of the empire, of demanding lodging and conveyance ("mansionaticos et paravereda"), not only from free men, but from monasteries, convents, guest-houses, and other ecclesiastical corporations. Exemptions appear to have often been given to monasteries. An edict of Charles the Bald, quoted by Thomassin (Vet. et Nov. Eccl. Discip. iii. 1, c. 39, § 12), forbids his judges to claim any rights of lodging or provision for the way from certain monasteries. Flodoard (Hist. Rem. ii. 11) says that Rigobert, archbishop of Rheims, asserted that all church property in his diocese was free from the rights of entertainment claimed by the judges on the ground of exemptions granted by the Frank kings. This exemption was sometimes extended to the rights of the bishops themselves. A charter given by pope Marinus, A.D. 885, to the monastery of Solognac (Sirmond, Conc. Gall. iii. 521) provides that no bishop or count should claim from the monks any right of lodging or provision for the way, but that they should be left free to exercise the duty of hospitality to all Christians at their own will. For the duties expected from monastic institutions in the way of receiving travellers, as distinct from the law of 'metatus,' see HOSPITALITY; HOSPITIUM.

METROPOLITAN (Μητροπολίτης, Metropolitanus). Bishop Beveridge (Cod. Can. lib. ii. c. 5) considers that metropolitans are either of apostolical institution, or that at least the Apostles founded the church on such a system as to put matters inevitably in train for the erection of metropolitan sees, and must therefore be supposed to have contemplated the result to which their acts naturally, if not necessarily, led. In support of this view stress is laid on the fact that the apostles in going into any province of the empire chose out the civil metropolis of that province in which to fix their headquarters, and to found a church. Thus, for example, Antioch was the metropolis of Syria, Corinth of Achaia, Ephesus of Asia, Thessalonica of Macedonia; and when from thence, as from a centre, other churches had been formed, they are collectively spoken of, and grouped together, in reference to the Roman province, and therefore to its metropolis. Thus we hear in the New Testament of the churches of Judea, the churches of Macedonia, the churches of Asia. An inference, therefore, is drawn that a certain ecclesiastical connexion between the church of the chief city and the churches throughout the province, which had derived their origin from it, was to be expected, and was intended. And this, it is urged, is precisely what is found to prevail at an early period. It is further contended that Titus and Timothy in fact acted as metropolitans in Crete and Ephesus, for which Chrysostom is cited (Hom. i. in Tit.), who says, εἰ μὴ γὰρ ἦν δόκιμος, οὐκ ἂν αὐτῷ τὴν νῆσον ὅλόκληρον ἐπέτρεψεν . . ἂν τοσούτων ἐπι- σκόπων κρίσιν ἐπέτρεψαν. (Comp. Euseb. Hist. Eccl. lib. iii. c. 4, lib. v. c. 23, lib. iv. c. 23, which passages however, it may perhaps be said, do not seem necessarily to mean more than that the whole was one bishopric.) Barrow, however, while admitting as a fact that the chief cities were usually selected as the first seats of churches, yet considers that "all ecclesiastical presidencies and subordinations, or dependencies of some bishops on others in administration of spiritual affairs, were introduced merely by human ordinance, and established by law or custom, upon prudential accounts, according to the exigency of things." "At first," he says, "every bishop, as a prince in his own church, did act freely according to his will and discretion, with the advice of his ecclesiastical senate, and with the consent of his people (the which he did use to consult), without being controllable by any other, or accountable to any, further than his obligation to uphold the verity of Christian profession, and to maintain fraternal communion in charity and peace with neighbouring churches did require." But "because little, disjointed, and incoherent bodies were like dust, apt to be dissipated by every wind of external assault or intestine faction: and peaceable union could hardly be retained without some ligature of discipline: and churches could not mutually support and defend each other without some method of intercourse and rule of confederacy engaging them: therefore, for many good purposes (for upholding and advancing the common interests of Christianity, for protection and support of each church from inbred disorders and dissensions, for preserving the integrity of the faith, for securing the concord of divers churches, for providing fit pastors to each church, and correcting such as were scandalously bad or unfaithful) it was soon found needful that divers churches should be combined and linked together in some regular form of discipline; that if any church did want a bishop, the neighbour bishops might step in to approve and ordain a fit one: that if any bishop did notoriously swerve from the Christian rule, the others might interpose to correct or void him: that if any error or schism did peep up in any church, the joint concurrence of divers bishops might avail to stop its progress, and to quench it, by convenient means of instruction, reprehension, and censure; that if any church were oppressed by persecution, by indigency, by faction, the others might be engaged to afford effectual succour and relief; for such ends it was needful that bishops in certain precincts should convene, with intent to deliberate and resolve about the best expedients to compass them, and that the manner of such proceeding (to avoid uncertain distraction, confusion, arbitrariness, dissatisfaction, and mutinous opposition) should be settled in an ordinary course, according to rules known and allowed by all."

He then goes on to shew that as in each political province, there was a metropolis or head city, to which great resort was had for the dispensation of justice and other important affairs, and which usually possessed a Christian church which excelled the rest in opulency and in ability to promote the common interest; and as also in all meetings some one person must preside, this duty would naturally devolve in meetings of bishops upon the prelate of the metropolis, "as being at home in his own seat of presidence and receiving the rest under his wing," as well as on account of his "surpassing the rest in all advantages answerable to the secular advantages of his city." Accordingly the metropolitan bishop became the president of the episcopal meetings, which soon developed into provincial synods. "Thus," he concludes, "I conceive the metropolitan governance was introduced, by human considerations of public necessity or utility."[a] There are, indeed, some who think it was instituted by the apostles, but their arguments do not seem convincing; and such a constitution doth not (as I take it) well suit to the state of their times and the course they took in founding churches" (Treatise on the Pope's Supremacy, Suppos. v.).

Dr. Cave, quoted by Bingham, and apparently Bingham himself, appear to take substantially the same view as Barrow.

Thomassin lays stress on the fact that the principal towns being first evangelized by the apostles, Christianity would radiate thence, and daughter-churches spring up around the original church in the mother city, owing it a filial obedience as sprung from it.[b]

Such obedience, however, if taken in a strict sense, though well established in later days, was at first of somewhat gradual growth. Soon after the middle of the 2nd century, synods were rendered peculiarly necessary by the diversities of opinion which then sprang up. And, as Barrow states, these would naturally be held in the chief city and under the presidency of its bishop.[c]

The more frequently such synods were held, the better defined would the dignity of the metropolitan become, especially as it would be his duty to convene them. When they came to be convened at regular intervals, it would assume an established character as an integral part of a permanent institution.

Nor is it difficult to suppose that in the intervals between synods the president would probably be referred to, when the decrees needed either explanation or enforcement. What at first was only the influence due to his superior position would thus by degrees become acknowledged as an actual authority. Other occasions on which

[a] Accordingly we find that the civil metropolis was also the ecclesiastical metropolis, even when it might have been expected to be otherwise. Thus Cæsarea, not Jerusalem, was the seat of the metropolitan in Palestine. Compare canons 12 and 17 of Chalcedon.

[c] Such at least was the general, though not at first perhaps the invariable rule. For Eusebius (H. E. 5. c. 23) speaks of a synod of the bishops of Pontus at which the senior bishop appears to have presided. In Africa the rule as to metropolitans was peculiar. With the exception of Carthage, which seems to have been the standing metropolis for the province of Africa properly so called, the senior bishop for the time being of the province was metropolitan, whatever his see. Such was the custom in Numidia and Mauretania. It is to be observed, however, that Carthage seems to have had a kind of primacy over them. See Gieseler, 1st period, § 66.

the Christian inhabitants of a Roman province might unite together, such as a solemn thanksgiving for the cessation of persecution, would conduce to the same result. The bishop of the chief city, at which such assemblies would probably take place, would direct the solemnities, and perhaps conduct them. (See Bickell, Gesch. des Kirchenrechts, part 2, p. 178, who refers to Ignat. ad Philad. c. 10, ad Smyrn. c. 11, ad Polyc. c. 7).

Again, the custom that when a bishop died, the neighbouring bishops should assemble for the consecration of his successor, would afford another case of solemn action in which some one must take the lead. And it would naturally devolve on the metropolitan who had taken such lead to certify the churches in other parts of the world as to the validity of the election and consecration, and as to the person whom they were to regard and deal with as the true and regular bishop, in case any other claimants appeared. This would easily pass into a right to ratify what was done in the matter, and to authorize the consecration, so that without such authorization it would not be regular.[d]

It will now be proper to give some authorities in order to afford the means of judging how far the above sketch is warranted by the facts of the case.[e]

On the one hand, as to the stress laid in early times on the inherent equality of all bishops, we have the statement of Cyprian:—"Neque enim quisquam nostrum episcopum se esse episcoporum constituit, aut tyrannico terrore ad obsequendi necessitatem collegas suos adigit, quando habeat omnis episcopus pro licentiâ libertatis et potestatis suæ arbitrium proprium, tanquam judicari ab alio non possit, cum nec ipse possit alterum judicare. Sed expectemus universi judicium Domini nostri Jesu Christi; qui unus et solus habet potestatem et præferendi nos in ecclesiæ suæ gubernatione, et de actu nostro judicandi" (Allocutio in Conc. Carthag. A.D. 256). And again:—"Manente concordiæ vinculo et perseverante catholicæ ecclesiæ individuo sacramento, actum suum disponit et dirigit unusquisque episcopus, rationem propositi sui Domino redditurus." Ep. 55, ad Antonianum (Ep. 52, ed. Pam.). So, again, he speaks of it as a rule, "ut singulis pastoribus portio gregis sit adscripta, quam regat unusquisque et gubernet, rationem sui actus Domino redditurus" (Ep. 55, ad Cornelium).

It may indeed be said that Cyprian was himself in some sense a metropolitan, but Bickell remarks that passages like these shew that his office was rather that of presiding and taking the lead than such as implied any actual subordination of the other bishops to him (Gesch. des Kirchenrechts, part 2. 181).

On the other hand we read in the apostolic canons (can. 33), τοὺς ἐπισκόπους ἑκάστου ἔθνους εἰδέναι χρὴ τὸν ἐν αὐτοῖς πρῶτον, καὶ ἡγεῖσθαι αὐτὸν ὡς κεφαλὴν, καὶ μηδὲν πράττειν περιττὸν ἄνευ τῆς ἐκείνου γνώμης, which seems to indicate something more than mere precedence.

Whether or not this can be relied on as a more ancient authority than those we are about to cite will of course depend on the date and origin assigned to this collection of canons. [See APOSTOLIC CANONS.] Beveridge argues for their antiquity because the term metropolitan is not used. This title, it is admitted on all hands, did not come into recognised use until the 4th century. Bickell and others, however, consider that the stress thus laid on metropolitan authority (no matter by what title) proves of itself that the apostolic canons belong to the 4th century. One thing at all events, is clear, namely, that the council of Nice speaks of the existence of metropolitans as no new thing at that period. In fact, it treats the still more extensive authority of the bishops of Alexandria, Antioch, and Rome as established by ancient custom.[f]

The Nicene decrees also recognise it as perfectly clear (καθόλου δὲ πρόδηλον ἐκεῖνο), that no one is to be made a bishop without the metropolitan (χωρὶς γνώμης μητροπολίτου), and if otherwise, he is not to be held rightly a bishop (can. vi.; see also can. iv.).

The council of Antioch (can. ix.) has explicit decrees as to the precedency of the bishop of the metropolis, and as to the necessity for his presence when questions of a general nature are discussed, but with a strong reservation as to the powers of each bishop in matters affecting merely his own diocese.[g]

The same council also insists that no one be made a bishop without a synod and the presence of the metropolitan of the province (can. xix.), and the council of Laodicea repeats the injunction (can. xii.).[h]

[d] Such right, however, did not necessarily amount to an arbitrary negative. If there was a diversity of opinion in the synod the metropolitan was directed by the council of Arles to side with the majority, and there are other councils to the same effect. [BISHOP.]

[e] These authorities are principally found in the East and in North Africa. In the West the development of metropolitan authority was apparently of later date. But indications of it in Gaul, in connexion with the council of Arles, and in Spain at the council of Elvira (can. 58) are given by Bickell (part 2, pp. 185, 186).

[f] τὰ ἀρχαῖα ἔθη κρατείτω, τὰ ἐν Αἰγύπτῳ καὶ Λιβύῃ καὶ Πενταπόλει, ὥστε τὸν ἐν Ἀλεξανδρείᾳ ἐπίσκοπον πάντων τούτων ἔχειν τὴν ἐξουσίαν· ἐπειδὴ καὶ τῷ ἐν τῇ Ῥωμῇ ἐπισκόπῳ τοῦτο σύνηθές ἐστιν. ὁμοίως δὲ κατὰ τὴν Ἀντιόχειαν καὶ ἐν ταῖς ἄλλαις ἐπαρχίαις τὰ πρεσβεῖα σώζεσθαι ταῖς ἐκκλησίαις (can. 6). Even at this time, however metropolitans were not universal in the West (Bickell, 2, 187).

[h] The words of the Antiochene canon are: ἐπίσκοπον μὴ χειροτονεῖσθαι δίχα συνόδου καὶ παρουσίας τοῦ ἐν τῇ μητροπόλει τῆς ἐπαρχίας. These words are deemed by Barrow to interpret the ambiguous phrase, χωρὶς γνώμης, in the Nicene canon, and to shew that "it doth not import a negative voice in him, but that the transaction should not pass in his absence, or without his knowledge, advice, and suffrage." (Barrow On Pope's Supremacy, Supposition vi.) Eventually, however, no doubt the

The right of personally deciding appeals was not vested in metropolitans till a late period.

The council of Sardica may be thought to have a trace of it, but the decrees of this council on the subject of appeals are perhaps open to question.

The council of Nice directed that synods should be held twice a year in each province, in order that what clergymen or laymen had been excommunicated by their own bishops the propriety of the sentence might be examined and confirmed, or mitigated. (See canon v.)

The council of Chalcedon (can. ix.) defined the course to be that when one clergyman complained against another, they should first go before their own bishop, or before judges selected by both parties with his sanction. But if a clergyman brought a complaint against a bishop, it was to be determined in the provincial synod.[a]

In like manner the council of Antioch (can. vi.) allowed a party excommunicated by his own bishop to appeal to the next ensuing synod.

In these synods the metropolitan would no doubt preside, and exercise great influence, but there is no proof as yet of his judging alone in matters of importance.

An intermediate stage seems observable in the laws of Justinian (Cod. i. tit. 4, leg. 29), in which an appeal is given to the metropolitan, with a further appeal from him to a synod, and a final appeal from the synod to the patriarch.[l] power of confirmation came into the hands of the metropolitan personally. "Quoniam inter episcopos ordinatores, primus et præses esset metropolitanus: neque semper omnibus comprovincialibus episcopis commodum esset, ad singulas episcoporum ordinationes convenire, sensim ex quodam ut minus tacito ecclesiæ consensu ad metropolitanum, integrum pene devolutum est jus electiones discutiendi, easque vel ut canonicas probandi, vel ut minus canonicas reprobandi." (Van Espen, part i. tit. xiv. c. 1.) For the profession of obedience made to metropolitans by the bishops of their province, see Bishop, I, 5.

[k] If he had a dispute with the metropolitan, it was to be heard before the exarch or by the patriarch. (Cann. ix. and xvii.).

The troubled state of affairs socially and politically, as well as ecclesiastically, which ensued during the breaking up of the Roman Empire, and the growth of the various European monarchies from its ruins, rendered it difficult to bring together distant bishops, and consequently synods were rarely held or fell into disuse.[m] This would largely contribute to independent action on the part of the metropolitans.

Speaking in relation to the state of things in Gaul about the 6th and 7th centuries, Guizot says: "The civil metropolis was generally more wealthy, more populous than the other towns of the province; its bishop had more influence; people met around him on all important occasions; his residence became the chief place of the provincial council; he convoked it, and was the president of it; he was moreover charged with the confirmation and consecration of the newly-elected bishops of the province; with receiving accusations brought against bishops, and the appeals from their decisions, and with carrying them, after having made a first examination, to the provincial council, which alone had the right of judging them. The archbishops unceasingly attempted to usurp the right and make a personal power of it. They often succeeded; but, in truth, as to all important circumstances, it was to the provincial council that it appertained; the archbishops were only charged with superintending the execution of it." (Hist. of Civilisation in France, vol. ii. p. 46, Eng. trans.)

In Spain, in the 6th century, the council of Toledo (can. 20) says, "let the priests, whether parochial or diocesan, who shall be tormented by the bishop, carry their complaints to the metropolitan, and let the metropolitan delay not to repress such excesses." This seems to imply a direct personal power, but it may be observed that this canon refers to unseemly exactions on the part of individual bishops rather than to their judicial sentences.

From this time onward the authority and position of metropolitans in the West were subject to many fluctuations, and varied much in different countries. Some of the popes, who were jealous of all intermediate authority between themselves and the diocesan bishops, shewed a disposition to weaken the metropolitans. And the bishops themselves, with a somewhat short-sighted policy, preferred to have their superior at a distance in Italy instead of in their own country and province. Moreover as the superiority of the metropolitans was in a great [illegible] dependent on the pre-eminence of the city in which their see was fixed and on its ancient character as a metropolis, the changes which took place in the relative importance of towns at periods of invasion and social change materially affected the position of the prelates.

It is not surprising, therefore, that in many places the metropolitan authority should decline, or that in the 8th century Pepin should have to consult pope Zachary as to the course to be adopted for procuring respect for metropoli-

[m] In the course of the 6th century there were held in Gaul fifty-four councils of every description: in the 7th century only twenty, in the first half of the 8th century only seven, and five of these were held in Belgium or on the banks of the Rhine. (Guizot, Hist. of Civilisation in France, vol. ii. p. 49, Eng. trans.)

tans at the hands of the bishops and parochial clergy.

In France, indeed, a vigorous effort was made to restore the institution to something like vigour, and the legislation of Pepin and Charlemagne might have had this effect.[n] But a fatal blow was at hand. The appearance of the forged decretals in the middle of the 9th century tended to elevate the papal power at the expense of that of the metropolitans, to an extent from which the latter never completely recovered, except in countries like England, where patriotic feeling and royal authority alike resented direct papal interference, and supported the national prelacy.[o] The later history of the subject lies beyond the chronological limit of the present work.

It only remains to say a few words on certain details.

As to appointment.—When the position and dignity of metropolitans became established, it would appear that the canonical rule was that they should be elected by all the bishops of the province, with the consent of the clergy and laity.[p] Obviously, however, the appointment of these superior prelates would be open to the same disturbing influences which affected the choice of ordinary bishops, only in a still greater degree, on account of their greater importance. (Comp. Bishop I. i. a.)

When chosen, the metropolitan was confirmed, and consecrated in the East by the exarch or patriarch (see Thomassin, part ii. lib. 2, cap. 8 and cap. 19). In the West he was consecrated by the other bishops of the province (August. Brevio. Collat. 3 die, c. 16, and see Beveridge, Pandect. Can. vol. 2, Annot. p. 55). When Rome came to assert a patriarchal right over the whole West, the pope put forward a claim to sanction the appointment of metropolitans by sending them the pallium [Pallium]. As early as the 6th century, the pope appears to have sent a pallium to the bishop of Arles as perpetual vicar of the holy see in Gaul. And Gregory I. did the like to certain other metropolitans as well, but it was not then decided that they were bound to wait for this before exercising their functions. It was not until the synod of Frankfort in 742 that Boniface, as legate of pope Zachary, obtained a decision that all metropolitans should request the pallium from the pope and obey his lawful commands.[q] This was construed by the popes to mean a promise of obedience before receiving the pall. And this again was turned into a direct oath of fealty by subsequent popes.

Finally, it may be right to mention the class of honorary metropolitans. These had title and precedence, but not power. Thus Chalcedon and Nicæa each enjoyed the title of a metropolis, and their bishops had metropolitan rank, but Nicomedia remained the real metropolis (see council of Chalcedon, act 6 and 13, and compare Thomassin, part i. lib. i. cap. 39).

This article may not unfitly be concluded with two short summaries of the powers and duties of metropolitans by writers of learning.

Bishop Beveridge, in his Annotations on the Canons of the Council of Nice, enumerates their functions thus:

1. Penes metropolitanum est omnes episcoporum ordinationes et electiones in provinciâ suâ celebratas confirmare; adeo ut sine ejus consensu et confirmatione irrita sit episcopi cujusvis ordinatio.

2. Omnes provinciæ suæ episcopos ad synodum sub se habendam quotannis convocare.

3. In mores ac opiniones episcoporum sibi subjectorum inspicere, et immorigeros ac gravioribus criminibus convictos admonere, reprehendere, et aliorum episcoporum communione arcere.

4. Causas inter episcopos litigantes audire et determinare et omnia ecclesiastica negotia, quæ majoris sunt momenti, in universâ suâ provinciâ administrare, adeo ut nihil magni momenti ab episcopis eo inconsulto fiat. Neque etiam trans mare peregrinare potest episcopus sine dimissoriâ aut formatâ metropolitani sui.[r]

(Pandect. Can. vol. ii. Annot. p. 59.)

The other summary is that of Thomassin (Vetus et Nova Eccles. Disc. pt. i. lib. ii. c. 40).

Si lubet jam brevi gyro paucisque verbis concludere jura metropolitanorum hic perpensa; adverte nihil officere, vel metropolitanorum potestati exarcharum amplitudinem, vel episcoporum dignitati metropolitanorum authoritatem. Causæ omnes aliquanti saltem ponderis in commune a metropolitano et episcopis provinciæ pertractandæ erant: præsertim in concilio provinciæ: quod ille convocabat, qui præerat. Concilio universali intererant ex officio metropolitani omnes. Episcoporum proceres, magistri, judices, audiebant. In subditis subditorum sibi episcoporum jurisdictionem deprimebant, vel cum ad ipsos erat provocatum, vel cum provinciam obambulabant. Sedes metropolitani instar habebat, et imaginem præferebat sedis apostolicæ. Observandorum canonum præfecti erant, et vindices; impune violatorum in ipsos culpa, in ipsos poena recidebat. Dabant literas formatas. Eorum assensione et dedicabantur ac dotabantur ecclesiæ, et earum bona distrahebantur, ubi ex re erat: potestas ordinandorum episcoporum, paternam eis in illos conciliabat authoritatem; et hinc fluebant reliqua in eosdem egregiæ potestatis jura.

[n] See the capitulary of Pepin in 755 (Baluze, vol. i. pp 169, 170), and those of Charlemagne in 779 (ib. 195) and 789 (ib. 248). His Frankfort capit. 794 says, "Si non obediat aliqua persona episcopo suo de abbatibus, presbyteris, diaconibus, subdiaconibus, monachis, et cæteris clericis, vel etiam aliis, in ejus parochia, veniant ad metropolitanum suum, et ille dijudicet causam cum suffraganeis suis. Comites quoque nostri veniant ad judicium episcoporum. Et si aliquid est quod episcopus metropolitanus non possit corrigere vel pacificare, tunc tandem veniant accusatores cum accusato cum literis metropolitanis, ut sciamus veritatem rei" (Baluze, i. 244).

[o] See Gieseler, 3rd period, div. 2, § 25.

Thomassin seeks to defend the papacy from the charge of desiring to weaken the metropolitan power (part i. lib. 1, c. 48).

[p] Thus Leo (Ep. 88): "Metropolitano defuncto, cum in locum ejus alius fuerit subrogandus, provinciales episcopi ad civitatem metropolitanam convenire debebunt, ut omnium clericorum atque omnium civium voluntate discussa ex presbyteris ejusdem ecclesiæ, vel ex diaconis optimus eligatur."

[r] This last head refers to the letters of commendation which in Africa (see canon 28 of the third council of Carthage) and other places (see Gregory the Great, Epist. viii. 8) were granted by the metropolitan to bishops going beyond sea.

METROPOLUS (1) Bishop; commemorated Aug. 3 (Hieron. Mart.).

(2) Bishop and confessor, perhaps in 4th century; commemorated at Treves Oct. 8 (Boll. Acta SS. Oct. iv. 210). [C. H.]

METTANUS, martyr; commemorated at Alexandria Jan. 31 (Vet. Rom. Mart.). [C. H.]

METUANA, martyr; commemorated at Rome June 3 (Hieron. Mart.). [C. H.]

METURUS (1) Martyr; commemorated at Alexandria Ap. 24 (Hieron. Mart.).

(2) Martyr; commemorated "in Afrodiris" [? Aphrodisils] Ap. 30 (Hieron. Mart.). [C. H.]

METZ, COUNCILS OF (Metensia Concilia). Three such are recorded:

(1) A.D. 550, or thereabout, on the death of St. Gall, bishop of Clermont, when Cautinus, his archdeacon, was consecrated in his stead. (Mansi, ix. 151.)

(2) A.D. 590, when Aegidius, metropolitan of Rheims, was deposed for high treason, and two nuns who had been excommunicated, one of them a daughter of king Chilperic, had their sentence remitted. (Mansi, x. 459–62.) [E. S. Ff.]

(3) A.D. 755, or thereabouts, but all the canons assigned to it are embodied in a capitulary, dated Metz, of king Pepin. (Mansi, xii. 571, and ib. App. 125.) [E. S. Ff.]

MICA (1) Martyr; commemorated in Africa Jan. 17 (Hieron. Mart.; others read MUCIUS (Boll. Acta SS. Jan. ii. 80).

(2) Martyr; commemorated in Pontus Jan. 18 (Hieron. Mart.).

(3) Martyr; commemorated in Pontus Ap. 16 (Hieron. Mart.).

(4) Martyr; commemorated in Africa June 16 (Hieron. Mart.). [C. H.]

MICAH, the prophet; commemorated with Habakkuk Jan. 15 (Usuard. Mart.; Vet. Rom. Mart.; Bed. Mart. Auct.); Ap. 21, without mention of Habakkuk (Basil. Menol.); Aug. 14 (Cal. Byzant.; Daniel, Cod. Liturg. iv. 266; Boll. Acta SS. Aug. iii. 147); Aug. 15 (Cal. Aethiop.). [C. H.]

MICHAEL (1) Bishop of Synada, confessor, sat in the 7th council, "our holy father;" commemorated May 23 (Basil. Menol.; Cal. Byzant.; Daniel, Cod. Liturg. iv. 260).

(2) Abbat, and martyr with 36 monks near Sebastopolis in Armenia; commemorated Oct. 1 (Basil. Menol.; Boll. Acta SS. Oct. i. 307).

(3) ARAGAWI, monk and confessor in Aethiopia; commemorated Oct. 11 (Boll. Acta SS. Oct. v. 606); "the old" (Cal. Aethiop.). [C. H.]

MICHAEL THE ARCHANGEL, AND ALL ANGELS, FESTIVAL OF. It is not our province here to enter into the general question of angelolatry. It may be well, however, to call attention to the fact that in the early Christian church a certain tendency to angel-worship manifested itself: thus, for example, it forms one of the points in the heresy which affected the Colossian church, against which St. Paul distinctly protests (Col. ii. 18; cf. also i. 16). The Essenic character of this heresy, whether or not there be historical connexion with the Essenes of Palestine, must not be lost sight of, inasmuch as angelology formed an important part of the esoteric creed of the latter, and, indeed, entered largely into the speculations of the Jews generally (Josephus, B. J., ii. 8. 7; cf. Lightfoot, Colossians, in loc., where a number of illustrations are given of this point, in connection with Jews, Judaizing Christians and Gnostics. Those from the curious Ophite work, the Pistis Sophia, into which angelology enters very largely, may be especially noted). It is interesting to observe that long afterwards, in the 4th century, we find a council of Laodicea (c. A.D. 363) in the immediate neighbourhood, that is, of Colossae, holding it necessary to forbid the angel-worship then prevalent in the country (can. 35; Labbe, i. 1503). The canon is strongly worded, bidding men not to forsake the church of God, and invoke angels and hold commemorations (ἀγγέλους ὀνομάζειν καὶ συνάξεις ποιεῖν), because those who follow this secret idolatry are accursed, as having forsaken the Lord Jesus Christ. In the next century we find Theodoret (in Col., l.c.) referring to this prohibition as necessitated by the spread of this worship through Phrygia and Pisidia, and he adds that oratories (εὐκτήρια) of St. Michael were still existing in the neighbouring districts.[a] On another point of connexion between St. Michael and this region we shall subsequently dwell at length, his alleged appearance at Chonae, a town in the immediate neighbourhood of Colossae. It may be added here that the above-cited canon of the Laodicene council was, with the rest of its decrees, repeated centuries after by a synod of Aix-la-Chapelle (A.D. 789), but with the reservation, "nec nominentur, nisi illorum quos habemus in auctoritate. Hi sunt Michael, Gabriel, Raphael" (Capit. Aquisgran. can. 16; Labbe, vii. 973).

Besides such conciliar decrees, strong expressions of opinion are continually met with among the fathers. It is perhaps hardly fair to cite Epiphanius as including the Angelici among his different classes of heretics, because though he mentions as a possible derivation the view that they were worshippers of angels, he confesses that he is really ignorant on the point[b] (Haer. 80 [al. 40]; vol. i. 505, ed. Petavius). Augustine, however, says plainly enough, "we honour [the angels] through love, not through slavish fear, nor do we build to them temples; for they wish not so to be honoured by us, because they know that we ourselves, when we are worthy, are temples of God Most High" (de Vera Relig. 110; vol. i. 1266, ed. Gaume). Again, in his Confessions (x. 42, vol. i. 327), he says, "Whom could I find who should reconcile me to Thee? Should I have recourse (ambiandum mihi fuit) to angels?" In his De Civitate Dei (see lib. x. cc. 19, 25; vol. vii. 410, 418) we find important passages on this subject, which shew very clearly the strong views of the great father on this question, wherein he opposes strongly all idea of worship or sacrifice offered to angels.[c]

Thus, taking the church as a whole (though, as might have been expected, the remark is much more true for the West than the East), we find that festivals of angels enter but slightly into the calendar, thus forming a striking contrast with the ever-increasing list of Saints Days. Naturally, therefore, there is an almost total absence of recognition on the part of the church of the practice before us. The second Nicene Council (A.D. 787) ordains a τιμητική προσκύνησις of the figures of angels, as well as those of the Lord, the Virgin and holy men (Labbe, vii. 556), and we have also a commemoration of angels in some litanies (see e. g. Ménard, Greg. Sacr. 497; where there is special mention of Michael, Gabriel, and Raphael), but with these exceptions the tenor of church teaching is unvarying enough.[d]

Again, though we can now see in the festival of Michaelmas a recognition of the great truth of the joint service of angels and men as subjects of a common Lord, yet it has been justly pointed out that the festivals of angels, now mainly represented, so far as the Western church is concerned, by the festival of St. Michael and All Angels on Sept. 29, were not based on any such dogmatic idea, but were simply commemorations of [supposed] historic events, namely, manifestations of the archangel at some special time and place, or the dedication of a church in his honour.

We shall confine ourselves for the present to the Western church, and speak (1) of the manifestation in Monte Gargano. This has been variously referred to the episcopate of Gelasius, i.e. 492-8 A.D. (so e.g. in Anast. Biblioth., Gelasius [74] "Hujus temporibus inventa ecclesia sancti angeli in Monte Gargano"), to the period from A.D. 520–530 (Acta Sanctorum, Sept. 29, p. 57), to the episcopate of Felix IV. in A.D. 536, or even later. The day specially associated with this manifestation is May 8, and the legend is very briefly this. A bull having strayed from the herd, was found fixed in the entrance to a cave, and when it was shot at, the arrow returned and struck the archer. A panic thus arose, and the bishop of Sipontum, in whose diocese Mount Garganus was situated, enjoined, on being consulted, that three days should be given to fasting and prayer. At the end of that time it was vouchsafed to the bishop to see the archangel in a vision by night, who told him that the place was under his special care, thus indicating his wish that worship should there be offered to God in memory of St. Michael and All Angels. As to the germ of this legend, of which we have given a résumé from the Acta, it has been suggested that it is to be connected with the fact of a war between the people of Sipontum and of Naples, in order to aid in securing the victory to the former. It has also been maintained, and apparently on good grounds, that the shrine of St. Michael was the successor of some local heathen shrine. The belief of the archangel's appearance soon became widely current, and the modern town of Monte St. Angelo, near Manfredonia, owes its name thereto.

Most martyrologies do not contain this commemoration of May 8. We may cite a Corbey martyrology, not much later than A.D. 826, where the day is given as "inventio sancti Michaelis archangeli in Monte Gargano" (D'Achery, Spicilegium, x. 134). On the question of the connexion between this manifestation and the commemoration of September 29 we shall speak more fully below.

(2) The archangel is said to have appeared in Monte Tumba, in Normandy (apparently the Mont St. Michel, near Avranches), about the year A.D. 710,[e] to Autbert, bishop of the district of Abrincatue, bidding him build a church in his honour on a place known as Tumba on account of its height, and also as periculum maris. The church was said to have been dedicated on October 16 (a Benedictine monastery being afterwards added), on which day it is mentioned in some of the additions to Usuard (Patrol., cxxiv. 582); and the festival of the dedication appears to have acquired considerable celebrity even beyond the bounds of France, for we find a council of Oxford (A.D. 1222) ordering that sundry feasts "a rectoribus ecclesiarum et capellanis in obsequio Divino et laude devotissime celebrentur," among which is the dedicatio sancti Michaelis in Monte Tumba (can. 8: Labbe, xi. 275). On the whole of this part of the subject, reference may be especially made to Mabillon (Annales Ordinis S. Benedicti, vol. ii. p. 19), and also the Acta Sanctorum (Sept. 29, p. 74, where the Acta of this manifestation are given).

(3) We pass on now to consider, in the third place, the commemoration of September 29, the festival of Michaelmas par excellence. It does not appear at all certain what was the original special idea of the commemoration of this day. A large number of ancient martyrologies and calendars associate it with the manifestation on Mount Garganus, as being the anniversary of the dedication of the church there. In others again we find mention of the dedication of some church to St. Michael at Rome, so that on this latter view we should thus have a parallel to such cases as e.g. Christmas and the Ember seasons, where institutions of the local Roman church spread throughout the whole Western church, and indeed in the former of our two illustrations almost through the universal church. It is not at all easy to reconcile the conflicting details, which we shall proceed to state at length. We shall first cite from the martyrologies. The Mart. Hieronymi gives, according to the Cod. Epternacensis, "dedicatio basilicae S. Michaelis" (Acta Sanctorum, ib. p. 4), but in the Cod. Corbeiensis "dedicatio basilicae archangeli Michaelis, in monte qui dicitur Garganus" (D'Achery, iv.

[c] Cf. further Augustine (Coll. cum Maximino, vol. viii. 1016), "Nonne si templum alicui sancto angelo excellentissimo . . . . faceremus, anathemaremur a veritate Christi et ab ecclesia Dei." Also Contra Faustum, xx. 21, vol. viii. 546.

[d] It cannot be considered a real exception to this statement that the Coptic Euchologion contains some direct prayers to angels. (See Renaudot, Liturg. Orient. Collectio, p. 277, ed. 1847.)

[e] This is Mabillon's date; Stilting (Acta Sanctorum, Sept. 29, p. 75 a) gives the date as A.D. 850–950.

675). The Mart. Gellonense shews a similar variation of MSS., the shorter forms being apparently those of the oldest (ib. xiii. 413, 426, 430). Bede, according to the text of the Bollandist edition, has merely "dedicatio ecclesiae sancti angeli Michaelis" (Patrol. xciv. 1057), but in some forms of this last the entry runs, "Romae, via Salaria miliario septimo, dedicatio basilicae sancti archangeli Michaelis, vel in monte. . . ." In the Mart. Lucense, as here, the Roman commemoration comes first, but there is no mention of the special locality; this is given in a vague way in a Mart. Corbeiense (Leslie, not. ad Liturg. Mozarab., in loc.), "Romae, miliario sexto (septimo?) . . . ." The martyrologies of Rabanus Maurus (Patrol. cx. 1171), Ado (ib. cxiii. 368) and Usuard (ib. cxxiv. 518) make distinct mention of Mount Garganus. The metrical martyrology of Bede, "Michaelis ternas [sc. Kal. Oct.] templi dedicatio sacrat" (ib. xciv. 605) is quite general, and also that of Wandalbert (ib. cxxi. 612).

"Aetherea virtute potens, princepsque supernae Militiae Michael terno sibi templa sacravit."

The Romanum Parvum combines two notices, "In Monte Gargano, venerabilis memoria archangeli Michaelis. Et Romae, dedicatio ecclesiae ejusdem archangeli, a B. Bonifacio papa constructae in circo, qui locus inter nubes dicitur" (ib. cxxiii. 170).

We next refer to the three Roman sacramentaries. The Leonine (under the date Sept. 30) gives no less than five masses, each with a special preface, with the heading Natale basilicae an eli in Salaria[f] (sc. via). Four of these masses are specially associated with the name of St. Michael, and the remaining one with angels and archangels generally (vol. ii. 99, ed. Ballerini). The Gelasian Sacramentary merely gives Orationes in sancti archangeli Michaelis (Patrol. lxxiv. 1177), but in the Gregorian is dedicatio basilicae sancti Michaelis (col. 134, ed. Menard).

On a survey of the foregoing evidence, we are inclined to consider the most satisfactory explanation to be that there was a Roman commemoration originally distinct from any connexion with the commemoration of the manifestation on Mount Garganus, and probably of earlier date than the alleged appearance there. This original Roman festival might fairly be associated with the church in the Via Salaria, which, however, got thrown into the shade by the increasing fame of the commemoration on Mount Garganus.[g] Subsequently Boniface erected a church to St. Michael in Rome, to the locality of which we shall again refer. The presence of this church in the city, and the distance of that on the Via Salaria, may have caused the latter to be less frequented, so that the more recent church became the favourite in martyrologies.[h]

In considering the above view, it will be well to bear in mind (1) that the mention of the Via Salaria occurs in the oldest sacramentary; (2) that this locality cannot at all be reconciled with the notices of the church built by Boniface; (3) that in some of the martyrologies we have cited the Roman commemoration comes first, whereas we are told that Boniface built his church soon after (non multo post) the manifestation on Mount Garganus; (4) that a church of St. Michael was existing in Rome prior to the episcopate of any Boniface except Boniface I. (ob. A.D. 422), who lived long before the alleged date of the manifestation on Mount Garganus. This we know on the authority of Anastasius Bibliothecarius (80), who tells us that Symmachus (ob. A.D. 514) enlarged and improved the church of St. Michael, so that the church, and presumably also the festival, were existing before his time.

On these grounds we hold it to be at any rate fairly probable that the local Roman festival is earlier than the Apulian. To the inquiry, however, how far such a festival is traceable back, it must be admitted that there is a scarcity of evidence. Baronius (Mart. Rom., May 8, not.), who argues for the great antiquity of the Roman festival, cites in evidence the Christian poet Drepanius Florus; but he is certainly wrong in supposing him to be the Drepanius mentioned by Sidonius Apollinaris, and the poet in question is to be referred to about A.D. 848 (Cave, Chartoph. Eccl., p. 160). Nor need we attach much weight to his remark that in a MS. volume of sermons in the Vatican library, bearing the names of Augustine and others, is one of Gregory the Great for the festival of St. Michael. Still the evidence of the Leonine Sacramentary is indicative of a decidedly early date, and we probably shall not err in assuming the existence of the festival in the 5th century.

We must next refer to the church of St. Michael built by Boniface. This, it will be remembered, was spoken of in the Mart. Romanum parvum as being in circo, in a place known as inter nubes; and the martyrology of Ado in like manner speaks of it as in summitate circi. What this locality is, is very doubtful. Baronius (l. c.) identifies it with the Moles Hadriana, and connects it with an appearance of the archangel in that place to Gregory the Great, on the occasion of the cessation of a pestilence. The Boniface he considers to be either the Third (ob. A.D. 606) or Fourth (ob. A.D. 615), rejecting the claims of Boniface II. (ob. A.D. 532), on grounds, however, which depend for their validity on the acceptance of his theory as to the locality. It may be remarked that this place is now and has been for centuries known as Castello di St. Angelo. Stilting again (Acta Sanctorum, p. 71), following Donatus, considers that the place hinted at is the head of the Circus Flaminius, and that the church is that which still exists in the Forum Piscarium.[i] If this locality be accepted, the reason against Boniface II. falls to [f] It may be remarked that twice in these masses are allusions to "loca sacrata (dicata)" to God in honour of St. Michael, implying, according to some, the existence of several churches.

[g] It is suggested (Leslie, not. ad Liturg. Mozarab., in loc.) that Sept. 30 was really the anniversary of the dedication of the church in the Via Salaria, which was shifted to Sept. 29 to accord with that of the dedication of the church on Mount Garganus. In view, however, of the close proximity of the days, this seems rather far-fetched.

[h] There is an allusion to the church in Via Salaria as still existing in the 9th century, in a list by an anonymous writer of the holy places about Rome, cited by Eckhart (de rebus Franciae Orientalis, vol. i. p. 831).

[i] Another famous church of St. Michael in Rome may be mentioned here, that built near the Vatican by Leo IV. (ob. A.D. 855) in honour of the victory over the Moslems.

the ground, and the non multo post of the martyrologies is certainly more applicable to him.

In the foregoing remarks we have dwelt on the local Roman festival, whether or not borrowed from the Apulian commemoration; and doubtless some considerable time elapsed before the observance became a general one in the Western church. Still, by the beginning of the 9th century, it had obviously become one of the chief festivals of the church, for the council of Mentz (A.D. 813), in ordaining what festivals are to be observed, specifies Easter, Ascension, Pentecost, the festivals of St. Peter and St. Paul, St John the Baptist, the Assumption, the "dedicatio S. Michaelis," and the festivals of St. Remigius, St. Martin and St. Andrew (can. 36, Labbe, vii. 1250; see also Capitularia Regum Francorum, ii. 36; vol. i. 748, ed. Baluzius). It must be added, however, that the notice of the council of Mentz appears to be the first.[k] There is no mention of the festival in the Regula of Chrodegang, bishop of Metz. Before leaving this part of our subject, we may call attention to the special prominence given to the feast of St. Michael in the ecclesiastical laws of Ethelred II., king of England (A.D. 978–1016). The date of the festival is not mentioned, but there can be no doubt that it is September 29. It is ordered that the Monday, Tuesday, and Wednesday before the festival shall be kept as a fast, and that men shall walk barefoot to church and make their confessions. On these days all slaves are to be free from work. A neglect of the fast is to be punished in a slave by stripes, in a free man by a fine (30 pence if he is poor, 120 shillings if a thane), which is to be given to the poor (Patrol. cli. 1107).

On turning to the Eastern church, we meet with a variety of commemorations, assignable to various causes.

(1.) Most widely observed of all is the festival of November 8. This the Greek church dedicates to St. Michael, St. Gabriel, and All Angels (ἡ σύναξις τῶν παμμεγίστων ταξιαρχῶν Μιχαὴλ καὶ Γαβριὴλ καὶ πασῶν τῶν ἀσωμάτων δυναμέων). The notice for the day in the Greek metrical Ephemerides, prefixed by Papebroch to the first volume of the Acta Sanctorum for May (p. lii.), is ὀγδοάτην οὐρανίοιο κυδαίνει τάγματος Ἄρχων. The same is the case with the Russian church: reference may be made to the figure in the curious pictorial calendar (ibid. p. lv.). In the Armenian calendar, as given by Assemani (Bibl. Or. iii. 1. 653), the day is dedicated to Michael and Gabriel. We find it also as one of the numerous feasts of the Ethiopic church, of which we shall again speak (Ludolf, Hist. Aeth. p. 398); and in the Coptic calendar (ibid., also Selden, de synod. vet. Ebraeorum, pp. 226 sqq., ed. Amsterdam, 1679) we find the day dedicated to St. Michael, with a second and third festival on the two following days. This special prominence given in the Coptic church is interesting in connexion with the incident we shall now mention. The original reason which led to the establishment of this festival is unknown, but a curious story is told in the annals of Said-Ebn-Batrik or Eutychius,[l] patriarch of Alexandria (ob. A.D. 940). This is to the effect that the patriarch Alexander (ob. A.D. 326) found on his accession a large temple existing in Alexandria, which had been built by Cleopatra in honour of Saturn. In this was a large idol of brass, named Michael, to which sacrifices were offered, and a great annual festival observed. The bishop finding that open opposition to this idolatry failed, suggested to his people that they should change the festival into one to the archangel Michael, and offer the sacrifice to him, so that he might intercede for them to God. The advice was taken, the idol broken up and made into a cross, and the temple became the church of St. Michael, whence "the Copts in Egypt and Alexandria still keep the feast on that day to the angel Michael, and sacrifice numerous victims." (Annales, vol. i. p. 435, ed. Pocock; Oxford, 1658; see also Selden, p. 202). It is sufficient to remark on this story, found in a writing often of a most foolish character, that there is no evidence of the existence of any idol named Michael [not improbably there may have been in some earlier document some confusion with Moloch, who in many respects may be viewed as equivalent to Saturn, and whose name hardly differs from Michael, save by a slight metathesis], and such a breaking up of an idol was not a likely event to have happened in Alexandria so late as the time of Constantine.

(2.) We shall next mention the manifestation said to have happened at Chonae, close to Colossae. The legend is to the effect that there being a great danger of inundation from the river Lycus, by which a church dedicated to St. Michael might have been submerged, the archangel opportunely appeared to the bishop Archippus, and opened a chasm in the earth, which carried off the water. Dr. Lightfoot remarks that thus "the worship of angels is curiously connected with the physical features of the country" (p. 71 n.), which is described by Strabo (xii. 8. 16) as πολύτρητον καὶ εὔσεισ τον. This event is commemorated on September 6 in the Greek [in some printed editions of the Menaea on September 7; Acta Sanctorum, in loc. § 185], Russian and Ethiopic churches (Ludolf, p. 390). The heading for the day in the Menaea is ἡ ἀνάμνησις τοῦ παραδόξου θαύματος ἐν Κολασσαῖς τῆς Φρυγίας παρὰ τοῦ ἀρχιστρατήγου Μιχαήλ, and the verse in the poetical Greek Ephemerides, which we have already once cited, is Ῥοῦν Μιχαὴλ ποταμῶν χώνευσε νόων ἅγος ἔκτῃ (p. xliii.). Reference may also be made to the quaint figure in the pictorial Moscow Calendar (p. xlv.). Of this legend, Acta are extant both in Greek and Latin. It may be remarked here that there was a very famous church to St. Michael at Chonae, called by Nicetas Choniata, a native of the place, τὸν ἀρχαγγελικὸν ναὸν . . . μεγέθει μέγιστον καὶ κάλλει κάλλιστον (p. 230, ed. Bekker).

(3.) The Menology of cardinal Sirletus (Canisius, Thesaurus, III. i. 438) also connects June 8

[k] The sermon on the festival of St. Michael, once attributed to Bede, is certainly spurious (Patrol. xciv. 502). In connexion with Mentz it may be mentioned that St. Boniface is said to have built a monastery to St. Michael at Ordorf, in consequence of a vision of the archangel. This building of the monastery, however, is mentioned in a life of St. Boniface, written after the middle of the 11th century (Patrol. lxxxix. 645), and there is no mention of a festival of St. Michael in the list of festivals given in the statutes of St. Boniface (ib. 824).

with St. Michael, and it seems possible, on the authority of a MS. Synaxarion, to associate this with the dedication of the church of St. Michael in Sosthenium, near Constantinople; though, from the almost total absence of allusions to such a festival, it must be viewed as at any rate of not more than a local celebration. Sozomen (Hist. Eccles. ii. 3), in describing the building of Constantinople by Constantine, and referring to the numerous churches with which it was adorned, mentions as especially famous one situated in a place formerly known as the Hestiae, but afterwards as Μιχαήλιον, so called from the belief that the archangel had manifested himself, and from the miracles supposed to have been wrought by his means. It may be noted here that Nicephorus Callistus (Hist. Eccles. vii. 50) mentions two churches built by Constantine, ἀλλὰ καὶ ἐν τῷ Ἀνάπλῳ, καὶ ὁ Σωσθένιον ὁ χωρος ἐκάθαιρεν ἠθμοίρησεν. It is not quite clear here whether he is referring to two distinct localities (so Valesius, note to Sozomen, in loc.), or means that the title Sosthenium had been given to the Anaplus. On this point it may be noted that the heading to the chapter in Sozomen, to whomsoever it may be due, speaks of the Sosthenium as though it were the same as the Hestiae or Anaplus, and that Cedrenus (p. 498) refers to the church, τοῦ ἀρχιστρατήγου ἐν τῷ Ἀνακλῷ καὶ Σωσθενίῳ. Theophanes merely speaks of the place as the Anaplus (p. 34, ed. Classen). Nicephorus certainly only describes one locality, namely, on the Thracian side of the Bosporus, and thirty-five stadia of direct distance from Constantinople, in the direction of the Euxine.

This will be the most convenient place for referring to the other churches dedicated to St. Michael in or near Constantinople. The emperor Justinian, we are told by Procopius, levelled to the ground two churches of St. Michael, one in the Anaplus, and the other on the Asiatic side, which had become very dilapidated, and rebuilt them again in a very costly manner at his own expense (de aedificiis Justiniani, i. 8). From the following chapter we find that the same emperor built on the Asiatic side of the straits another church to St. Michael. Besides all these, Ducange (Constantinopolis Christiana, lib. iv. pp. 97, 186) mentions no fewer than fifteen other churches dedicated to St. Michael in or near Constantinople, besides a church τῶν ἔννεα ταγμάτων (i. e. of the nine orders of angels). Procopius also tells us (ii. 10) of a very large church of St. Michael built by Justinian at Antioch.

(4.) In the Coptic church we find June 6 and the two following days kept as first, second, and third feast of St. Michael (Selden, p. 240; also Ludolf, p. 418). It may be observed that in the Ethiopic calendar, while the first of these three days forms one of the monthly festivals of St. Michael, the second and third days do not enter into the feast, but on the second is a commemoration of St. Gabriel.

(5.) Besides all the above, the Ethiopic church commemorates St. Michael on the twelfth day of each month, that is of their own calendar, answering in different months to a day varying from the ninth to the fifth of our own (Ludolf, in loc.).

(6.) Thus far the name of Michael, either alone or in connexion with the angels generally, has entered into the titles of the different festivals. We may add further that there are commemorations in the Ethiopic church of Seraphim and Cherubim on November 9 and June 27 (Ludolf, pp. 398, 420), and on November 4 of "equi cherubini" (ibid. 397, where see note), and on November 30 of Seraphim (ibid. 399) in both the Ethiopic and Coptic calendars.[m]

In connexion with this part of our subject, we may call attention in passing to the doctrine of guardian angels, a doctrine anciently believed in by the Jews, fully ratified by our Lord, and always held more or less definitely by the church.[n] A festival of the "Guardian Angel" seems often to have been held, particularly in Spain, on various days, especially March 1. At quite a late date, it was definitely fixed in the Roman church for October 2, by Paul V. (ob. A.D. 1621) and Clement X. (ob. A.D. 1676).

In conclusion, one or two further remarks in connexion with the observance of festivals of St. Michael, that have not fitted into our main subject, may here be added.

No office for a festival of St. Michael is found in Pamelius's Ambrosian or Mabillon's Gallican Liturgy; but in the Sacramentarium Bobiense is a mass in honore Sancti Michaelis. The collect for the day in the Gregorian Sacramentary has passed through the Sarum missal, with but slight modification, into our own prayer-book. The epistle in the Comes, as edited by Pamelius (Liturgy. Lat. ii. 47) is Rev. i. 1–5, which, though also that of the Sarum missal, has not been retained in the prayer-book. The gospel in the Comes and missal is the same as our own, Matt. xviii. 1–10. In the Mozarabic missal, the prophetia, epistle, and gospel are Rev. xii. 7–17 [this is read for the epistle in the Sacramentarium Bobianum, of which vv. 7–12 form the epistle in our own church], 2 Thess. i. 3–12, Matt. xxv. 31–46. The gospel in the Sacr. Bobiense is Matt. xvii. 1–17 (Patrol. lxxxv. 875, where see Leslie's note).

Several orders of knighthood claim the archangel as their patron saint, e.g. the French order founded by Louis XI. in 1469. The order of the Wing [vel Ala], i. e. of St. Michael, said to have been founded by Alphonso, king of Portugal (ob. A.D. 1185), in memory of a victory over the Moslems, appears, however, a very doubtful affair altogether.

Literature.—For the matter of the foregoing article, I have to express considerable obligation to Augusti (Denkwürdigkeiten aus der Christlichen Archäologie, iii. 281 sqq.), Binterim (Denkwürdigkeiten der Christ-Katholischen Kirche, v. i. 465 sqq.), and Stilting (Acta Sanctorum, Sept. 29). Reference may also be made to Stengelius, C., de Michaelis archangeli principatu, apparitionibus, templis, cultu et miraculis (Aug. Vind., 1629); Maius, J. B., de Festo Michaelis, Kilon., 1698;

[m] It may be noted that in the Calendar as given by Selden (p. 226), these days are noted respectively, as of the "four angelic living creatures," and of the "twenty-four elders," probably with reference to Rev. iv. 4.

[n] The following beautiful prayer in connexion with the Guardian Angel deserves to be cited, from the Alexandrian Liturgy of St. Basil:—Ἄγγελον εἰρηνικὸν τῇ ἁγίᾳ ἡμῶν ζωῇ παρακατάστησον, φρουροῦντα, διατηροῦντα, διαφυλάσσοντα, φωτίζοντα. ὁδηγοῦντα ἡμᾶς εἰς τὰν ἔργον ἀγαθόν (Renaudot, p. 81).

MILAN, COUNCILS OF (Mediolanenses Concilia). The two first councils of Milan were held within a year of each other, with the council of Sardica between them, and have been called the first and second under pope Julius.

(1) A.D. 346, at which the semi-Arian profession of the year before, called the Macrostyche, was rejected (Mansi, ii. 1369).

(2) A.D. 347, at which Photinus, metropolitan of Sirmium, was condemned, and Valens and Ursacius received into communion on abjuring Arianism (Mansi, iii. 159–62).

(3) A.D. 355, at which the emperor Constantius was present, and the condemnation of St. Athanasius was once more decreed, all who would not agree to it being exiled. Marcellus and Photinus were condemned in the same breath. It is said to have been attended by upwards of 300 bishops, but as only thirty seem to have subscribed to what was decreed against St. Athanasius, the majority must either have remained passive or withdrawn. Foremost among those thirty were Valens and Ursacius, who had renounced Arianism at the previous council. The synodical letter addressed to Eusebius of Vercelli, who, therefore, could not have been present, though he had been invited to it, was, in all probability, their composition. (Mansi, iii. 233–50.)

(4) A.D. 380, at which the charges brought against a virgin named Indicia were pronounced false, and her accusers condemned. (Mansi, iii. 517. Comp. St. Ambr. Ep. 5 and 6, ed. Ben.)

(5) A.D. 390, when Jovinian and his followers, who had been condemned at Rome for heresy by pope Siricius, had a similar sentence passed upon them by St. Ambrose and his suffragans. The subscriptions to their letter, indeed, hardly bear out its heading. (Mansi, iii. 689 and 663–7.)

(6) A.D. 451, attended by Eusebius, bishop of Milan, and eighteen suffragans, their deputies having returned from the East; when the letter of St. Leo to Flavian, which had been sent thither by them, was read, and having been found consonant to scripture and antiquity—above all to what had been written on the Incarnation by St. Ambrose—was approved. (Mansi, vi. 527 and 141.)

(7) A.D. 679, at which a letter was addressed to the emperor Constantine Pogonatus by Mansuetus, bishop of Milan and his suffragans, in anticipation of the sixth council; and accompanied by a dogmatic profession of high interest, in connexion with the creed then in use. (Mansi, xi. 203–7.)

The second, formerly confused with the first, was held A.D. 416; for its eight first canons condemning Pelagianism, also see 109–16 of the African code. Of the remaining nineteen, the 23rd is not found in that code at all; while the 20th suggests that the first half of canon 106 in the code has been interpolated. MILITARY SERVICE. Militia in later usage appears to include the performance of any public service, either civil or military

(see Ducange, Gloss.). So Augustine (Serm. 82, § 3, de Diversis, vol. v. p. 1905; Migne, Patrol.) says that Holy Scripture in speaking of soldiers does not mean those only who are occupied in active warfare (armatâ militiâ), but that every one uses the weapons of his own special warfare, and thus is enrolled as a soldier in his own grade (quisque militiae suae cingulo utitur, dignitatis suae miles describitur). In Latin writers the word has a triple meaning: the Militia Palatinalis belonging to the officers of the palace; Castrensis to military service in the camp; and Cohortalis to civil service in the provinces. (See Vales, Not. in Soz. H. E. v. 4; Bingham, Eccl. Ant. iv. 4, § 1.)

It also applied to those who held lands, possessions, or titles by tenure of feudal service. Thus, e.g., the Laws of the Lombards (lib. iii. tit. 8, c. 4) provide that no "miles" of a bishop, abbat, or abbess shall lose his fief (beneficium) without being convicted of a crime. In Anglo-Saxon chronicles the title "miles" is commonly used to describe those who were attached in any capacity to the household of a prince. For examples see Ducange (Gloss.). So Avitus of Vienne, Ep. 83. Sigismund, king of Burgundy, speaks of the title of patrician conferred upon him by the emperor Anastasius as "militiae titulos," and Gregory of Tours (Hist. Franc. iv. c. 42) speaks of the patriciate which a certain Mummulus obtained from king Guntram as a "militia." Sometimes it appears to be used simply for any rewards given in return for service. Thus Gregory of Tours (Hist. Franc. viii. 39) speaks of the widow of a certain Badegilsus, bishop of Le Mans, claiming some property which was alleged to have been given to the see, as the hire given personally to her husband (haec est militia viri mei); and (id. x. c. 19) speaking of the treasures left by a certain bishop Egidius, says that those of them which were the produce (militia) of evil doing were carried into the king's treasury.

Thus in ecclesiastical writers the word is often found expressing any kind of service either civil or military. The Apostolic Canons (c. 82) provide that any of the clergy wishing to retain any public employment (στρατείᾳ σχολάζων), so as to serve both the emperor and the church, were to be deposed, on the ground of the command, "Render unto Caesar the things that are Caesar's, and to God the things that are God's." (See Beveregе, Not. in loco, and Bingham, Eccl. Ant. vi. 4, § 9.) Sozomen (H. E. iv. 24) narrates that a council of Constantinople, A. D. 360, deposed one Neonas, bishop of Seleucia, because he had admitted to holy orders certain men who were bound to civic offices, πολιτευόμενοι (see Vales, Not. in loco). A capitulary of Constantine (Cod. Leg. Offic. de Episc. et Cler.) speaks of the curiae to which certain men belonged as "officia quibus militant." It is often also especially applied to ecclesiastical service. In the Ordo Romanus, c. 1, the members of the procession that precedes the pontiff to the church are ordered to walk in the order of their respective offices (partibus prout militavit). Gregory the Great (Ep. iii. 11) speaks of the servants of the church as "militia clericatûs." St. Remigius (Sirmond, Conc. Ant. Gall. i. 205) speaks of the lectors' service as "militia lectorum."

In the more limited meaning of warfare it must be considered—

I. As regards the laity. The profession of arms in the earlier days of the church appears to have been considered with some distrust, as scarcely compatible with the Christian character, since it necessitated the shedding of blood and taking part in capital punishments. None of the councils, however, venture to prohibit it. The first council of Nice indeed (c. 12) orders that those who had made profession of the faith and cast away the military belt, and then returned to the service and given money to be restored to their rank, should be for three years among the hearers and then for ten years among the prostrators. But this canon appears to have referred to some particular case, very probably to that of soldiers who had quitted the army rather than commit idolatry, and then, repenting of what they had done, regained their position on condition of offering sacrifice. (See Bingham, Eccl. Antiq. xi. c. 5, § 10.) The first council of Arles, A.D. 314 (c. 3, Bruns, Canones, ii. p. 107) appears to recognise the fact that the profession of Christianity should not be made an excuse for evading the duties of citizenship, by excommunicating those who throw down their arms in time of peace. Another reading is "in time of war." The Apostolic Constitutions (viii. 3, 32) provide that a soldier who applies for baptism should promise to obey the injunctions given to soldiers by John the Baptist, to do injury to no man, to accuse no man falsely, and to be content with their hire. If he gave that promise he was to be admitted, if he refused to do so, to be rejected.

Ecclesiastical writers treat the subject very much in accordance with their own personal temperament, the ground taken by those who deny that a Christian can continue to be a soldier being always that some of the duties required by a military profession are incompatible with the laws, or at least with the spirit, of Christianity. Tertullian, as might be expected, is most outspoken and uncompromising. In answering the question whether a soldier in uniform can be admitted to the church, he asks in return whether there can be a soldier who is not obliged to take part in bloodshed and capital punishments, and again inquires how a Christian can possibly fight without the sword which his Lord has taken from him (de Idol. c. 19). Again (de Coron. Milit. c. 11), in answering the question whether warfare in any way is a lawful occupation for a Christian, he contrasts the ordinary duties of a soldier with the position of a believer. How, he asks, can a son of peace make war, or he whose duty it is to cast out idols guard an idol's temple? How can one who is forbidden to burn incense submit to have his own corpse burned by military rule? The case is different, he adds, when those who were actually soldiers were converted, as the soldiers who came to John the Baptist and the believing centurion. In such cases a believer ought either to desert at once, which, he asserts, is a common practice, or to be resolute not to be compelled to perform duties which are forbidden by the laws of his Christian faith. Faith, he adds, knows not the meaning of the word compulsion. But in other places he admits that his opinion had not been generally acted on by Christians. "We fill your camps," he says (Apologet. c. 37), "we man your fleets, and serve in your armies" (id. c. 42.) The well-known legen l of the Thundering Legion proves also that Christians were in considerable numbers in the army of the emperor Aurelius (Euseb. E. H. v. 5). Origen (contra Cels. viii. §§ 73, 74), in answering the question of Celsus why Christians do not bear arms and bring help to the emperor, admits the fact that they were unwilling to take up arms and slay men, but alleges that as priests they were ever warring with their prayers for the emperor, and thus serving him with better weapons than they would have used in the army. Lactantius (Institutiones, vi. c. 20) considers any occupation that implies shedding of blood is unfit for a Christian.

The same ground is taken by Paulinus of Nola (Epist. ad Mivet., Ep. 25; Migne, Patrol.).

Another class of writers take a milder view, and speak with more hesitating utterance. Basil (Epist. ad Amphiloch., Class 2, Ep. 188, § 13; Migne, Patrol.), while admitting that bloodshed in lawful war is innocent, says that those who commit it contract a certain impurity, and should abstain from communion for three years. The Greeks used this canon as an argument against the emperor Phocas, when he insisted that the soldiers who fell in battle on his side should be inserted in the book of martyrs (see note, Migne, Patrol. in loco).

It is not clear whether Leo the Great (Epist. ad Rustic. c. 12) is speaking specially of military service or of secular business in general when he forbids penitents to return to the warfare of the world (militiam secularem), on the ground of the apostolic injunction, "no man that warreth entangleth himself in the affairs of this life;" and because no man is free from the snares of the devil who involves himself in worldly warfare (militia mundana), adding (c. 14) though the occupation may be lawful in itself.

A very different view is taken by Augustine. He says (Ep. Class iii. 189, c. 4; Migne, Patrol.) that it is wrong to suppose that no soldier can serve God while engaged in actual warfare, giving as examples David and Cornelius, the soldiers who came to John the Baptist, and the centurion who came to our Lord. Again (De Diversis Quæst. i. 4) he owns there are many bad soldiers, but adds they are those who do not conform to military discipline, just as many Christians become bad when they disobey the commands of their master Christ, and (Serm. 302, c. 16, Migne, Patrol.) it is not their evil occupation but their evil hearts (non militia sed malitia) which makes soldiers evil men; and in another place asserts that he is not guilty of homicide who slays men in lawful battle, "Deo auctore" (De Civit. Dei, i. cc. 21-26).

In later years all doubt on the subject quite disappeared, and war began to be considered even meritorious when undertaken against unbelievers, or on behalf of the interests of the church. Pope Stephen II. (Ep. 144, Sirmond, Conc. Ant. Gall. ii. 10) encouraged the Gauls to take up arms in defence of the church, adding that he felt quite sure that St. Peter would be lenient to the sins of those who fell in the service of his church. Rabanus Maurus (de Eccl. Discip. ii. 5) asserts that those who engage in a just war are innocent, since they are only obeying the lawful commands of their sovereign. Hincmar of Rheims (Epist. ad Car. Calv. cc. 9, 10) says that those who declare war and those who fight as soldiers in a just cause are blameless, and (c. 11) that a soldier who shed blood in lawful warfare is innocent, the responsibility resting with the king. Neither was any difficulty made about sending the soldiers from church fiefs when land was held by ecclesiastical persons under feudal tenure. Hincmar of Rheims, in his Epistle to Hadrian (Opp. ed. Paris, 1645, ii. 608), urges very sensibly that if the church holds lands under the laws of the king, they must render to the king the duties belonging to them; and (Ep. 46) says to send forces to the army of the king is simply to render to Cæsar what is due to Cæsar. The second council of Vern (A.D. 844, c. 8) provides that when bishops were prevented by illness from bringing their forces themselves, they should send them under proper leaders. It is needless to multiply proofs of this, as will be seen in the following section; the great difficulty was to prevent the clergy from themselves leading their troops and engaging in actual warfare.

II. As relates to the clergy. These were always strictly forbidden to bear arms. The first council of Toledo, A.D. 398 (c. 8), forbids anyone who after baptism has put on the military belt to be raised to the office of a deacon. The council of Chalcedon, A.D. 451 (c. 7), anathematizes all who, having been once enrolled among the clergy, return either to warfare or to secular employment. The first council of Tours, A.D. 460 (c. 5), excommunicates all clergy who shall engage in warfare. The council of Lerida, A.D. 523 (c. 1), speaking of the case of clergy who might be in a besieged city, provides that all who minister at the altar should positively abstain from shedding human blood; those who had done so, even in the case of an enemy, should be removed for two years not only from their office, but from communion. The two years were to be spent in fasting, prayers, and almsgiving. At the end of two years they might be restored, but never promoted to higher stations. The penance might be protracted at the will of the bishop, if not performed to his satisfaction. The first council of Mâcon, A.D. 581 (c. 5), provides that any clergy wearing arms shall be kept for thirty days on bread and water. The fourth council of Toledo, A.D. 633 (c. 19), forbids that any employed in secular warfare or pursuit (militia) should be ordained; and c. 44 provides that clergy who have willingly borne arms in any revolt shall lose their rank, and be sent for discipline to a monastery. The council of Lestines, A.D. 743 (c. 2), forbids any of the clergy to wear arms or to accompany armies, except one or two bishops with their chaplains in attendance on the prince, and one presbyter attached to each division of the army. The first council of Soissons, A.D. 744 (c. 3), forbids abbats to bear arms, even those who by their feudal tenure were obliged to send soldiers from their lands. The council of Meaux, A.D. 845 (c. 37), provides that clergy who wore arms should lose their offices.

Leo I. (Epist. 3, §§ 4, 5) orders that if any baptized person has engaged in warfare, he shall not be admitted into holy orders, giving as a reason that soldiers are obliged to execute the commands of their superior officer, however unlawful they may be. It may also be noted that the canon of Basil just given, forbidding any who have shed blood to be admitted to communion for three years, would effectually prevent the clergy from bearing arms.

That the clerical office was held to imply incapacity for bearing arms is also implied in the law of Honorius (Cod. Theod. vii. lib. 20; De Veteran. leg. 12), which forbids anyone to enter the clerical office in order to excuse himself from serving in the army on plea of being an ecclesiastical person. [See PRINCES, CONSENT OF.]

In practice, however, it is evident that these injunctions were occasionally transgressed upon many pleas. It appears to have been not uncommon for monks and clergy to accompany an army to the field for the purpose of helping it with their prayers. Bede (H. E. ii. 2) speaks of the slaughter at Westchester of a great number of monks of Bangor who had assembled to help the army of the Britons by their prayers, and whom he calls an army (militia); and (i. 20, p. 57) of Germanus, bishop of Auxerre, who took command, on an emergency, of the army of the Britons, and defeated the Picts and Scots by the weapons of prayer and praise. The transition from such weapons to those of a more secular kind was easy. Theodoret (H. E. ii. 30) speaks of James, bishop of Nisibis, acting as general (στρατηγός) of the forces of the city during the siege by Sapor, and using his engineering skill in directing the working of the machines upon the walls; but it is added that he himself took no personal share in the defence, but remained all the time within the church in prayer: the enemy were finally discomfited without bloodshed by a plague of gnats and flies which arrived in answer to his prayer. Other clergy do not appear to have been so careful to observe the nice distinction between advice and action, especially in cases where the interests of the church were concerned. Sozomen (H. E. vii. 15) speaks of one Marcellus, a bishop of Apamea, who led a band of soldiers and gladiators against the pagans, and was slain in the affray. It is added, proving that his conduct was considered meritorious, that the council of the province prohibited his relatives from attempting to avenge his death, on the ground that they should rather give thanks that he was accounted worthy to die in such a cause. Gregory of Tours (Hist. Franc. iv. 43) speaks of two prelates, Salonius and Sagittarius, who wore armour and slew many men with their own hands in battle. Boniface of Mayence (Ep. ad Zach.) asked the pope's advice about certain bishops who fought armed and shed blood with their own hands; the answer was, that such should be deposed. Paul Warnefrid (Hist. Longobard. v. 40) applauds the bravery of one Zeno, a deacon of Ticene, who went into battle clad in the robes of Cunibert, king of the Lombards, and was killed in his place.

In later days, when the church began to hold lands under the feudal system, it seems that in some cases the bishops were expected to come in person to the army of their sovereign. Charles the Bald (Sirmond, Conc. Ant. Gall. iv. pp. 143–145) brings a charge against a bishop named Vuenilo that he had not helped him in his advance against the enemy either in his own person or with the forces that it was his duty to bring. Hincmar of Rheims (Ep. 26), writing to pope Nicholas, speaks of himself and his fellow bishops as going with the king against the Bretons and Normans, accordi g to the custom of the kingdom. See also Flodoard (Vita Hincmar. iii. 18). The second council of Vern, A.D. 844 (c. 8), when providing that bishops who are weak of body shall send their forces under command of one of the king's officers, indicates that it was the usual custom for bishops to lead their forces in their own persons.

But efforts were continually made to keep the clergy as far as possible from actually mingling in war. A capitulary of Charles the Great (Capit. iii. c. 141; Migne, Patrol. xcvii. 814) provides that no priest shall accompany the army, except two or at most three bishops elected by the others, for the purpose of prayer and benediction, and with them chosen priests of good learning, and with the permission of their own bishops, who should celebrate divine service, attend to the sick, and especially take care that no one died without receiving the holy sacrament. They were not to bear arms, nor to go into battle, nor shed blood, but to employ themselves in their proper duties. Those ecclesiastics who held fiefs which obliged them to provide soldiers, were to send their men well armed, and they themselves to remain at home and pray for the army. Hincmar of Rheims, whatever his own practice may have been, gives very good advice upon the subject. In his epistle to the bishops (Opp. ii. 159, cc. 4, 5) he says that the soldiers due from the possessions of the church were to be sent under their appointed leaders to the help of the prince, but that the bishops themselves were to give advice and use all their efforts to arrest the effusion of blood. The council of Meaux, A.D. 845 (c. 37), provides that clergy are not to carry arms on pain of losing their grade; also (c. 47), that bishops should send their forces under the command of some of the church vassals (ex subditis et ecclesiasticis ministris), chosen with the consent of the archbishop. A curious provision follows: that such leaders should not indulge in any idle hope of succeeding to the bishopric, unless in accordance with the provision made by Gregory the Great, for which see PRINCES, CONSENT OF.

But the literature of the period abounds in indications that many bishops and abbats preferred the excitement of the camp to the seclusion of the cloister or the monotony of pastoral duty. [P. O.]

MILITO, martyr; commemorated at Rome July 11 (Hieron. Mart.). [C. H.]

MILK or MILKPAIL (IN ART). Milkpails are represented in the Callixtine catacomb, 6th cubiculum of St. Callixtus (Aringhi, vol. i. p. 557). In these two paintings the Lord seems to be shepherd and lamb, or priest and sacrifice. The lamb in any case is bearing the mulctra, with the pastoral staff. It may be supposed that the vessel which often accompanies the Good Shepherd is of the same kind. (See Buonarroti, vi. 2.)

On some sarcophagi (see Bottari, pl. xx.; Aringhi, vol i. p. 291; Maffei, Verona Illustr. iii. p. 54) shepherds are represented in the act of milking their flocks. On the whole it seems more likely (see Ezekiel xxv. 4; Heb. v. 12, 13; 1 Cor. iii. 2; 1 Peter ii. 2) that the mulctra refers to the preaching of the Gospel, than to the Eucharist.

The milkpail is sometimes taken as a symbol of spring (Bottari, iii. 62); and Martigny quotes a couplet to this effect from the Calendarium Bucherianum [CALENDAR, p. 256].

"Tempus ver, hoedus petulans et garrula hirundo Indicat, et sinus lactis et herba virens," where the poet's disregard for the quantity of the word sinus may be condoned, on account of his evident good will. [R. St. J. T.]

MILK AND HONEY. A mixture of milk and honey was in ancient times commonly administered to infants immediately after baptism (Tertullian, de Cor. Milit. c. 3; c. Marcion. i. 14), as typical of the heavenly Jerusalem, where milk and honey descend in showers (Clem. Alex. Paedag. l. vi. § 45, p. 125, Potter. [See BAPTISM, § 66, p. 164.]

Milk and honey were also on certain occasions offered on the altar. See HONEY AND MILK, p. 783; LITURGY, p. 1021, § 16. [C.]

MINIATURE (Miniatura). This term is derived from minium, or red lead, the pigment universally made use of in the earliest days of ornamental writing, in order to decorate the capital letters, titles, and margins of various MSS. Hence also Rubric, as the Service-books, which employed the attention of the most skilful copyists, were generally most freely ornamented; and red, or minium, is always preferred, where any single colour is used to relieve black and white MS.

It will be convenient to separate throughout the subject of ornamental writing [LITURGICAL BOOKS] from that of miniatures proper. These illustrate the text, but they are not part of the writing, or dependent on it. They may illustrate the facts narrated, and be pictures of architecture, ceremonial, costume, or action; or may be actual portraits. Frequently they involve spirited or grotesque representations of birds, beasts, fishes, insects, and reptiles, done in a naturalistic way, and purely for the sake of the drawing. In this case, they are called "illuminations" in the 12th century, when naturalistic skill was prevailing over grotesque fancy. About the end of that century, says Dom Guéranger (Institutions Liturgiques, vol. iii. p. 368), "begins the reign of illuminators." They took the subjects of their richly decorative borders from the vegetable kingdom, and imitated leaves, flowers, and fruits, with wonderful exactness, and often proceeded to insects or precious stones, in search of brilliant and sparkling objects of imitation.

The earlier miniatures which come within our period are of a very different character. The separation between ornamental writing and illustrative miniature is at once wide and narrow. A miniature is of course always a part of the ornament of a page of MS.; but it may not be artistically connected with the written text. As Professor Westwood observes, "the earliest MSS. with miniatures (and they are among the oldest which have survived to our times) simply contain small square drawings let into the text, without any ornamental adjuncts." He mentions three of these invaluable relics, preserved in the Imperial Library at Vienna, namely, a Roman Calendar, described by Schwartz (de Ornamentis Librorum, ed. 1756, p. 38), as "egregium vetustatis monumentum atque pulcherrimum Bibl. Vindobon. cimelium." It contains allegorical figures of the months, eight in number, each about eight inches high, finely draped and exquisitely drawn; and they are supposed to have been executed as early as the reign of Constantine II.* Also the famous purple Greek Codex Geneseos, with forty-court, Peinture, pl. xxvi.), written for the empress Juliana Anicia at the beginning of the 6th century, and ornamented with her portrait and many miniatures, and drawings of plants. These are described by Lambecius (Bibliotheca Vindobonensis, Vienna, 1665). D'Agincourt gives, copies of the illustrations of the Vatican Virgil which Westwood says may go back to the time of Constantine; and these, too, are in simple rectangular form, and though both beautiful and illustrative, are not decorative. The last word will be confined throughout this article to miniatures which are connected with the writing of a page and form part of its whole effect. It would seem that in almost all the early codices the text was everything to the scribe, and all the ornament belonged to it, as to a sacred thing. Hence the great attention paid to gold and silver writing, and the constant habit of enclosing miniatures in capital letters, where they were brought into unity with the rest of the page as a pictorial composition.

It is curious, further to distinguish decoration from illustration and graphic ornament from miniature, that they have by no means flourished and decayed altogether in the same place or at the same time. From the 6th to the 9th centuries is certainly a time of general collapse, except in the Irish, Hebridean, and Northumbrian monasteries; and few illuminated MSS. can be pointed out as certainly executed during that period, or until Charlemagne's revival of art in the 9th. But in our own country, in the 7th and 8th centuries, while miniature painting had fallen so low as to be simply distressing to the modern observer, extraordinary skill was manifested in ornamented writing. "It is impossible," says Professor Westwood, "to imagine anything more childish than the miniatures contained in the splendid Hibernian and Anglo-Saxon MSS. of this period. Neither can miniature be said to have materially improved between the 8th and 11th centuries, the drawing of the human figure being rude, the extremities singularly and awkwardly attenuated, and the draperies fluttering in all directions." (See the illustrations in Palæogr. Sacra from the Irish psalter preserved in St. John's College, Cambridge, and Ruskin, The Two Paths, Lect. I.)

In the present article we have only to deal, strictly speaking, with the subject of ornamental writing as to the capital letters (heads of capitula or chapters), which may not only be rubricated or ornamented letters, but contain pictures illustrative of the text. But it is difficult to observe this distinction in Anglo-Saxon, Irish, and, indeed, in Visigothic MSS. The grotesques of the latter often mould the letters themselves into conventional forms of birds, flowers, and animals, often of great graphic vigour; and the extraordinary curves and interlacings of the two former are full of serpentine and lace-like forms. The Irish MSS. are different. The delicacy and decision of their working is incredible (see Palæographia Sacra, Gospels of Moelsi Brith MacDurnan, and Book of Kells), but the miniatures display a kind of fatuity and morbid indifference to accuracy, beauty, and all else, which is a curious anomaly, and suggests a somewhat unhealthy asceticism. It is doubtless true that their delicacy and precision of execution were unrivalled by continental artists of their time, or indeed of any other period. There can be no doubt, also, that missionaries from the Celtic parts of Britain, as St. Gall and Columban, carried their arts and religion to various parts of the continent, and we may assert with Professor Westwood, that many of the splendid capital letters of the Carolingian period were executed in imitation of our earlier codices; though he admits that the best Franco-Gallic MSS. drew much of their elegant foliage ornament from remembrances of classic art.

But those who study such MSS. as the Irish psalter above-mentioned, and some English specimens, will think there is considerable ground for the somewhat ill-tempered observations of the Benedictine Nouveau Traité de Diplomatique, ii. 122: "Les ornemens des liturgies Anglo-Saxonnes semblent n'être le fruit que d'imaginations atroces et mélancoliques. Jamais d'idées riantes, tout se ressent de la dureté du climat. Lorsque le génie ne manque pas absolument, un fond de rudesse et de barbarie caracterise d'autant mieux les MSS. et les lettres historiées qu'on a plus affecté d'embellir." It is possible, however, that these lacertine and ophidian forms may have vague reference to Eastern symbolisms of the serpent, and be one more link of connexion between the British and Oriental churches. The finest known instances of animal-initial letters are perhaps the evangelic symbols of the four gospels in the evangeliary of Louis-le-Débonnaire. (See Count Bastard, Peintures des Manuscrits, vol. ii. and GROTESQUE, p. 750.)

II. Illustrative miniatures date from a very early period. They are found in Egyptian papyri. Pliny says (Hist. Nat. xxv. c. 2) that certain physicians painted, in their works, the plants they had described, as in the Anician Dioscorides; and in xxxv. c. 2 he says that Cicero gave Varro great credit for introducing portraits of more than 700 illustrious persons into his works. Seneca (de Tranquill. Anim. ix.) speaks of books as illustrated (cum imaginibus). Martial says (Epigr. 186):

"Quam brevis immensum cepit membrana Maronem Ipsius vultum prima tabella gerit."

Fabricius (Bibl. Lat. cur. Ernesti, i. p. 125) gives the title of a book by Varro on miniature painting, called Hebdomadum, sive de imaginibus libri.

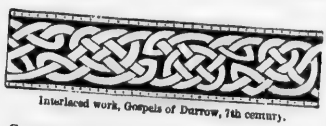
The earliest MSS. with miniatures (some of the oldest remaining to our times) contain, as has been said, only small square or rectangular drawings let into the text. Those of the Vienese MSS. and the Vatican Virgil have been mentioned; Professor Westwood also names an Iliad in the Ambrosian Library at Milan with miniatures (not yet published, though announced), and the Syriac evangeliary of Rabula at Florence (6th century) is another example. In our own country the gospels of St. Augustine survive, and are referred to the 6th century (Pal. Sacra); also the Golden Greek canons (Brit. Mus. MSS. Add. No. 5111). Though writing still flourished in the 8th century in Ireland and Northumbria, pictorial power seems to have fallen very low, or to have been possessed only by Visigoths, or by the Lombards, whose early efforts chiefly took the direction of sculpture. The Carolingian Revival or "renaissance" was certainly influenced by Byzantine art, and a reference to D'Agincourt (Peinture, early examples) will shew that the Greek workmen had not lost heart and skill like those of Western Europe, and that Greece was to teach the world once more. Greek miniature-art, at all events, never fell so low in the dark ages as that of the Western Empire, always retaining a hold on classic art. Two MSS. of the 9th and 10th centuries are mentioned by Professor Westwood as containing beautiful allegorical figures, personifying Night, with robes powdered with stars and an inverted torch, and the Angels of Fire and Cloud, with the march of Israel through the Wilderness.

The beautiful work of Count Bastard contains every necessary gradation of examples of the progress made in the first eight centuries, from simple writing in red letters, with dotted borders or strokes, to highly ornamented letters—then to letters formed by grotesques of natural objects—finally to completed pictures of persons or things. Books on purple or azure vellum sometimes, though rarely, contain miniatures, as do the 11th century purple Psalter in the Bodleian Library, that in the library of the convent of the Remonstrants at Prague, and the splendid chrysograph of St. Médard of Soissons in the Bibliothèque Nationale (Bastard, vol. ii.). This contains, as Guéranger says, various "gracieux et étonnants edifices." The Menology of Basil is a storehouse of examples of Byzantine architecture, resembling the buildings found in some of the earliest Italian paintings. Much information on this subject will be found, in the most agreeable form, in the earlier chapters in Curzon's Visits to Monasteries in the Levant.

The MS. of Rabula is described by Westwood and Guéranger, and the former gives a beautiful illustration in colour (Pal. Sacra) of the miracle of Bethesda. The whole of the Rabula miniatures are given by Assemani, in his catalogue of the Laurentian Library. Under articles ASCENSION, CRUCIFIX, DEMONIACS, and JUDAS, in this Dictionary, will be found woodcut outlines of some of these.



Interlaced work, Gospels of Durrow, 7th century.

Count Bastard's book illustrates the principal French MSS. now in existence, as Professor Westwood's Palæographia and Irish and Anglo-Saxon MSS. are our chief authority for northern caligraphy and miniature. The French archæologist virtually gives us access to all the riches of the Bibliothèque Nationale. He begins with a splendid purple page in gold and silver writing from the 6th-century psalter of St. Germain des Prés. The interlaced ornament which prevails over all northern work for centuries after has already begun in a treatise of St. Ambrose (7th century, uncial with capitals). It is by no means confined to northern art, however, as a decided example of it is given in Pal. Sacra, No. 8 in the Arabic gospels; and the Greeks themselves had a braided ornament. For its use on Byzantine capitals see Stones of Venice, vol. ii. pp. 136, 137. Professor Ruskin considers it as decidedly of Arab origin, arising from the necessity for delicately pierced screens and slabs of perforated stone to allow free passage for air, but afford perfect concealment. The Arabs made these perforations in the shape of stars, and connected them by carving the intermediate spaces in the slabs of stone, in the semblance of interwoven fillets, which alternately sank beneath and rose above each other as they met. But its great popularity is founded on the natural taste for intricate ingenuity of line and pattern, which certainly prevails in Anglo-Saxon and Irish MSS.

very remarkably, and, as has been said, attains a rather morbid pitch in the latter. The constant use of wicker and interlaced hurdles in northern life would give this turn to Irish and Anglo-Saxon ornament in particular. But a very pleasing proof of its independent origin in Ireland was lately given by Mr. French, of Bolton. A cross had been ordered to be made, from drawings, in wicker and other plaited work, by some Irish craftsman of great skill, who at last produced one in all respects answering the instructions sent him, except that he had been obliged to insert a circle round the intersection of the limbs as a foundation for the other work. This shews the origin of the peculiar Irish cross with perfect certainty, and the adoption of patterns from wicker-work is obvious. Professor Westwood's authority may be quoted for this anecdote.

The earliest ornament which indicates observation of nature on the part of the caligraphist is in a MS. of extracts from St. Augustine of Hippo (second half of 7th century—the property in the 8th century of Ulric Obrecht, of Strasburg). Birds and flowers are used here, daffodils being carefully observed and drawn, and here the extraordinary Frank fancies of grotesque birds, fishes, and faces seem to begin (Bastard, vol. i.). Beasts and human figures are later, appearing in Carolingian work. The colours are red, green, and brown, with purple and yellow; and interlaced work prevails. Red initials seem to have been used from the earliest date, as they appear in a 5th-century MS. of Prudentius. The first architectural ornament is on a fragment of the canons of Eusebius, of the early 7th century.

A Merovingian MS. of the second half of the 7th century (Bast. vol. i. Recueil des Chroniques de St. Jérôme, d'Idace de Lamégo, Coll. des Jésuites) possesses special interest from the spirited work of some true scribe-draughtsman. Its capital letters are drawn brilliantly and exactly with the pen and without colour (lettres blanches ou à jour), and point to the real origin and principles of caligraphic miniature very admirably. And in some of the best Carolingian MSS. the pen breaks out vigorously in all manner of grotesques. The most amusing triumph of penmanship ever attained, we apprehend to be in an initial portrait of a monk-physician. [See woodcut in GROTESQUE.] No offensive or outrageous allusion or idea seems to occur in any of these records, as might be expected, though in the sacramentary of the abbey of Gellone, 8th or 9th century, there is a crucifixion, with angels, where much blood is used, and the drawing is grim and inferior. It soon recovers, however, in the Visigothic MSS., where many human and angelic figures are represented, and which may perhaps be distinguished from the earliest work by the number of beasts of chase represented in them, boars and hares in particular. One of the former is annexed. The northern taste for distortion here begins to appear in the human figures. One example of an Italian-Lombard MS. is conspicuous for the absence of interlaced work, and for a tendency to geometrical arrangement; which is a marked feature in the French-Lombard examples also. They are more numerous than the Italian, but still dwell on interlacings. The great MS. of St. Médard of Soissons [LITURGICAL BOOKS], written for Charlemagne (Bastard, vol. ii.), contains not only various birds executed with naturalistic accuracy, but grand whole-page miniatures. The use of gold and scarlet in the Charlemagne MSS. is very brilliant, and new "initiales feuronnées," with evidence of fresh study from nature, occur in Drogo's Sacramentary.

The importance of ancient miniature, as representing architecture, costume, and ceremonial, cannot be overrated, and the picture in Count Vivien's evangeliary of the presentation of the work to Charlemagne is most instructive; but actual portraits are not wanting in some MSS. The emperor Lothaire is represented in his evangeliary with Emma his wife; also Henry III. and the empress Agnes. A MS. is said to be now in the Escurial which contains portraits of Conrad the Salic and Gisela; and the Countess Matilda is depicted in her gospels in the Vatican. The existing Graeco-Latin MSS. before Jerome and the Vulgate do not contain any paintings, and we must pass on to northern art, especially for Irish and Anglo-Saxon miniatures. Professor Westwood's two works contain, or give references for, the whole subject of early caligraphy and drawing. His earlier work puts forth an able, and apparently quite valid, plea for the antiquity of MSS. such as the Gospels of Moell Brith MacDurnan and the Book of Kells, with that of St. Columba. They seem to date from the earlier Irish or Gaelic missions to the English of Northumbria. But the facsimiles of Irish and Anglo-Saxon miniatures and ornaments constitute an introduction to the history of fine art in Britain, from the Roman occupation to the Norman conquest, and throw a light on the monastic culture of that period. The chief characteristic of the earliest fine Irish or English is the greatly increased size and importance of the capitals and first lines of the text, with their pattern-ornament, which sometimes occupies whole pages, but is often enriched with miniature. They are certainly enough to prove, as Westwood observes, that from the 6th to the end of the 8th century, when art was practically extinct on the continent, a style of work, totally distinct from any other in the world, had been originated, cultivated, and brought to a marvellous state of perfection. Though British, Irish, and Anglo-Saxon pilgrims to Rome and Ravenna doubtless derived various inspirations of sacred art from the study of the great mosaics and of the remaining MSS. in churches or convents; they were taught the faith first at home, and re'urned home afterwards to execute highly original works of art—the Irish, as it would seem, with less feeling for natural form than the English; but both with a certain natural vigour and innate force of character. Their subjects, as Adam and Eve, Abraham, Moses, and the typical events of the Old Testament, with the miracles of mercy and some events of the Passion of the Lord, are those of Rome and Byzantium; in short, they repeat the universal picture-teaching of the early church, up to the 6th century. But their treatment is their own. Dots, lines, zigzags, interlacings, the serpentine ornament, and, far above all, the trackless intricacy of spiral patterns, entirely distinguish this school from all others.[a] The differences between Irish and English MSS. are certainly slight, so that Baeda's assertion that the early church of Britain differed in no respect from the Irish may include their fine art with other matters.

What is here said applies to works of earlier date than the 10th century, when a national style of more gorgeous character arose, in emulation of Charlemagne's great MSS., and when classical ornament (such as that of Count Vivien's Bible, or that of St. Paul without the Walls, D'Agincourt, Peinture, pl. xlv.) had begun to affect the insular artists.

Single figures predominate in the early Northern codices. In Westwood's folio illustrations (1868) will be found a St. Matthew from the Golden Gospels of Stockholm (9th or 9th century), and a David from the 7th-century psalter of St. Augustine; the symbolic evangelists from the Gospels of Durrow, Trinity College, Dublin,

From Book of Durrow. Westwood's Palaeographia Sacra.

(irresistibly rude and quaint in figure, framed in delicate spirals); the Temptation of our Lord from the Book of Kells, 7th century, with three other splendid illustrations; with pages from the Gospels of Lindisfarne or St. Cuthbert, and two pictures of David, as warrior and psalmist, from the Commentaries on the Psalms by Cassiodorus, "Manu Baedae," in the cathedral library at Durham. He also gives pictures of evangelists from the Gospels of MacDurnan (Archiep. Library, Lambeth), about 850, and the 8th or 9th century Gospels of St. Chad. Those from the Gospels of St. Petersburg and St. Gall are marked by Irish character, and the second childhood of the school appears in the Irish Psalter at St. John's College, Cambridge,[b] see suprà, woodcut of Crucifixion. The great Bible of Alcuin, and the psalter of king Athelstan (end of 9th century), are certainly far in advance of any of these as regards progress, and further promise, in representative art. The Irish school was simply devotional, and its working was limited by technical tradition. The artist spent his life in peaceful elaboration

[a] The Book of Durrow, or Gospels of St. Columba, is almost to a certainty written by the saint's own hand, whatever doubt may be felt as to the exact date of the book of Kells. Westwood quotes this from the late Dr. Petrie, and also gives from him the usual request of the scribe for the prayers of the reader, at the end of the Book of Durrow: "Rogo beatitudinem tuam, sancte presbyter Patrici, ut quicunque hunc libellum manu tenuerit, memineris Columbae scriptoris, qui hoc scripsi ipsemet evangelium per xii. dierum spatium, gratiâ Domini nostri." Below is written, in a contemporary hand, "Ora pro me, frater mi: Dominus tecum sit." All four gospels are contained in the MS.

[b] See also the Gospels of MacRegol (Westwood, pl. xvi.), preserved in the Bodleian Library, where St. John's eagle is in tartan chequers. The Book of Kells contains various pictures of events in the life of our Saviour in Irish style, and also some well-drawn animals, as dogs on p. 403, hares, rats, cats, mice, cocks and hens; but the style could never last, still less contend with the splendour and the naturalistic style of the Carolingian MSS.

of spirals; but he forgot, or was unable, under the painful trials of the time, to learn fresh truths from Greek or Roman sources. Still worse, he seems never by any accident to have looked with hope or pleasure, or in search of fresh subject, on external nature and its beauties. Consequently, he preferred single images of evangelists, constantly ruder and more fantastic as his cloistered life grew fainter and more morbid in its fancies. But in the Nativity, Ascension, and Glorification of our Saviour, and the zodiacal signs of Athelstan's psalter, we have the beginning of early mediæval art in England, with all its life and eagerly-crowded figures, and yet also with its strong stamp of Classicism or Byzantinism. It seems in this most singular and beautiful picture as if a later hand, more purely Gothic, had executed the two lower subjects of the Ascension and Glorification, while the others retain a shade of classical grace in composition. The Ascension greatly resembles that of the great Syriac MS. of Rabula; so much so, as in the mind of the writer to connect the Eastern and English schools of art, and form an important link between the ancient English church and the East.

The Augustinian or Gregorian-Augustinian MSS., one of which is in all probability now preserved in the library of Corpus Christi College, Cambridge, No. 286, the other in the Bodleian Library, Oxford, claim priority in time to the English, though probably not to many Irish MSS. Four miniatures, besides a large whole-page figure of St. Luke, are given from them in Palæogr aphia Sacra.[c] Their ornament is purely Romano-Byzantine. They are of the highest interest, as perhaps the oldest known specimens of this kind of Roman pictorial art in this country or elsewhere, and probably a few years anterior to the MS. of Rabula. With the exception of a leaf of St. John's Gospel in Greek, with miniatures of the apostles, now preserved at Vienna with the illuminated Greek Pentateuch of the 4th century, these are held to be the oldest existing specimens of written or painted Roman-Christian iconography. The Entry into Jerusalem, the Raising of Lazarus, the Capture of our Lord, and the Bearing of the Cross, are four out of the twelve subjects of the Cambridge MS. Three of these correspond to those so frequently repeated in the catacomb paintings, and on various sarcophagi. The initials are plain red, and the writing a fine uncial.

A remarkable characteristic, to a colourist, of the Book of Kells and some parts of the Gospel of Moeil Brith MacDurnan, is the beautiful use made of different tones and appositions of blue and green. The writer can compare it with nothing he has seen, so well as with the azures, purples, and blue-greens of many of the mosaics of Ravenna, which, with those of Rome, may doubtless have suggested much to northern pilgrims possessed of a style and special powers of their own.

Many curious questions as to the distinguishing characteristics of Classical, Anglo-Saxon, Carolingian, and even Eastern miniatures, have been lately raised by the celebrated Psalter of Utrecht. The date of its extraordinary illustrations seems very doubtful, whatever may be said of the apparently more ancient text. There are insuperable objections to Herr Kist's view that they go back to the time of Valentinian; indeed they appear to the writer more likely to be the work of a travelled and highly educated penman of English, perhaps Northumbrian-English birth, employed in an early Carolingian scriptorium. He may have been a pupil of Alcuin's, was possibly a palmer from the Holy Land, and certainly a "Romeo" or pilgrim to Rome. The drawings seem to be all by one hasty but skilful hand, directed by a mind of infinite facility of idea, and graphic power of realising the idea once formed. The illustrations are of two kinds; caligraphy, strictly speaking, and the pen and ink miniatures. The MS. is a large vellum 4to. in admirable preservation, and contains the whole of the Psalms, according to the Vulgate, with the Apocryphal Psalm 'Pusillus eram,' the Pater Noster, Canticles, Credo, and the Athanasian Creed. All are written throughout in triple columns, in Roman rustic capitals, very like those of the Vatican Virgil as to size (Nouv. Tr. de Dipl. iii. p. 56, pl. 35, fig. III. 2). The elegance of the letters resembles the Paris Prudentius (ibid. fig. viii.). The headings and initials are red uncials, and the first line is also uncial, and larger than the rest of the text. By the writing, in fact, the MS., says Professor Westwood, ought to be assigned to the 6th or 7th century; but for the remarkable initial B; of which this is certainly to be said, that those who are acquainted with Count Bastard's Carolingian facsimiles, and Professor Westwood's Saxon reproductions, will probably see that the letter unites the rich use of gold and scarlet of the one with the unmistakable knot-work and ophidian form of the other.

Each psalm has its pen and ink drawing, illustrating its subject with the inventive vigour of the best Gothic age, and not altogether devoid of Scandinavian vehemence of treatment. These works are 165 in number. Had they been executed with any degree of right deliberation, in the colours of any century from the 4th to the 13th, the MS. would have been by far the most valuable in existence. It is not that they are unskilful, but the artist seems always to have been distracted by the effort to catch fleeting fancies, to secure one in any form before another chased it away. In several instances the spaces allowed him by the scribe have not been sufficient. They are left across the whole page, cutting the triple columns of text; but the illustrations sometimes entrench upon it, as in the 147th and 148th Psalms, given in Professor Westwood's facsimile. (Anglo-Saxon and Irish MSS. pl. xxix. and text pp. 15, 16.) The present writer, however, is not disposed to infer from this that these drawings are copied from some earlier MS. They are too original, too inventive, and too unconventional; and, to his apprehension, bear the stamp of a single mind as decidedly as the drawings of Rabula, the Syrian, in the great MS. of the Laurentian Library at Florence.

This MS. was compared, in the first instance, with two others which strongly resemble it. All three must have been copied from some earlier and unknown original; or else, the other two from the Utrecht Psalter. These two are the Harleian Psalter and the Psalter of Eadwine; and they possess the admitted characteristics of Anglo-Saxon work, which are by no means diminished by the presence of ideas drawn from classical sources, and represented according to classical models. For there was so much copying of Graeco-Roman, or classical work, in the scriptoria, that it would seem that late subjects in the pictures prove their recent origin more forcibly than ancient subjects prove their antiquity. The frontispiece and the first page contain difficulties which are repeated throughout the MS. In the first there is a Sun and Moon, the first apparently a human figure seated within an orb, the other a crescent only. David sits below in a round classical temple, with convex vault and a fleur-de-lys finial. An angel dictates to him, in drapery with edges frittered away in the true Anglo-Saxon flutter (see plates xxxii., xlii., xlvi. Anglo-Saxon and Irish MSS.). Opposite him is the representative of the Evil King, or Tyrant, under a regular pediment, on a massive chair, with round arches carved at back, and holding a decidedly northern double-edged sword. He has a toga, with fibula; the capitals of the columns above him and David alike, are convex Byzantine, like some in the Stones of Venice, evidently variations of the composite order. There is a well-sketched river-god below, a tree not unlike those in the Paradise of the Vienna Codex Geneseos, and a Hell, into which the Tyrant's guards seem to be hooked and driven. The presence of about 18 hells in the first half of the MS. is certainly much against its pictures being of early date.

The Utrecht Psalter should be compared with the two pages given in Shaw's Dresses and Decorations of the Middle Ages, from the 11th century Anglo-Saxon Calendar (from Cottonian, Julius A 6), and with the 9th or 10th century Prudentius. The likeness of the drawing, especially in the drapery, and the Saxon tightness of legs in so many of the figures, is very striking. Again, in our woodcut from the psalter of Athelstan will be observed the oval or elypeate glory, on its way of transition from the Roman Imago Clipeata to the Vesica of the early Renaissance. This occurs very frequently in the Utrecht Psalter, and will be found in Westwood, plate xxix., but it is rather transitional than classical. Other features indicating lateness of date are the Saxon javelins, some with apparent banderols; the absence of anything like a labarum or cross-vexillum; the long northern trumpets; the organ at Ps. cl. fol. 163; the extraordinary number of devils, often with tridents, passim; and particularly the great monster-mouth of hell, which is certainly late in Christian art, though it may possibly be derived, as an idea, from the roaring mouth in Plato's Phaedrus.

Some of the classical features have been noticed, but besides them there will be found an Athla, fol. xlvii. v; the Three Fates, fol. 84 r, very well drawn; a zodiac, sun and moon, Ps. 65; a warrior in a Phrygian helmet, fol. xiii. 5; the very classical representations of water, fol. lxxxviii. v. (with griffins); the sun and moon; the double pipes, in fol. xvii. v.; and the chariot of God with four horses, seen in front view, Ps. lxxii. A Crucifixion occurs at fol. 67. (See ORGAN; RESURRECTION; SATAN; SERPENT.)

The palaeographical controversy places its date between the 6th and 9th century, and extends far beyond our limits; but it may be permitted to the author of this article, as a landscapist fairly well acquainted with the scenery of Egypt and Syria, to express his inability to see anything in the least resembling it in the Utrecht Psalter. He cannot find anything like a palm, which no Alexandrian could have omitted; nor like an olive, which is the forest-tree (so to speak) of Syria.

The literature of the Utrecht Psalter is very extensive, but the principal works relating to the MS. itself are as follows: Her Kists, Archief voor Kerkelijke Geschiedenis van Nederland, vol. iv. (Leyden, 1833); the Baron van Westreenen's Investigations, also in the Archief; Professor Westwood's account in Anglo-Saxon and Irish MSS. p. 14; Sir Thomas Duffus Hardy, The Athanasian Creed in Connexion with the Utrecht Psalter, being a Report to the Right Hon. Lord Romilly, Master of the Rolls, on a MS. in the University of Utrecht, completed Dec. 1872; the Report addressed to the Trustees of the British Museum on the Age of the MS. by E. A. Bond, E. M. Thompson, Rev. H. O. Coxe, Rev. S. S. Lewis, Sir M. Digby Wyatt, Prof. Westwood, F. H. Dickinson, and Prof. Swainson; with a preface by A. P. Stanley, D.D. Dean of Westminster, 1874; Sir Duffus Hardy's reply, Further Report on the Utrecht Psalter, also in 1874; and, finally, the excellent History, Art, and Palaeography of the Utrecht Psalter, by Walter De Gray Birch, F.R.S.L.

[R. St. J. T.]

MINISEUS, martyr with Tisicus; commemorated at Laodicea July 23 (Hieron. Mart.; Boll. Acta SS. July, v. 589).

[C. H.]

MINISTER. 1. A name frequently given to inferior clergy, in contradistinction to the order or orders above them. Thus Lactantius speaks of "presbyteri et ministri," using the latter word to designate all ranks of clergy below the presbyterate. In the title of the 18th canon of Eliberis the words "sacerdotes et ministri" are used as equivalent to "presbyteres et diacones" in the body of the canon. In the title of can. 33, on the other hand, "ministri" are all the clergy below the rank of bishop. In I. Tours, c. 1, "sacerdotes et ministri ecclesiae" are the whole body of the clergy of the church; where we are probably to understand by "sacerdotes," priests, "ministri" including the other orders. Compare ORDERS, HOLY.

2. Bishops frequently use the term "minister ecclesiae," in subscriptions, as "Ego N. Carnotensis ecclesiae minister," or "Ego M. . . Sanctae Meldensis ecclesiae humilis minister."

3. "Minister altaris" is sometimes used as equivalent to "priest."

4. Archdeacons and archpresbyters are sometimes spoken of as "ministri episcoporum." [C.]

MINISTERIALIS or MINISTRALIS. (1) Ministerialis Calix is the chalice used for administering the consecrated wine to the faithful, which was often distinct from that used by the priest in the act of consecration.

(2) Ministerialis liber is an office-book, especially an altar-book.

(3) Pope Hilary is said (Liber Pontificalis in Vit. Hil.) to have appointed in Rome "ministrales qui circuirent constitutas stationes;" that is, clergy who should perform the sacred offices in the several churches of Rome where STATIONS were held. [C.]

MINISTERIUM. The vessels and other articles used in the ministry of the altar are called collectively "ministeria sacra." Thus Pope Sixtus (according to the Liber Pontificalis) "constituit ut ministeria sacra non tangeruntur nisi a ministris sacratis." Pope Urban I., according to Walafrid Strabo (de Reb. Eccl. c. 24), "omnia ministeria sacra fecit argentea."

The word is also used for the Credence-table, on which the vessels were set before they were placed on the altar. (Ducange, s. v.) [C.]

MINISTRA. When Pliny in his well-known letter (Epist. x. 97) speaks of two female servants or attendants, called ministrae, whom he thought it necessary to put to torture, we see that even in those days the word designated an office-bearer in the church; nor is there any reason to doubt that it is used as equivalent to the Greek διάκονος (Rom. xvi. 1). See DEACONESS. [C.]

MINISTRALIS. [MINISTERIALIS.]

MINISTRY. [ORDERS, HOLY.]

MIRACLE-WORKING. We find a great number of allusions in early times to this pretension, generally made by the founders of new sects. Simon Magus (Acts xiii. 9) was apparently the first of this class of persons to come into collision with the gospel. Another instance is recorded in xix. 13–16, in connexion with the so-called exorcists in Ephesus. The Clementine Recognitions (lib. ii. n. 9), a work of the third century, introduces him as describing himself thus: "I am able to disappear from those who would apprehend me, and, again, I can appear when I please; when I am minded to fly, I can pass through mountains and stones, as through the mire; when I cast myself headlong from a precipice, I am carried as if I were sailing to the earth without harm; when I am bound I can loose myself, and bind them that bound me: when I am close shut up in prison, I can cause the doors to open of their own accord; I can give life to statues and make them appear as living men," etc., etc. Tertullian remarks that Simon Magus, for these juggling tricks and pretended miracles, was anathematized by the apostles and excommunicated; and that such was the invariable rule with regard to this class of men—"et alter Magus qui cum Sergio Paulo, quoniam iisdem adversabatur apostolis, luminum amissione multatus est. Hoc et astrologi retulissent, credo, si quis in apostolos incidisset. Attamen cum Magia punitur, cujus est species astrologia, utique et species in genere damnatur. Post Evangelium nusquam invenias aut sophistas, aut Chaldaeos, aut incantatores, aut conjectores aut Magos, nisi plane punitos" (De Idololatriâ, cap. ix.). The whole treatise is very interesting, and full of information upon this subject. It was written long before the author's lapse into Montanism, and it is singular that the Montanists were among the worst offenders in this pretence to supernatural powers. Eusebius (Eccles. Hist. lib. v. cap. 16) quotes the authority of Apollinaris for his description of their pretended miracles, and relates that they were expelled from communion as being actuated by demons. It was the habit in the early church to refer all this class of impostures, even when recognised clearly as frauds, to diabolical influence. Thus Firmilian, bishop of Caesarea, in Cappadocia, writes to Cyprian (Ep. lxxv.), mentioning the case of a woman who counterfeited ecstasies and pretended to prophesy, performed many marvels—"mirabilia quaedam portentosa perficiens"—and boasted that she would cause an earthquake. This woman, he proceeds to say, after having deceived a presbyter, named Rusticus, a deacon, and many lay people, was subjected to exorcism, and so shewn to be a cheat, instead of a person sacredly inspired—"ille exorcista inspiratus Dei gratiâ fortiter restitit, et esse illum nequissimum spiritum, qui prius sanctus putabatur ostendit"—apparently regarding the woman as merely a passive agent; and yet, in the very next sentence, he speaks of her deceiving by "praestigias et fallacias daemonis," and of her assuming to minister the sacraments, and such like. The view taken by the church of such persons was, in fact, not invariably the same. Cases in which the free will of the sufferer was apparently overborne by malign influences from without (obsession), were classed as Δαιμονιζόμενοι (energumens), i.e. possessed, and placed under the care of exorcists. They were regarded as objects of pity, and incurred no censure from the church, being permitted to receive the holy communion as soon as their recovery was made manifest by a time of probation among the audientes. But where it was considered evident that the will of the person in question was in league and co-operative with the evil spiritual influence, i.e. in cases of the claim to working of miracles, found in conjunction with dissoluteness of life, or with heretical teaching, these were treated as involving the most grievous criminality, and punished with the greatest severity. Thus the canons of St. Basil appoint the same punishment for one who confesses himself guilty of sorcery (γοητεία) as for a murderer, i.e. twenty years' penitence. Τὸν γοητείαν ἐξαγορεύοντα τοῦ φονέως χρόνον ἐξομολογεῖσθαι (can. 65). St. Augustine, in his treatise on Heresies, adduces various instances similar to that mentioned above (De Haeres. capp. 23, 26).

We find traces of this practice in more than one passage of the New Testament. Thus, in 2 Tim. iii. 13, πονηροὶ δὲ ἄνθρωποι καὶ γόητες προκόψουσιν ἐπὶ τὸ χεῖρον, πλανῶντες καὶ πλανώμενοι; where we see the connexion pointed out above (1) between forbidden arts and moral depravity, and (2) between the same arts and false teaching. Also, 2 Thess. ii. 9, where exactly the same view is taken, κατ' ἐνέργειαν τοῦ Σατανᾶ ἐν πάσῃ δυνάμει καὶ σημείοις καὶ τέρασι ψεύδους—in which passage it seems probable that the apostle was speaking of a future whose distinctive forces and tendencies were visible and powerful even in his own time. Theodoret, commenting upon this passage, says: Οὐκ ἀληθῆ θαύματα ποιοῦσι οἱ ἀπὸ τῶν ψήφων τὰς ἐπωνυμίας ἔχοντες; and, similarly, St. Athanasius, Οἱ λεγόμενοι ψηφάδες καὶ πάλιν αὐτὸς ὁ ἀντίχριστος ἐρχόμενος, ἐν φαντασίᾳ πλανᾷ τοὺς ὀφθαλμοὺς τῶν ἀνθρώπων (Quaest. 124. ad Antioch.). The great number of laws against the professors of this art are an indication of the favour which it met with among the masses of the Roman population. They may be consulted in Cod. Just. lib. ix. tit. 18, De Maleficis; and Anianus remarks upon a law of Theodosius under this title, "malefici vel incantatores vel immissores tempestatum;" and the Speculum Saxonicum, lib. ii. art. 13, par. 6, classes the pursuit of magic with apostasy and poisoning: "Si quis Christianus—apostataverit, vel venenum alicui ministraverit, aut incantaverit," etc. (quoted by Ducange). MIRIAM. [MARIA, (18).]

MISAEL. [MISHAEL.]

MISERERE. (1) The 51st [Vulg. 50th] Psalm, from its first word in the Vulgate translation. This psalm, as an expression of the deepest humiliation and contrition, is used especially in times of sadness; in the communion of the sick and the burial of the dead both in East and West, and also in the office for penitents and in the office for the dying in the East.

(2) By Miserere we also understand a service for times of humiliation, in which the chanting of the 51st Psalm forms a prominent part. Suitable music for this office has been written by various composers, but the most famous is that of Gregorio Allegri († 1640), which is sung yearly at Rome in the Sistine chapel on the Wednesday and Friday in Holy Week. MISSA, martyr; commemorated in Africa Dec. 5 (Hieron. Mart.). [C. H.]

MISSA, whence the English "mass," in ecclesiastical usage originally meant the dismissal of the congregation. In later Latin this word was equivalent to missio, as remissa to remissio. Compare ascensa = ascensio, accessa = accessio, collecta = collectio, confessa = confessio, and many others. There appears to have been a custom of dismissing assemblies, whether civil or religious, by proclaiming the words, "Missa est." Thus Avitus archbishop of Vienne, A.D. 490: "In churches, and palaces, and judgment-halls the dismissal (missa) is proclaimed to take place, when the people are dismissed from attendance" (Epist. i.; Migne, lix. 189). Two references in Ducange shew that the word was borrowed by the Greeks for the same use, at least in secular places of assembly. Thus Luitprand (de Reb. per Europ. Gestis, v. 9) says that at Constantinople it was the "custom for the palace to be open to all soon after the early morning, but after the third hour of the day to forbid entrance to every one until the ninth, all being sent out by a signal given, which is mis." In the Chronicon Paschale Alex. it is said that Justinian, in 532, when the sedition of the factions broke out, "gave missae (ἔδωκε μίσσας) to those belonging to the palace, and said to the senators, 'Depart every one to guard his own house'" (p. 624, ed. Niebuhr).

II. Missa Catechumenorum. The word missa was used in the church in reference to the dismissal of the catechumens. Thus, by the Council of Carthage, 398: "That the bishop forbid no one to enter the church and hear the word of God, be he Gentile, or heretic, or Jew, until the dismissal (missam) of the catechumens" (can. 84). St. Augustine, about the same time: "Take notice, after the sermon the dismissal (missa) of the catechumens takes place: the faithful will remain" (Serm. 49, c. 8). Cassian, A.D. 424, speaks of one who was overheard while alone to preach a sermon, and then to "give out the dismissal of the catechumens (celebrare catechumenis missam), as the deacon does" (Coenob. Institt. xi. 15). The council of Valentia, 524: "That the gospels.....be read before the mass (missam) of the catechumens" (can. 1). The Council of Lerida in the same year decreed that persons living in incest should be allowed to remain in church only to the mass (missam) of the catechumens" (can. 4). The formula of dismissal in the Latin church was in their case, "If there be any catechumen here, let him go out" (Scudamore's Notitia Eucharistica, p. 336, ed. 2). There is no reason for thinking that they were anywhere warned out by the words which from the 8th century at least (Ordo Rom. i. 21, 24; ii. 15; Mus. Ital. ii.) have been used at the dismissal of the communicants, viz. "Ite, missa est." In the Mozarabic rite, on the Wednesdays in Lent, the priest or deacon addressed the penitents after their last prayer—"Stand in your places for the dismissal (ad missam)" (Miss. Mozar., Leslie, 99). So long as there were catechumens these words were doubtless intended for them also, each class was to remain in its proper place until the notice to go was given.

Isidore of Seville, who used the Mozarabic liturgy, writing in 636, says, "The missa is in the time of the sacrifice, when the catechumens are sent out; the Levite crying, 'If any catechumen has been left, let him go out;' and thence the missa, because they may not be present at the sacraments of the altar" (Orig. vi. 19). The explanation appears to be that, the more ignorant, hearing of the missa, imagined that it meant, not the dismissal of the non-communicating classes, but the service from which they were excluded. The popular usage, thus founded upon error, though essentially improper, seems to have been early, if slowly, followed by the clergy. The first instance occurs in a letter in which St. Ambrose describes an event then quite recent, which occurred on Palm Sunday, 385: "After the reading [of the eucharistic lessons] and the sermon, the catechumens being dismissed," an interruption occurred, after an account of which he adds, "nevertheless, I continued in my duty, I began to perform mass (missam facere). While I am offering I am made aware," &c. (Epist. 20, § 4). The next is in the 3rd canon of the council of Carthage, A.D. 390, which forbids presbyters to reconcile penitents "in publica missa." Leo, in 445, expressed himself against the "custom of a single mass" in small churches on festivals, at which more desired to be present "than the church would hold at once" (Epist. xi. 2). Caesarius of Arles, A.D. 502, used the word freely, but in the plural, from which we should gather that the usage was still unsettled:—"If you observe carefully, you will see that the missae do not take place when the divine lessons are recited in church, but when the gifts are offered, and the body and blood of the Lord are consecrated" (Serm. 80, § 2. Comp. 81, § 1). Cassiodorus, 514, in Italy: "The celebration of holy masses" (Expos. Ps. 25, v. 7); and again, "Missarum ordo completus est" (Ps. 33, concl.), where he means the order of the eucharistic office. The plural is used by Gregory of Tours, 573, as "expletis missis" (De Mir. S. Mart. ii. 47), "dictis missis" (De Glor. Mart. 54), etc., and by others. The idiom may have arisen from a rubric in the Gregorian Sacramentary, in an early copy of which the order for Good Friday ends thus—"Then let him (the priest) communicate, and all the clergy; and let the dismissals take place (fiant missae)" (Pamel. Lit. SS. PP. L. ii. 257). Gregory I. himself, 590, commonly uses the phrase solemnia missarum (Epist. iv. 44, vi. 17, vii. 29). The variety of usage continued to the end of our period. E.g. in the 7th century the Council of Toledo, A.D. 646, uses both missas (can. 2) and missam (3); that of Autun, 670, has "a missa suspendere" (can. 11); that of Braga, 675, solemnia missarum (can. 4); that of Toledo, 694, missa pro requie (can. 5). In the 8th, the Ordo Romanus, about 730, has missarum solemnia (§ 19, Mus. Ital., Mabill. tom. ii.), missa (24, 25, 26, 28, 30), and missae (22, 25, 26, 28, 46). The Council of Aix, 789, uses missa (can. 6), that of Frankfort, 794, solemnia missarum (can. 50). In the 1st capitulary of Theodulf of Orleans, 797, we have missa (cc. 5, 6) and solemnia missarum (cc. 4, 11, 46). The second council of Châlons (sur-Saône), 813, uses solemnitates (can. 39) and solemnia (60) missarum.

III. That part of the service at which communicants alone were present has been long distinguished from the Missa Catechumenorum by the name of Missa Fidelium. It was not so called, however, within the first nine centuries. In the following passage from Florus of Lyons, A.D. 837, the phrase means the dismissal of the communicants: "Tunc enim (sc. post evangelii lectionem) clamante diacono, iidem catechumeni mittebantur; id est, dimittebantur foras. Missa ergo catechumenorum fiebat ante actionem sacramentorum: Missa fidelium fit post confectionem et participationem" (Expos. missae, § 92 in fine). The service from which the catechumens were excluded was also very frequently called missa sacramentorum; but we are unable to find examples earlier than the 11th century (see Sala in Bona, Rer. Lit. ii., viii. 1).

IV. The breaking up of a congregation of monks after their offices was also called missa. Thus Cassian says that among the monks of the east one who came late to prayer had to "wait, standing before the door, for the missa of the whole assembly" (Instit. iii. 7). So again, ii. 7, "Celeritatem missae;" iii. 5, "Missa canonica;" 8, "Vigiliarum missae." Similarly, St. Benedict, when settling the number of psalms to be said at each office, as, e.g. at matins: "But after the three psalms are finished, let one lesson be read, a verse and kyrie eleison; et missae fiant" (cap. 17). The reader will observe the plural, as in the Gregorian Sacramentary.

V. In the liturgy of Gothic Spain (Missale Mozar., Leslie, 8, 11, et passim) missa is the name of an address to the communicants (= the Gallican Preface), corresponding in position to our exhortation. "Dearly beloved in the Lord." The origin of this usage is clear. The departure of the non-communicating classes is now followed by an anthem (sacrificium = the Roman "offertory"), and that by the word missa, which now appears as a heading prefixed to the address. Before the introduction of the anthem (Notitia Eucharistica, p. 342, ed. 2) the word would follow immediately the proclamation, "State locis vestris ad Missam," and would simply indicate that the "missa" or dismissal of the penitents and catechumens then took place. When those classes of worshippers ceased to exist, it was naturally supposed that the word was the name of the formulary that followed it. The address now called missa is by St. Isidore of Seville, A.D. 610, called "Oratio admonitionis erga populum" (De Div. Off. i. 15), from which we should infer that missa retained its original meaning in the Spanish liturgy in his time. A Gallican preface in the sacramentary found at Bobio (which for convenience we shall call the Besançon Sacramentary, as it appears to have belonged to that province) is inscribed, "Missa Dominicalis" (Mus. Ital. i. 373); but as no other instance occurs in the Gallican liturgies this may be a clerical error.

VI. Portions of the daily offices were also called missae, probably because at the end of each a monk, might, on sufficient cause, obtain leave to withdraw. (1.) Thus, in the Rule of Isidore, compiled in 620: "In the daily offices of vigils the three canonical psalms are first to be said, then three missae of psalms, a fourth of canticles, a fifth of the matin offices. But on Sundays and feasts of martyrs let their several missae be added, on account of the solemnity" (Reg. 7; Holsten. ii. 208). The missae psalmorum here are psalms sung in addition to the "canonical" numbers. In another Spanish Rule, that of Fructuosus, the founder of the great monastery at Alcalá (Complutum), the psalms are called missae absolutely: "In the courses for the nights of Saturday and Sunday . . . let the vigils be celebrated with six missae each, with six responsories, that the solemnity of the Lord's resurrection may be more honoured by the greater amount of psalmody in the offices" (cap. 3; Holst. ii. 234). (2.) The above usage, seemingly peculiar to Spain, has been confounded with that of France, where the missae of an office clearly meant the lessons. Thus, in the rule of Caesarius of Arles, A.D. 502: "Every Sunday observe six missae. For the first missae let (the history of) the resurrection be always read. . . . . When the missae are finished, say the matin (psalms) in monotone, Exaltabo Te," etc. (cap. 21; ibid. 92). Sim. in the rule of Aurelian, also of Arles, 550: "On Christmas day observe six missae from the prophet Isaiah. . . . . So on the Epiphany . . . . observe six missae from the prophet Daniel . . . . . Every Lord's day after nocturns, when the first missa, i.e. the resurrection, is being read, let no one presume to sit, but all stand" (Ordo Regulae suffix. u.s. p. 112). Again: "On the feasts of martyrs, let three or four missae be observed. Read the first missa from the gospel, the rest from the passions of the martyrs" (Ordo Regulae Virg. suff. Holst. ii. 72; Sim. c. 38).

VII. The daily offices were themselves called missae, as by the council of Agde in 506: "At the end of the morning and evening missae (i.e. of matins and vespers, as Dupin and others understand it), after the hymns, let little chapters from the Psalms be said" (can. 30). Hence much later the phrase "missal office" is used for "matins;" "The church in which both the evening and morning or missal office, is performed" (De Gest. Aldrici, xx.; Baluz. Miscell. ed. Mansi, i. 90).

VIII. During the latter part of the first liturgical period, at least, the prayers to be inserted in the liturgy as proper to a given day or object were collected under the common title of Orationes, or Orationes et Preces. Many instances survive both in the Gelasian and Gregorian sacramentaries. For the former, see Lit. Rom. Vet. Muratori, i. 493, 7; 504, 5, 8, etc.; and for the latter, ibid. ii. 54, 65, 7, etc. Four such groups of prayers in the missal of the Franks are headed respectively, "Orationes et Preces pro Regibus," "Orat. et Preces in Natali S. Helarii," "Orat. et Prec. unius Martyris," and "Orat. et Preces communes cotidianae cum Canone" (Lit. Gall. 316–322). At a later period these sets of proper prayers were collectively called missae. The word is not used thus in the Leonian Sacramentary, nor in all the copies of the Gregorian. In the former, each group is headed by the name of the day only, or where there are more than one for the same day by the words, "Item aliae." In one of the earliest of the Gregorian, that published by Pamelius, Missa does not occur in this sense. Sometimes we have "ad missam" after the name of the day (Rituale, SS. PP. ii. 250, 312, etc.). It is common, however, as a title in the other copies, as Missa pro Regibus (Murat. Liturg. Rom. Vet. ii. 187), Missa Votiva (ibid. 193, etc.), Missa pro Peste animalium, Missa in Contentione (Codex Vatic. opp St. Greg. v. 215, 6), etc.; and in the only extant copy of the Gelasian, made in the 8th century, as Missa in Monasterio (Murat. i. 719), Missa contra Judices male agentes (ibid. 732), etc. The usage probably came from France; for the word is employed in this sense in the Gothico-Gallican missal (e.g. Missa in Sancto Die Epiphaniae, Lit. Gall. 208, Missa in Symboli Traditione, 235; and sim. passim), the Frankish (but only in "Item alia Missa," the equivalent of "Orat. et Prec." ibid. 323–5), and the Vetus Gallicanum (e. g. Missa de Adventu Domini nostri Jesu Christi, ibid. 333, etc.) of Thomasius and Mabillon, not one of which is later than the 8th century, and in the Besançon Sacramentary (e.g. Missa in Natale Domini, Mus. Ital. i. 290; Missa in Epyphania, 296, etc.), which was written in the 7th. The word is not once employed in this manner in the liturgy of Milan (Pamel. tom. i.), but we find it in Spain in the later parts of the Mozarabic Missal (Leslie, 428, 434, etc.), and most probably in the 13th canon of the fourth council of Toledo, A.D. 633, when, defending hymns of human composition, it says, "Componuntur ergo hymni, sicut componuntur Missae, sive preces, vel orationes," etc. As there was still a dismissal of penitents, and probably of catechumens, in Spain in the 7th century, we cannot think that the word had yet acquired that other special meaning peculiar to Spain mentioned above in § v. When Gregory of Tours (Hist. Franc. vi. 46) says that Chilperic, who died in 584, attempted certain "opuscula vel hymnos, sive Missas," the word is understood in the above sense.

The composition of these collective Missae varies greatly in the several liturgies.

(1.) The Roman Missa. This has (a) the Oratio, which answers to our collect for the day; (b) the (Oratio) super Oblata, or Secreta. This was for the acceptance of the oblations; but when they came to consist of the elements only, their intended use often so coloured this prayer as to make it inappropriate before their consecration. See Notitia Eucharistic, 419, 2nd ed. It was called Secreta, "because said secretly" (Amalarius, de Off. Eccl. iii. 20). (c) The proper Preface.—This began with a constant formulary, Vere dignum et justum est, aequum et salutare (whence the English, "It is very meet, right, and our bounden duty"). See Lit. Rom. Vet. Murat. i. 293, 5, 6, etc. (Sacram. Leon.); 494, 5, 6, etc. (Sacr. Gel.); ii. 8, 9, 10, etc. (Sacr. Greg.). Proper Prefaces were very numerous in the early sacramentaries. At the end of one MS. printed by Muratori (u. s. ii. 273) there is a collection of 72 (Codex Vatic., while in another we may count no less than 220 (Cod. Ottobon. ibid. 291). By the 11th century these were reduced to 11 (Not. Euch. 538). (d)

One division of the Roman canon begins thus, "Communicantes et memoriam venerantes in primis gloriosæ semper Virginis Mariæ," etc. Variations of this proper for certain seasons occur in the Gelasian and Gregorian Sacramentaries, but not in the Leonian. In the Gelasian they are generally headed "Infra Actionem" (Murat. u. s. i. 496, 553, 5, 572, etc.), but once "Infra Canonem" (ibid. 559). The following example is the formula for Maundy Thursday in that sacramentary: "Communicantes, et diem sacratissimum celebrantes; quo traditus est Dominus noster Jesus Christus. Sed et memoriam," etc. (Murat. i. 553). Other forms are provided for Christmas, Easter, Ascension Day, Whitsunday. (c) A prayer which forms part of the canon begins thus, "Hanc igitur oblationem servitutis nostræ," etc. This also is varied in the Gelasian and Gregorian sacramentaries for seasons and occasions, as for Maundy Thursday (i. 553, ii. 55), Easter (i. 572, ii. 67), Whitsuntide (i. 601, ii. 90), for the dedication of a church (i. 613), or font (618), etc. It is also headed "Infra Actionem" (i. 553, 572, etc.). In the Gelasian Missæ pro Scrutinio this prayer becomes a petition for the Competentes, and is followed by the recital of their names and another act of intercession for them, viz., "Hos, Domine, fonte baptismatis innovandos Spiritus Tui munere ad sacramentorum tuorum plenitudinem poscimus præparari. Per." (Murat. u. s. i. 522). In an earlier part of the canon ("Infra Canonem") a prayer for the sponsors is also interpolated, viz. after the words "Memento, Domine, famulorum famularumque tuarum" (ibid.). A special "Hanc igitur oblationem" was almost an essential part of masses for the dead (Gelas. u. s. i. 752–762; Greg. ii. 218–222), and was inserted in many votive masses (Gelas. i. 703, 719, 720, 4, 6, etc.; Greg. ii. 188, 193, 5, 200). (f) The (Oratio) ad Complendum, post Communionem, or ad Communionem (see the Sacramentaries in Lit. Lat. Vetus, Murat. passim). This was properly a thanksgiving after the reception, such as we find in every liturgy, and probably came from the earliest period. "When that great sacrament has been partaken of," says St. Augustine, "a thanksgiving concludes all" (Epist. 149, § 16). (g) Ad Populum (Sacram. Gelas. Murat. u. s. i. 495, 6, 8, etc.), or Super Populum (Sacram. Greg. ibid. ii. 23, 8, 9, etc.), is the heading of a final benediction found only in some missæ, especially in those for Lent. The Leonian Sacramentary has no headings, but several such benedictions may be distinguished in it; e. g., Protector (Murat. u. s. i. 297), Non præjudicet (ibid. 298), Tuere (ibid.), etc. The following is one example: "Super populum Tuam, Domine, quæsumus, benedictio copiosa descendat; indulgentia veniat; consolatio tribuatur: fides sancta succrescat: redemptio sempiterna firmetur. Per" (Sacr. Leon. Murat. i. 482). In the Romanizing parts of the Missale Francorum this collect is headed "Ad Plebem" (Lit. Gall. Mabill. 323, 5).

(2.) The Milanese Missæ. (a) The collect for the day under the name of (Oratio) Super Populum (Pamel. Liturgicon, i. 293, et passim). This was originally said before the Gloria in Excelsis (ibid.), which, followed by the Kyrie, preceded the Prophecy and other lessons. It is now said after the Kyrie (Martene, de Ant. Rit. Eccl. i. iv. xii. 3). (b) The (Oratio) Super Sindonem. The sindon is the "fair white linen cloth" of the English rubric. It was spread over the altar after the gospel, and this prayer was said over it. The following example is for the eve of the Epiphany: "Adesto, Domine, supplicationibus nostris, et populo Tuo, quem Tibi ex omnibus gentibus elegisti, veritatis Tuæ lumen ostende. Per Dominum" (ibid. 314). (c) The (Oratio) Super Oblata. This has the same intention as the Roman Secreta. Before the creed was brought into the liturgy, it always followed the offertory anthem (offerenda), and this is obviously its right place; but now on Sundays and other feasts the creed intervenes, and very awkwardly. See Pamel. u. s. Martene, u. s. (d) The Preface corresponds closely to that of the Roman Sacramentaries. One is provided for every holyday. (e) In the Missa pro Baptizatis on Easter Eve a prayer is inserted "Infra Actionem," i. e. in the canon, in which the celebration is expressly declared to be on their behalf: "Hoc paschale sacrificium Tibi offerimus pro his quos ex aquâ et Spiritu sancto regenerare dignatus es" (353). In the Missa for Maundy Thursday (349) there is a variation of the Communicantes bearing on the institution of the sacrament, and a prayer to be inserted "Post Orationem Sacerdotis pro seipso," i. e. after the "Nobis quoque minimis et peccatoribus." These, if we mistake not, are the only proper additions infra canonem admitted by this liturgy. (f) Another interpolation peculiar to the Missa for Maundy Thursday is the Oratio post Confractorium. This also refers to the institution. It begins thus: "Ipsius præceptum est, Domine, quod agimus, in cujus nunc Te præsentiâ postulamus." (g) The (Oratio) Post Communionem corresponds to the Roman formulary, called Ad Complendum in the Gregorian, but more frequently Post Communionem in the Gelasian Sacramentary.

(3.) The Gallican Missa. (a) In the Gallican church the song of Zacharias was chanted after the Kyrie at the beginning of the service except in Lent (St. Germanus, Expos. Brev. in Martene, de Rit. Eccl. Ant. i. iv. iv. 1). It was called "the Prophecy" (Germ. ibid.), and was followed by a prayer, Collectio (Miss. Goth. in Liturg. Gall. Mabill. 190, 251, etc.) or Oratio (Sacram. Gallic. in Mus. Ital. i. 285) post Prophetiam, which was generally based on it, or contained at least some allusion to it. Three of those extant (Miss. Franc. Lit. Gall. 322, 4, 5) do not exhibit the connexion with the canticle, being borrowed from the Roman sacramentaries. The first two are the originals of our Collects for the 6th and 11th Sundays after Trinity. One example occurs in the Reichenau Fragment (Neale and Forbes, Gall. Lit. 6; see also 28). (b) The Eucharistic litany of the West went conventionally by the name of preces (Not. Euch. 301). From Germanus (u. s.) we learn that in the Gallican church the preces were said after the lessons and homily. In several Missæ we have a Collectio post Precem (after the Collectio post Prophetiam), which can only be referred to the litany, and the general character of these collects corresponds to that position. In the Besançon sacramentary they are headed "Oratio post Precem." (Mus. It. i. 282), ex.: "O Lord God, who art both justly angry with Thy people and merciful to forgive them, incline Thine ear to our supplications that we who confess Thee with our entire affections may obtain not Thy judgment but Thy pardon" (ibid.). (c) The Praefatio Missae. This is, properly, a short address to the communicants on the sacred event commemorated in the Missa. It was delivered when the catechumens had left. Examples of such addresses are found in the Missale Gothicum (Lit. Gall. 190, 3, 6, 204, etc.), Gallicanum Vetus (329), and the Besançon Sacramentary (Mus. Ital. i. 290, 4, 5, 6, etc.), and the Reichenau Fragment (u. s. 20), but in very many instances they have been changed into or superseded by direct prayers (Goth. u. s. 198, 225, etc.; Gall. Vet. 333, 4, etc.; Sacr. Gall. Mus. It. 284, 9, etc.; Miss. Richen. u. s. 21). (d) The Preface was followed by a collect which had reference to the same subject. In the Missale Gothicum (u. s. 191, 4, 7, etc.) this is generally headed Collectio sequitur. In the Missal of the Franks the Praefatio (itself become a collect) and its collectio appear together under the common heading of Ante Nomina (Lit. Gall. 322, 4, 5), which indicates that they are said before the offertory and the recital of the nomina of those for whom prayer was made. These collects are Gregorian (among them are ours for the 1st, 4th, 7th, and 10th Sundays after Trinity), a fact which, with many others, suggests the influence under which the older Gallican forms were given up. (e) After the recital of the names the prayer Collectio post Nomina was said. This properly had two objects. It was a prayer for the acceptance of the gifts (so far corresponding to the Roman Super Oblata), and an act of intercession for both living and dead. E. g. "Suscipe . . . sacrificium laudis oblatum . . . Nomina quorum sunt recitatione complexa scribi jubeas in aeternitate" (Goth. u. s. 191); "Auditis nominibus offerentium, fratres dilectissimi, Christum Dominum deprecemur, . . . ut haec sacrificia sic viventibus proficiant ad emendationem ut defunctis opitulentur ad requiem" (ibid. 201). A collect of this character is also found under the same title in the Missae of the Missale Gall. Vetus, u. s. 329, 333, 4, etc.), and of the Reichenau Fragment (Neale and Forbes, u. s. 2, 5, 9, etc.). In the Besançon sacramentary, which admits the Roman canon, the name is retained, but the Gallican collect is supplanted by a Roman (Mus. It. i. 279, 284, 6, 7, etc.). In the Frankish Missal both name and thing are gone, and the Roman "Super Oblata" appears under its proper title (Lit. Gall. 310, 7, 8, 9, etc.). (f) The Collectio ad Pacem came next, a prayer said when the kiss of peace was given. It is properly a prayer for charity and peace, and collects to this effect appear under the name in M. Goth. (u. s. 188, 191, 4, 7, etc.), in M. Gall. Vet. (ibid. 330, 3, 4, 365), and in Miss. Richen. (u. s. 6, 10, 22, 29). In the M. Franc. the name is suppressed and Roman collects, with no reference in them to charity or peace, are substituted (Lit. Gall. 317, 8, 320, etc.). The true Gallican collect has almost equally disappeared from the Romanizing Besançon sacramentary, but the name has been left (Mus. It. i. 279, 284, 9, etc.). One true example from the last-named book will serve as a specimen of all: "Cause, O good Jesu, Thy peace to glide into our hearts, in which is the fulness of love. Grant, O Lord, that we may ever preserve in spiritual affection that peace, which we now express with the mouth" (286). (g) The peace and its prayer were followed by the Sursum Corda, leading up to the Contestatio or Immolatio; for these were the names given to that which in the English and Roman books is called the Preface. It began with the words, "Vere dignum et justum est," or "Vere aequum et justum est" (Lit. Gall. 191, 197), and probably received the former name from the assent which the priest gives in them to the witness of the people, "Dignum et justum est." It probably acquired the name of Immolatio (which may be considered equivalent to the ἀναφορά (St. Mark's Lit. Renaud. 1, 144) or προσκομιδή (St. Basil Alex. 64; St. Greg. A. 99) of the Greek liturgies in rubrics immediately preceding or following the same formulary), from its forming an introduction to the more sacrificial part of the service. Contestatio Missae, Immolatio Missae, Contestatio, and Immolatio, are used indiscriminately in the Missale Gothicum (Lit. Gall. Imm. 188, 191, 7, 9, etc.; Cont. 194, 209, 212, etc.), and in the Miss. Gall. Vet. (Cont. ibid. 330, 3, 357, 365, etc.; Imm. 334, 368, 9, 370, etc.). Contestatio only appears in the Miss. Franc. (ibid. 321, 4), the Besançon Sacramentary (Mus. It. i. 279, 284, 6, 8, etc.), and in the Reichenau fragment (which is peculiar in omitting Verè) (u. s. 10, 18, 23, 6, 7, 9). Almost every Missa had its proper Contestatio. When the Roman canon was used in the Gallican church, the proper collects of the Gallican Missae ended with the Contestation, which was immediately followed by the Te igitur. Hence there are no Gallican collects after the Contestatio, in the Besançon Sacramentary (Mus. It. i. 279), or the Frankish Missal (Lit. Gall. 326), because in them the Roman canon was used in every mass. In the Gothic (300), and apparently in the Gallicanum Vetus, it was used in some only. Hence in both these, while many end with the Contestatio, many do not. The Reichenau Missal appears to have been purely Gallican. (h) The Contestation invariably ended with the Sanctus, and this was followed in the strictly Gallican mass by the Collectio post Sanctus, which was founded on it, and was in fact often a contestatio (so to speak) to that doxology: e. g. "Vere sanctus, vere benedictus, Dominus noster Jesus Christus," etc. (Lit. Gall. 189; comp. 195, 202, etc.). The Collectio post Sanctus is the variable Gallican prayer of consecration; for it always concludes with the account of the institution introduced by the mention of the name of Christ, e. g. "Who came to seek and to save that which was lost. For He the day before" (202); "Our Lord Jesus Christ, who the day before He suffered" (210); "By the same our Lord, who the day before He deigned to suffer for the salvation of us and of all" (335). The narrative is never written out at length. (i) The words of institution were followed by a variable prayer called the Collectio post Mysterium (M. Goth. u. s. 189, 195, 210, etc.), or post Secreta (M. Goth. 192, 202, 222, etc.; Gall. Vet. 331, 335; M. Richen. u. s. 15). This collect was (at first, we may presume, always) an invocation such as we find in the Greek and Eastern liturgies, or at least an implicit invocation, i. e. a prayer for the sanctification of the gifts by the Holy Ghost: Ex. "Ut immittere digneris Spiritum Tuum Sanctum super haec solemnia" (M. Goth. 228); "Descendat inaestimabilis gloriae Tuae Spiritus, . . . ut fiat oblatio nostra hostia spiritalis" (Gall. Vet. 335); "Rogamus uti hoc sacrificium tua benedictione benedicas et Sancti Spiritus rore perfundas" (M. Richen. 15). The Spirit is not mentioned in many in which the effect of the prayer is the same: e.g. "Ut operante virtute panem mutatum in carne, poculum versum in sanguine, illum sumamus," etc. (M. Goth. 300); "Descendat, Domine, plenitudo majestatis, Divinitatis, pietatis, virtutis, benedictionis et gloriae tuae super hunc panem et super hunc calicem" (M. Richen. 11). (k) In the Gallican rite the fraction took place before the Lord's Prayer, which, as in other liturgies, came between the consecration and communion (Germanus, Expos. Martene, i. iv. xii. i.). The Gothico-Gallican Missal, and that only, gives a Collectio ad Panis Fractionem for the mass on Easter Eve. It evidently has some special history now unknown; for in it the oblation is offered "for the safety of the kings and their army and all standing around" (Lit. Gall. 251). (l) The Lord's Prayer was introduced by a form which is always headed in the missals, Collectio ante Orationem Dominicam. The following is a brief example: "Not presuming on our merit, O holy Father, but in obedience to the command of our Lord Thy Son Jesus Christ, we presume to say" (M. Goth. 192). Another ends thus, "Suppliant to Thee we cry and say, Our Father" (M. Gall. Vet. 346). Many are addresses in which the people are exhorted to say the Lord's Prayer, e.g. "Let us beseech the Almighty eternal Lord, that . . . He permit us to say with confidence the prayer which our Lord hath taught us, Our Father" (M. Goth. 202). (m) The Lord's Prayer was followed by a prayer with the title Collectio post Orationem Dominicam, which also varied in the several Missae. It corresponds to the constant Roman embolis, and like that is founded on the last petition of the Lord's Prayer, even beginning as that does, generally (not always; see M. Goth. 223, 230, 7; M. Gall. Vet. 346, 9) with "Libera nos." (n) The Benedictio Populi followed, which also varied with the season. By the 44th canon of Agde, A.D. 506, only bishops were permitted to pronounce this. The intention of the decree was, according to Germanus, about 50 years later, to "guard the honour of the pontifex" (Expos. in Mart. u. s.). These Benedictions are very uncertain in their formation. In the Gothico-Gallican Missal they generally consist of five distinct parts (Lit. Gall. 189, 196, etc.), but some are divided into three (198, 219, etc.), four (223, 228), six (192, 208), or nine (210). In the M. Gallicanum Vetus (ibid. 333. 349, 365, etc.), and the M. Richen. (Gall. Liturgies, 2, 20) they are a continuous prayer. Zachary of Rome, A.D. 741, says that the Gallican Benedictions "multis vitiis variantur," and that the bishops were actuated by "vainglory" in making them, "sibi ipsis damnationem adhibentes" (Ep. 12; Labbe, vi. 1526). As no such episcopal benediction can be traced to Rome, some French writers have supposed that Zachary condemned the practice altogether; but the strength of his language would in that case imply a spirit of intolerance which we are unwilling to ascribe to him. It seems more probable that he referred to the length and ambitious character of the benedictions in use. From Caesarius of Arles, A.D. 502, we learn that in France the people were in the habit of leaving church after the gospel, if they did not wish to communicate (Hom. 80, inter Serm. August. App. 286; see also 281, 282). The council of Agde, in 506 (can. 47), the first of Orleans in 511 (can. 26), and the third of Orleans, 538 (can. 29), forbade them to go away before the benediction. An unvarying short blessing was always pronounced here by the priest, if the bishop was not present (German. u. s.). (o) After the communion the priest said the Collectio post Eucharistiam (M. Goth. u. s. 196, 211, 230; Gall. Vet. 331), or post Communionem (M. Goth. 190, 3, 8, etc.; M. Gall. Vet. 333, 5, 338, 7, etc.). This collect is often a brief exhortation to thankfulness, perseverance, or prayer (as M. Goth. 190, 193, 203, etc.; Gall. Vet. 331, 347 (where it is called Praefatio p. Euch.), 350). (p) The last proper collect is the Consummatio Missae, which name occurs Miss. Goth. 196, 230, 293, 4, 6, 7, 300). More frequently it is headed by the words, "Collectio sequitur" (M. Goth. 190, 3, 8, 214; Gall. V. 334, 350, 365, 6, 7, 8, 372), or "Item Collectio" (M. Goth. 298), or "Collectio" simply M. Gall. V. 331, 347, 371). Ex.: "That which we have taken with our mouths, O Lord, let us receive in our minds, and may an eternal remedy be made to us out of a temporal gift" (M. Goth. 190).

It appears probable from Gregory of Tours that in France the missae for one or more great festivals at least were copied out of the sacramentaries, and used in that convenient form under the conventional name of "Libellus." For he says of a bishop that on a certain occasion, "ablato sibi nequiter libello, per quam sacrosancta solemnia agere consueverat, ita paratus a tempore cunctum festivitatis opus explicuit" (Hist. Fr. ii. 22). An aged abbat asked to celebrate, said, "Oculi mei caligine obteguntur, nec possum libellum adspicere; presbytero igitur haec alteri legenda mandate" (Vit. PP. xvi. 2). As the canon was part of the missa and always very short, everything required by the priest for a given occasion, or even for a longer season, might be brought within the compass of a libellus.

(4.) The Mozarabic Missa.—St. Isidore of Seville, A.D. 610, enumerates seven forms "in the order of the mass or of the prayers by which the sacrifices offered to God are consecrated" (De Eccl. Off. 15). His account of them is copied, and therefore confirmed by Etherius and Beatus, A.D. 783 (De Adopt. Christi, i.; Biblioth. V. PP. viii. 354; Colon. 1618), and is found to agree with the Hispano-Gothic sacramentary known as the Mozarabic Missal. We have to observe, however, that Isidore is speaking only of the Missa Fidelium, and that he combines prayers which we have to consider separately. (a) There is a variable prayer called the Oratio, founded on the Gloria in Excelsis and said after it, coming therefore before the prophecy. It often begins with praise and ends with prayer, as, e.g. that for Christmas: "Hodie nobis thesaurus natus est . . . . Praesta nobis, Domine, per gloriam nativitatis tuae a malis propriis liberari" (Miss. Moz. Leslie, u. s. 37; comp. 20, 32, etc.). (b) Referring, as we said, to the prayers in the Missa Fidelium only, Isidore says,

"The first of them is the prayer (oratio) of admonition addressed to the people that they may be stirred up to hearty prayer to God" (u. s.). This is the address called Missa, mentioned above in § V. It corresponds to the Gallican Praefatio; see before (3) (c). (c) "The second is of invocation to God, that He will mercifully receive the prayers of the faithful and their oblation" (Isid. u. s.). This prayer appears in the Missae under the title of Oratio (Leslie, 9, 225). Alia Oratio (3, 17, 1[illegible], etc.), or simply Alia (11, 14, 21, etc); the second being by far the more frequent. The reference in "alia" is to the Missa. (d) "The third is poured for the offerers or the faithful departed, that through the said sacrifice they may obtain pardon" (Isid.). This prayer corresponds to the Gallican Post Nomina and has that title (Leslie, passim). It quite satisfies the account of Isidore. E.g. one begins thus: "Nominibus sanctorum martyrum, offerentiumque fidelium, atque eorum qui ab hoc saeculo transierunt a ministris jam sacri ordinis recensitis" (27). As these are in effect prayers super oblata, it is peculiar that many of them are addressed to Christ; see pp. 4, 9, 11, etc. (e) "A fourth is introduced after these with reference to the kiss of peace, that all being mutually reconciled by charity may be associated together as worthy of the sacrament of the body and blood of Christ" (Isid.). This prayer, like the corresponding Gallican, is headed "Ad Pacem." It is often addressed to the Son (Leslie, 9, 11, 15, etc.). (f) "The illation in the consecration of the oblation is introduced in the fifth place, in which the terrestrial creation and all the powers of heaven are called forth to the praise of God, and Hosanna in the highest is sung" (Isid.). This answers, as the reader will see, to the English preface and the Gallican immolatio. It begins always "Dignum et justum est" (Leslie, passim). In the Mozarabic Missal the title, Inlatio is never wanting or varied. (g) it is followed by the Post Sanctus, which is, as in the Gallican, a contestation to the Sanctus. It generally begins "Vere Sanctus," very often including some reference to the Hosanna, which is sung by the choir after the Sanctus; but sometimes it takes up the Hosanna at first hand, as "Osanna in excelsis. Quantâ nobis, Omnipotens Pater, hoc sacrificium reverentiâ metuendum . . . caelestium voces admonent potestatum" (66); "Vere benedictus" (120). (h) It rarely opens without a catchword from either; but see examples, pp. 20, 153; where, however, the prayers are still founded on the Sanctus. This prayer is not mentioned by Isidore, probably because he regarded it as a variable part of the prayer of consecration (Adesto, adesto, Jesu bone, etc.), with which the priest proceeded immediately. It is quite possible, however, that it may have been borrowed from the Goths of Gaul, after the time of Isidore. (i) The canon ends with the account of the institution. This does not begin with "Pridie" like the Gallican, but thus, "Dominus noster Jesus Christus in qua nocte," etc. (Leslie, 5). Yet the invariable title of the prayer which follows it (the Post Mysterium or Post Secreta of Gaul) is Post Pridie (Oratio). This fact suggests that originally the canon of Gothic Spain was the same as that of Gaul. The Post Pridie is, in its typical specimens, a prayer for the sanctification of the gifts by the Spirit, and it is incredible that any liturgy, derived as this was immediately from the East, should have been without a prayer deemed essential to the consecration in all the Eastern churches. In the second place this prayer is clearly described by Isidore, though without the name Post Pridie, which was probably attached to it after his time: "Porro sexta exhinc succedit confirmatio sacramenti, ut oblatio quae Deo offertur sanctificata per Spiritum Sanctum corporis et sanguinis confirmetur" (ib.). (k) The next variable prayer is the Ad Orationem Dominicam, sometimes of considerable length. It leads up to the Lord's Prayer thus, "cum . . . . proclamaverimus e terris, Pater" (6); "nos docuit orare semper et docere, Pater," etc. (10). It is not noticed by Isidore, whose seventh prayer is the Lord's Prayer itself; but here again he may be silent, because he thought that in mentioning the prayer, he implied the preamble, which in his day, we may add, was probably much shorter than the existing forms. (l) The Mozarabic embolis "Liberati a malo, etc." does not vary. It is followed by the "conjunction" of the consecrated elements. (m) After this a Benediction is given, which varies with the season. In all but two instances the Hispano-Gothic benediction is divided into three parts, at the end of each of which the people respond Amen. After the third response the priest says "Per misericordiam ipsius Dei nostri: qui est benedictus et vivit," etc. This is occasionally varied, but on no principle (see Notitia Eucharistica, 699, 2nd ed.). The blessing for the Epiphany is in five parts, apparently that it may take in all the subjects of commemoration on that day (Leslie, 63). The other exception (440) is in four. The mass (Commune plurium Virginum) is late, and the irregularity seems to arise simply from the division of one of the original members which was unusually long. We hear of the benediction in Spain from the council of Toledo, A.D. 633 (can. 18): "Some priests communicate immediately after saying the Lord's Prayer, and afterwards give the blessing in populo (sic, and so Isidore, u. s. c. 17); which we forbid for the future; but after the Lord's Prayer and the conjunction of the bread and cup let the benediction in populum (sic) follow." (n) A variable Post Communionem Oratio (Leslie, 7, 35, 40, 44, etc.) followed the reception, which is often, like the Gallican Collectio, an exhortation (ib. 63, 83, 89, etc.). This oratio, if used in the days of St. Isidore, would not be in his "Ordo Missae;" for the mass was supposed to be over before the communion; but it may be of later introduction, for he does not mention it in his account of the later part of the service.

For the variable antiphons in the several liturgies, see ANTIPHON, COMMUNIO, GRADUAL, INTROIT.

IX. In the Gallican liturgies the prayers proper to a saint's day are often called the "missa" of that saint. Thus in the Besançon Sacramentary we have Missa Sancti Stefani, Missa S. Martini Episcopi, etc. (Mus. Ital. i. 292, 349, etc.); in the Gothico-Gallican, Missa S. Johannis Apostoli et Evangelistae, Missa Sancti Leudegarii martyris, etc. (Lib. Gall. 282, 283, etc.), and in the Gallicanum vetus, Missa S.

Germani Episcopi (ib. 329). From this use of the word flowed another, the festival itself on which those prayers were said being often called by the name of Missa. Thus in the Regulae Canonicorum of Chrodegang, written in 757, cap. 34, we have Missa S. Remedii (= Remigii) Missa S. Martini (Migne, 89). A Decretale Precum of 779 directs that the services which it orders take place, Missa S. Johannis (Cap. Reg. Franc. i. 20; sim. in Capit. iii. ann. 806, Car. M. 449). In the third capitulary of Charlemagne in 803, a general gathering of the vassals of the empire is ordered to take place "on the eighth before the calends of July, i.e. on the mass of St. John the Baptist" (ib. 394). Sim. in a law of Pepin, A.D. 793 (ib. 543). St. Martin's principal feast (Nov. 11) was formerly called St. Martin in the winter, or in yeme. One example to our purpose occurs in the reign of Charlemagne, viz. in his Capitulary de Villis, A.D. 800, in which it is ordered that all foals belonging to the king shall be brought to the palace "on the mass of St. Martin in the winter" (Missa S. Martini hiemali, c. 15, ib. 334). This use of missa, which became very common after the 9th century, has bequeathed to us such combinations as Christmas, Martinmas, Candlemas (missa luminum), etc.

X. In this section we propose to give the various kinds of missae (in the sense considered in § viii.) that were in use before the 9th century, and to explain the terms describing them.

(1.) Missa Cardinalis. This phrase, which is understood to mean "high mass," occurs in the Miracula S. Bertini, ii. 7; Acta Bened. saec. iii. (the 8th century), i. 132: "Die Dominico horâ quâ cardinalis missae conventus publice agebantur."

(2.) Missa Crismalis. The proper prayers used on Maundy Thursday at the mass at which the chrism is consecrated are so called in the Gelasian Sacramentary (Murat. i. 554), in the ancient Rheims use of the Gregorian, the extant copy of which was written in the time of Charlemagne (Martene, de Ant. Eccl. Rit. IV. xxii. § 3 in fine, Missa Chrismale (sic)), and in the Anjou pontifical a little later (ibid. § 8, n. 4).

(3.) Missa Communis = publica (as "common prayer" with us) in Epist. Braulionis Caesaraug. A.D. 627 (Vita S. Aemiliani praefixa): "Ut missa recitaretur communis injunxi" (Acta Bened. saec. i. P. iii. 206).

Missa Communis also meant a mass said for several persons in common. Thus in one under that title the priest prays "for those for whom he has made up his mind to pray" living or dead, and "for all the faithful, whose names the book of blessed predestination contains written" (Mon. Liturg. Alem., Gerbert, i. 270).

(4.) Missa Decensita. By a charter dated in the year 760 a grant of land was made to the church at Brioude, "ut omni tempore missae ibidem decensitae esse debeant" (App. Acta Vet. n. 14; Cap. Reg. Fr. ii. 1393); i.e. as it is understood, shall be duly and properly performed.

(5.) Missa pro Defunctis. See OBSEQUIES.

(6.) Missa Dominicalis. This is the title of missae to be used on Sunday (Dies Dominicus) in the Gallican Sacramentaries. See the missae 75–80 in Missale Goth. (Lit. Gall. 292–299), the 36th in Gallicanum Vetus (ibid. 375) and eight missae in the Besançon (Mss. Ital. i. 365–383).

(7.) Missa de Exceptato is the title of a missa standing before that for Christmas Eve in the Milanese Missal (Pamel. u. s. i. 445). We are probably to understand with Pamelius, that it is for exceptional use; viz. when seven Sundays occur in Advent, which in the province of Milan begins on the first Sunday after Martinmas. Mabillon, however (Lit. Gall. 99), reads, Missa de Expectato, and suggests a comparison with the "Praeparatio ad Vesperam Natalis Domini" in the Miss. Gall. Vet. (ibid. 336); but the reading in all the editions, including Mabillon's own, is not Praeparatio but Praefatio, and the formulary which follows the above heading is a "preface" in the Gallican sense; i.e. an address to the people. See Thomasius, Liber Sacram. ii. 441; Murat. Lit. Rom. Vet. ii. 706; Forbes, Gall. Lit. 158.

(8.) Missa pro Gratiarum actione. There is no proper missa in the old sacramentaries that is, or could be, so described; but the holy Eucharist was celebrated as an act of special thanksgiving at an early period. Thus in a work of the 5th century we read that when a woman had been healed at the ordinary celebration "an oblation of thanksgiving was again made for her" (De Prom. et Praed. Dei; Dim. Temp. 4; inter opp. Prosperi). A rubric in the present Roman Missal orders that "for thanksgiving be said the mass of the most holy Trinity, or of the Holy Ghost, or of the blessed Mary" certain proper prayers (Oratio, Secreta, Postcommunio) "being added under the same ending." The Missa de Trinitate descends from an early period, being found in the Codex San-Blasianus of the Gregorian Sacramentary which is of the 9th century (Gerbert, Mon. Lit. Alem. i. 260). The Missa de Spiritu Sancto is only an adaptation of the Gregorian missa for Whitsunday (Murat. u. s. ii. 90). We cannot connect them with acts of thanksgiving within our period; but that a special celebration on recovery of health was then common may be inferred from a Narbonne pontifical, the MS. of which is not much later. In this it is said that the patient "restored to health by the mercy of God ought by no means to omit causing a missa pro gratiarum actione to be celebrated" (Martene, u. s. i. vii. iv. 13).

(9.) Missa Jejunii is the title of four Lenten missae (22–25) in the Missale Gothico-Gallicanum (Liturg. Gall. 231, etc.), and of four in the Sacramentary of Besançon (Mus. Ital. i. 304). See after, Missa Quadragesimalis.

(10.) Missa Judicii, the mass said at an ordeal. The expression forms the title of the proper prayers used at a trial by cold water, as appointed by Dunstan of Canterbury (Baluz, Cap. Reg. Franc. ii. 647). The missa consists of a proper antiphon, collect, three lessons (Lev. xix. 10–14; Eph. iv. 23–28; St. Mark x. 17–21), gradual, offertory, secreta, preface, benedictio ad judicium, antiphona post communionem, and post-communio. The words of delivery common (with variations) to this and later forms of the kind (see Martene, de Ant. Eccl. Rit. iii. vii. 3, 5, 8, 9. 17) are, "The Body and Blood of our Lord Jesus Christ be unto you for probation this day." Gerbert (Disquis. vi. iii. 3) gives in full the missa of an "Ordo ad faciendum judicium, cum volueris homines judicio probare, vel aquae frigidae vel ferventis, aut ignit[illegible] ferri, vel vomerum, aut panis et casei, vel mensurae." Several orders, some with missae, may be seen in Martene, u. s.

A kindred practice among priests was that of celebrating the Eucharist in attestation of their own innocence. Thus Gregory of Tours relates that in order to clear himself of a charge of having slandered the queen, "dictis missis in tribus altaribus se de his verbis exueret sacramento" (Hist. Franc. v. 50). This was probably common; for in 868 it was enforced by the Council of Worms, which ordered that bishops and presbyters accused of homicide, adultery, theft, and witchcraft should "celebrate a mass for each charge and say the secret publicly and communicate" (can. 10). So late as 1077 we find Gregory VII. using this method to purge himself from simony (Life by Bowden, iii. 12). Nor was it confined to the clergy. The year after the Council of Worms, Lothaire the king of Lorraine received the mass from the hands of Hadrian in attestation of his freedom from the crime of adultery (Fleury, Hist. du Christ. li. 23).

(11.) Missa Legitima is a mass celebrated with all due requisites. "We must own that to be a missa legitima at which are present a priest, one to respond, one who offers, and one who communicates, as the very composition of the prayers clearly shews" (Walafrid, de Reb. Eccl. 22). Compare the use of the phrase "communio legitima." Penitents supposed to be dying might be communicated without the previous laying on of hands by the bishop; but if they recovered after that, they were to "stand in the order of penitents, that when they had shown the necessary fruits of repentance, they might receive 'legitimam communionem' with the reconciliatory imposition of hands" (can. 3, Conc. Araus. A.D. 441; inserted much later in Cap. Reg. Franc. i. 138; compare Isaaci Lingon. Canones, i. 6).

(12.) Missa Matutina. The 4th canon of the Council of Vaison, held in 529, runs thus: "Ut in omnibus missis, sive matutinis, sive quadrigesimalibus . . . . semper Sanctus, Sanctus, Sanctus dicatur," etc. The ground of the distinction is that in Lent the celebration took place in the afternoon, whereas generally it was at the third hour (Notitia Euch. 31–36). The third Council of Orleans, A.D. 538, forbids men to attend armed "sacrificia matutina missarum sive vespertina" (can. 29). "Evening" masses include those of Wednesday and Friday which, except between Easter and Whitsuntide, were also in the afternoon. The Gothico-Gallican (Lit. Gall. 254) and Old Gallican (ibid. 372) missals have a missa matutinalis per totum Pascha pro parvulis qui renati sunt (mature dicenda, Mss. Gall. Vet.). At a later period the ordinary daily mass said in many monasteries after Prime in summer and after Terce in winter, was called missa matutinalis; as in the Consuetudines S. Victoris 68, in Martene, u. s. iii. 283; Constit. S. Dionys. Rem. ibid. 297, 301. This earlier mass was called missa minor in contrast to the missa major or conventualis, which was celebrated with greater ritual solemnity. See Martene, de Antiq. Monach. Rit. ii. 5.

(13.) Missa Nautica or Navalis, a Missa Sicca celebrated at sea; but see below (No. 29).

(14.) Missa Omnimoda is the title of a votive Missa in the Sacramentary of Besançon, which the priest offers for himself (as expressed in the praefatio) for sinners by name (as in the collectio), for persons living and departed whose names are presented (in the post nomina), for the sick, naming them, and generally for "all stricken with fear, afflicted by want, harassed by trouble, brought down by diseases, consigned to punishment, bound by debts, in captivity, and journeying" (in the ad pacem), these several petitions being summed up in the contestation (Mss. Ital. i. 359). A similar missa with much in common occurs in the Mozarabic Missal under the title Missa Votiva Omnimoda (Leslie, 441). Missa Omnimoda is again the name of a late mass of general intercession in the St. Gall codex of the Gregorian Sacramentary, probably written soon after the death of Charlemagne (Gerbert, Mon. Lit. Alem. i. 268).

(15.) Missa Omnium Offerentium is a name given to the invariable portions of the liturgy of Gothic Spain. The lesser missal which contains it is called Liber Omnium Offerentium. The name is appropriate because a considerable part of the service to which it is applied is assigned to the choir, the representative of the people; so that all the worshippers have their share in it. Whether the title was adopted for this reason is, however, not certain. In any case it may have been suggested by the occurrence of the words at the oblation of the chalice: "Omnium Offerentium eorum pro quibus tibi offertur, peccata indulge" (Miss. Mozar. 223). The same words occur together in a Collectio post nomina of Gothic France (Miss. Goth. in Lit. Gall. 237); but neither there does the context give them any conventional significance. In early times the people were said to offer even in the commemoration of the sacrifice of the cross after the consecration. Thus Florus of Lyons, explaining the Unde et memores, etc., of the canon, says, "Memores igitur Dominicae passionis, resurrectionis et ascensionis, tam sacerdotes quam plebs fidelis offerunt praeclarae . . . majestati Dei non de suo, sed de ejus donis ac datis," etc. (De Expos. Missae, 64). This is implied by a synod held by St. Patrick and other bishops, which order that a bishop in the diocese of another shall "on the Lord's day offer only by partaking," i. e. as a layman (can. 30; Migne, 53, col. 826).

(16.) Missa Paschalis. The missae provided in the Gothico-Gallican Missal for four days in Easter week, viz. from Tuesday to Friday inclusively (Lit. Gall. 254–6), and those to be used from Monday to Friday of the same week in the Old Gallican (ibid. 367–371) are so called. There are also two Missae Paschales in the sacramentary of Besançon (Mus. Ital. i. 330, 2).

(17.) Missa Peculiaris. A mass said on any private account, as e. g. for the repose of the dead, was so called in the 8th century. Theodulf of Orleans, A.D. 797, orders that "Missae Peculiares performed by priests on Sundays be not so publicly performed as to draw the people from the public celebrations of masses, which take place canonically on the third hour" (Capit. c. 45; Labbe, Conc. vii. 1147).

(18.) Missa Pontificalis, a mass celebrated by a bishop. We are not aware that the phrase occurs within our range of time. The Ordo Romanus I., supposed to have been compiled about 730, which gives directions for an episcopal mass, is inscribed in its earliest extant copy, which is of the 10th century, Ordo Ecclesiastici Ministerii Romanae Ecclesiae. A later copy has incipit Ordo Ecclesiasticus Romanae ecclesiae, qualiter Missa Pontificalis celebretur (Mus. Ital. ii. 2, 3).

(19.) Missa Praesanctificatorum. See PRESANCTIFIED, MASS OF THE.

(20.) Missa Privata is used in two senses. It either means (1) "A mass celebrated in private and on a special account without singing, and but one clerk ministering, whether it be in a church or private oratory" (Merati in Gavanti, p. i. in Rubr. Gen. Obs. Praelim. § 46), in which case it is distinguished from a solemn mass; or (2) "A mass in which the priest alone communicates" (ibid.), in which case it is opposed to a public mass. A daily mass celebrated out of devotion in the earlier ages would come under the former head. An example (in Cassius bishop of Narni) is mentioned by Gregory I. (Dial. iv. 56). In neither sense does the phrase appear to have been in use during our period. See Missa Solitaria.

(21.) Missa Publica is a celebration at which all may be present and communicate. The expression is frequent in the epistles of Gregory I. Thus he "forbids that Public Masses should on any account be celebrated" in a (certain) monastery by the bishop of the diocese, that the retirement of the monks might not be invaded by the concourse of people from without (iv. 43), and severely condemns another bishop for having placed his throne in a monastic church and celebrated "Public Masses" there (v. 46). He orders an oratory to be "solemnly consecrated without Public Masses" (vii. 72), and speaks in reprobation of a bishop who had "built an oratory in the diocese of another . . . and did not fear to celebrate Public Masses there" (xi. 21). Another example from a law of Charlemagne in 803 will suffice. Among other restrictions laid on the chorepiscopi he forbade them to "give the benediction to the people in Publica Missa" (Cap. Reg. Fr. i. 382).

(22.) Missa Quadragesimalis, a missa to be used in Lent. See above, Missa Matutina, and Missa Jejunii. A lenten missa in the Besançon Sacramentary bears the title Missa Quadragesimalis (Mus. Ital. i. 302). One of those in the Gothico-Gallican Missal is headed Missa in Quadragesima (Lit. Gall. p. 234). In the last-named missal there are in all only six proper missae provided for Lent. The Gallicanum Vetus is defective from Christmas to the great scrutinium and exhibits none (ibid. 338). There are but five in the Besançon rite. On the other hand the Gelasian and Gregorian give a missa for every day in the season, and the Mozarabic one for every Sunday, Wednesday, and Friday. The Roman missae for the week-days in Lent are supposed to have been chiefly borrowed from those of Milan (Pamel. Rituale, i. 328). The latter is peculiar in having none for the Fridays (Martene, de Ant. Eccl. Rit. iv. xviii. 21; Gerbert, Mon. Lit. Al. i. 42).

(23.) Missa Quotidiana appears to be a missa that may be used on any day that has no proper prayers provided for it. There is an example (Missa Cottidiana) in the Besançon Sacramentary (Mus. It. i. 382). Compare Legendis Cottidianis (379), Lectiones Cottidianas (338, 381), Lectiones Cottidianae (382, 3), which are the headings to lessons for similar use. Again, we have Lectio libri Danihel Prophetae in Cottidiana (sc. Missa) legenda (278). Two missae in the same book have the incoherent title of Missa Cottidiana Dominicalis (380, 3), i.e. a missa that may be used on any Sunday that has not its proper missa. In the Gregorian Sacramentary is Missa Quotidiana pro Rege, i. e. that might be said whenever the priest chose (Murat. Lit. Rom. Vet. ii. 188). See further under Missa Romensis.

(24.) Missa Revocata. See Missam revocare in § XI. No. (9).

(25.) Missa Romensis, i. e. borrowed from the Roman books. The old Gallican canon was very short, being nothing more than the recital of the institution, which was added to the variable Collectio post Sanctus. The first words of it (Ipse enim priusquam, etc.) are frequently so added in the Gothico-Gallican Missal (Lit. Gall. 189, 192, 5, etc.). The Besançon Sacramentary, however, had adopted the long Roman canon, which it put after the contestatio (see PREFACE), omitting the post Sanctus. It occurs thus in the first missa in the book, and that missa bears the title, Missa Romensis Cottidiana (Mus. It. 279). As the missa retains most of its Gallican forms under their usual names (post nomina, ad pacem, etc.), the word "Romensis" must refer to the canon almost entirely, and therefore "Cottidiana" here indicates the daily use of that. The last missa in the Gothico-Gallican Missal has the similar heading, Missa Cottidiana Romensis (Lit. Gall. 300); but after the first collect the MS. fails us. That collect, however, being identical with one in the Besançon missa helps the conclusion that the Roman canon followed in that book also, and that the Goths in Gaul, though retaining throughout their liturgy their own mode of consecration, yet permitted an optional use of the Roman.

(26.) Missa de Sanctis. At a very early period it became the custom to observe the anniversary of a martyr's death. On such occasions the Eucharist was celebrated, partly as an act of intercession for the soul of the deceased, and partly as a thankful commemoration of the triumph of truth and grace in his death. Soon the rite was observed in the case of other eminent Christians, and ere long, the original ground of it becoming obscured, the celebration was supposed to be in honour of the person (in honorem ipsorum,—in ejus honore; Greg. Tur. Mirac. i. 47, 75). The story of Polycarp (A.D. 147) gives us the earliest example of such commemoration: "We deposited his remains where it was fitting, where gathered together as opportunity serves with joy and gladness the Lord will grant unto us to celebrate the natal day of his martyrdom, both in memory of those who have fought the good fight (for twelve suffered with him), and for the training and preparation of those who will be called to it" (Eccl. Smyrn. Epist. 18). Tertullian, A.D. 192: "We make oblations for the departed on one day in the year, for birthday gifts" (De Cor. 3). Cyprian in 250 orders his clergy to inform him of the days on which any were put to death, "that he might be able to celebrate their commemorations among the Memorials of the Martyrs . . . that oblations and sacrifices in commemoration of them might be celebrated" where he was (Epist. 12 ad Presbyt.).

Again: "As ye remember, we never fail to offer sacrifices for them as often as we celebrate the passions and days of the martyrs by an annual commemoration" (Ep. 39 ad Presbyt.). Sixty-two sermons ascribed with confidence to St. Augustine, who died in 430, were preached on martyrs' days (Class. iii. ed. Ben.). In the course of time proper Missae were written for these occasions, such as are now known under the name of Missae de Sanctis.

The titles of such missae in the ancient sacramentaries are variously constructed. In the Missale Gothicum we have, e.g. Missa in Natale Agnes (sic) Virginis et Martyris (Lit. Gall. 215), Missa S. Saturnini, Episcopi et Martyris (ibid. 219), Missa de pluris Martyris (sic) (287), etc.; in the Besançon Sacramentary, Missa Sancti Stefani (Mus. It. 3, i. 202), Missa in Sanctorum Infantum (293), Missa de uno Confessore (347), etc. In the Milanese Missal all run thus, In Festo S. Thomae (Pamel. i. 444), etc.; in that of Gothic Spain thus, In Natale SS. Innocentium (Leslie, 48), or In Sancti Stephani Levite et Martyris (41), or In Festo Sancti Luciani Presbyteri et Martyris (289). The Roman sacramentaries use commonly the word Natale, as Natale Sancti Andreae Apostoli (Sacr. Leon. Murat. i. 464), In Natali Sancti Johannis Evangelistae (474), In Natal. Innocent. (Gelas. ibid. 499), but In Nativitate Sanctae Euphimiae (643). The Gregorian has Natale Sanctae Priscae (ii. 19), and so generally; but (of a preface), Item alia Specialis in Festivitate S. Cypriani (335).

Some of the Missae de Sanctis retained their original intercessory character for a long time. In the Leonian Sacramentary there is one headed "Sancti Silvestri," in which are prayers both for him (dec. A.D. 336) and Simplicius (dec. 483); for the former in separate prayers, that "he may rejoice for ever in the society of the saints" of God, and that "endless beatitude may glorify him" (Murat. i. 454); for the latter, that "his soul being freed from all things which from the nature of man it hath brought on it, may have its portion in the lot of holy pastors" (ibid.). This Missa is not found in the Gelasian or Gregorian books. Another instance is the Gregorian Super Oblata in the missae of St. Leo and St. Gregory: "Vouchsafe to us, O Lord, that the (Greg. this) oblation by the immolation of which Thou hast granted that the sins of the whole world should be forgiven may profit the soul of Thy servant Leo (Gregory)" (ibid. ii. 25. 101). An archbishop of Lyons observing that the last clause had been altered into, "may profit us through the intercession of the blessed Leo (Gregory)," wrote to Innocent III., A.D. 1198, for an explanation. The pope justified the change by quoting as Scripture a sentiment of St. Augustine (Serm. 159, c. 1, and Tract. 84 in S. Johan. xv.): "Since the authority of Sacred Writ says that 'he who prays for a martyr wrongs a martyr,' the same should by parity of reason be thought of the other saints" (Decr. Const. iii. 130). The earlier and the mediaeval grounds are combined in a passage of Gregory of Tours, who tells us that persons stricken with ague who "devoutly celebrated masses in honour of St. Sigismund and offered the oblation to God for his repose" were immediately healed (Mirac. i. 75).

(27.) Missa pro Scrutinio. Those masses were so called which were said on the 3rd, 4th, 5th, and 6th Sundays in Lent on behalf of the catechumens preparing for baptism on Easter Eve. "Scrutinium," says Amalarius, "proprium syntagma habet et propriam missam" (De Eccles. Off. i. 8). Four Missae pro scrutiniis electorum are assigned, one to each of the Sundays above-named, in the Gelasian Sacramentary (Murat. i. 521, 5, 9, 533). The Gallican church had only one such Missa, which was said on Palm Sunday, until Charlemagne ordered the observance of the Roman system of scrutinia (Capit. Reg. Franc. v. 372). It is called Missa in Symboli Traditione (Mus. It. i. 314; Lit. Gall. 235, 346). At Milan the creed was delivered to the competentes on the day before Palm Sunday (Sabbato in Traditione Symboli) and a similar mass said (Pamel. i. 336).

(28.) Missa Secunda. Anastasius Bibliothecarius (Vit. Pont. R. 69) states that Deusdedit of Rome, 614, "instituted a Second Mass in clero;" i.e. among monks (see CLERUS and above Missa Matutina). A second public celebration had long been the custom when a church open to all could not contain at one time all who desired to communicate. Leo, A.D. 440, says that this was the practice at Rome, and begs the pope of Alexandria to sanction it in his patriarchate, "that their observance might in all things accord" (Ep. 11 ad Diosc. 2).

(29.) Missa Sicca. Dry Masses are not heard of before the 13th century. We refer to them here because, owing to an oversight in regard to the pontifical of Prudentius of Troye, they have been put by some four hundred years earlier. See Notitia Eucharistica, 816 n. ed. 2.

(30.) Missa Singularis. A special Mass on behalf of one person. The phrase occurs in the life of Wilfrid of York by Heddius, A.D. 720; "Omni die pro [illegible] Singularem celebrare" (cap. 62 in [illegible]; i. 78). In the Mozarabic [illegible] Leslie, 446) is a Missa Votiva Singularis, in every prayer of which the name of the person (everywhere supposed to be one) is to be inserted.

(31.) Missa Solitaria. We do not find the expression in use before the Middle Ages, but by the beginning of the 9th century priests had certainly begun to celebrate without attendants. This is forbidden by the council of Mentz, 813. "No presbyter, as it seems to us, can sing masses alone rightly, for how will he say, The Lord be with you. . . when there is no one with him?" (can. 43). The council of Paris, 829: "A reprehensible practice and worthy of meet correction has, partly through neglect, partly through avarice, crept in in most places; viz. that some of the presbyters celebrate the solemn rites of masses without ministers" (i. can. 48). Comp. Cap. Reg. Fr. v. 159; Add. ii. 9; Herard, cap. i. 9.

(32.) Missa Specialis, a private mass in the more ancient sense, i.e. for a special object. Thus in the Gregorian Sacramentary, a missa to be used when a priest says a mass for the forgiveness of his own sins is entitled Missa Specialis Sacerdotis (Murat. ii. 190; compare two with the same heading among those ascribed to Grimoldus, Pamel. ii. 428). "Special," of a preface, mentioned above in (26), means that it commemorates St. Cyprian alone, and not Cornelius also, as another does, their feasts falling on the same day. The expression occurs also in an epistle of Charlemagne to Fastrada. "Et sacerdos unusquisque Missam Specialem fecisset, nisi infirmitas impedisset" (Ep. de Vict. Avar. in Hist. Franc. Script. 187, or Capit. Reg. Fr. i. 257). He is speaking of the litanies and other services prescribed for a public fast.

(34.) Missa de Tempore; i.e. adapted to some sacred day or season of the Christian year. Such masses are in all the ancient missals, though the phrase is late. The Gregorian, Milanese, and Mozarabic provide missae for every Sunday in the year, as well as for the great days of Christmas, Epiphany, Ash Wednesday, Good Friday, Easter, etc. In some cases also for the feriae connected with them. The Gallican rites having been suppressed by Pepin and Charlemagne towards the close of the 8th century (Lebrun, Dissert. iv. art. i.) are less methodised and full, but they are framed on the same principle.

(36.) Missa Votiva. By this is now meant any mass not of the day, even though prescribed, as, e.g. the masses of the Blessed Virgin on the first two Saturdays in Advent (Merati in Gavanti, P. i. Rubr. Gen. Obs. Prael. 66). Originally, however, it meant a celebration at which some special blessing, temporal or spiritual, was sought, whether for the celebrant or others. This is the character of two Missae Votivae (omnimoda, singularis) already cited from the Mozarabic Missal (see (14) and (30)). Other examples, though not so inscribed, occur in the same book; as Missa de Itinerantibus, de Tribulationibus, pro alio Sacerdote fratre suo vivo, ue uno Infirmo, pro Infirmis (pp. 447–454). The Besançon Missal has four headed "Missa Votiva" for blessings on a single person to be named in the office (Mus. Ital. 360–2); and two others, one of which, pro Vivis et Defunctis (363), speaks of brothers, sisters, and benefactors. In the other, entitled Missa in domo cujuslibet (364), the names of the family are to be introduced. There are no missae of the kind in the other Gallican missals with the exception of one entitled Orationes et Prec. pro Regibus in that of the Franks (Lit. Gall. 316). If we except some masses for the dead, there are no Missae Votivae in the Ambrosian Liturgy, nor does the phrase appear in it. The collections under the names of Grimoldus (Pamel. ii. 388) and Alcuin (ibid. 517) contain votive missae, but they are not so described. This is the case also with the Leonian (Murat. i. 434, etc.) and Gelasian (ibid. 725, etc.) Sacramentaries. In the ancient copy of the Gregorian printed by Pamelius (tom. ii.) we find neither the name nor thing; but both in those printed by Muratori (ii. 193, etc.), Gerbert (Mon. Vet. Lit. Alem. 279 etc.), the editors of the works of Gregory published in 1615 (tom. v. 221, etc.) and others.

We find an early instance of a votive celebration of the Eucharist in St. Augustine. His presbyters were requested to send one of their number to pray in a haunted house. "One went, offered there the sacrifice of Christ's body, praying to His power for the cessation of that trouble. Through the mercy of God it forthwith ceased" (De Civ. Dei, xxii. 8, 6).

XI. The Eucharist had acquired the name of missa a long time before any one phrase (such as missam celebrare, audire) was generally accepted to denote the celebration of the sacrament or lay attendance at it. The following list is thought to contain all in use within our limit of time.

(1.) Missam agere, peragere. The Gelasian Sacramentary: "Si fuerit oblata, agendae sunt missae, et communicet" (Murat. i. 596). Sim. in two edicts of Hunneric the Vandal, A.D. 484: "In ecclesiis vestris missas agere" (Hist. Persec. Vand. Vict. Vit. ii. 2), "Reperti sunt contra interdictum missas in sortibus Vandalorum egisse" (ibid. in c. xiii.). We find also missam peragere; e.g. Ordo Rom. I., after prescribing the consecration of the cil for the sick before the end of the canon, adds, "et deinceps peragitur missa ordine suo" (c. 30; Mus. It. ii. 20).

(2.) Missam audire. We have not noticed this, afterwards common, phrase in the writers of the first eight centuries. It occurs, however, early in the 9th; viz. in the 19th canon of the council of Châlons-sur-Saône, 813: "Let families give their tithes in the place in which their children are baptized, and where they hear masses through the whole course of the year." The council of Paris, 829: "Satius igitur est illis missam non audire, quam eam ubi non licet nec oportet audire" (i. 47). It is instructive to observe that when Gratian, A.D. 1131, professes to give the 47th canon of Agde (A.D. 506), for "Missas a saecularibus totas teneri....praecipimus," he substitutes "Missas... saecularibus totas audire ....praecipimus" (De Consecr. i. 64).

(3.) Missam cantare, decantare. Bede says of Ceolfrid that from the day he left his monastery to go to Rome to the day of his death "quotidie missâ cantatâ salutaris hostiae Deo munus offeret" (Hist. Abbat. Wirem. § 16, sim. § 13). In 803 a petition was presented by the people to Charlemagne, praying that when the king and his lay subjects went against the enemy the bishops might stay at home and attend to their proper duties, among which are mentioned "Missas cantare et letanias atque eleemosynas facere" (Capit. Reg. Franc. i. 405; sim. 470, 5, 730, etc.). The council of Mentz, 813: "Nullus presbyter, ut nobis videtur, solus missam cantare valet recte" (can. 43). We must suppose that originally the use of the word cantare implied that the mass was sung or chanted. That this meaning was lost sight of in the 9th century is evident from the language of Amalarius and others respecting the canon: "In eo videlicet quod ista oratio specialiter ad sacerdotem pertinet....secreto eam decantat" (Amal. Ecloga, 21). Remigius of Auxerre: "Consuetudo venit in Ecclesiâ, ut tacite ista obsecratio atque consecratio cantetur" (in the chapter De Celebr. Miss. of Pseudo-Alcuin, Hittorp. 284).

(4.) Missam celebrare. This is in very common use from the 6th century downwards, and sometimes even of the laity; as of the sick seeking to be healed, "Si...missas devote celebrant" (Greg. Tur. Mirac. i. 75); even of a woman, "Celebrans quotidie missarum solemnia" (De Glor. Confess. 65). The Capitulary of Aix, 789: "Auditum est aliquos presbyteros missam celebrare, et non communicare" (c. 6, Labbe, vii. 970). Theodulf of Orleans, A.D. 797: "Missam sacerdote celebrante" (Capit. i. 6, ibid. 1138), "Sacerdos missam solus nequidquam celebret" (ibid. c. 7). See Capit. Reg

Franc. i. 409, 417, 956, 1206. "Missarum mysteria, solemnia, celebrare" are also frequent, as Greg. Tur. Mirac. i. 90, 87.

(5.) Missam consecrare. Gregory of Tours: "Ejus clerici concinant qui consecrat missas" (Vitae Patr. 5).

(6.) Missam dicere. Dictis missis (Hist. Franc. ix. 20; Mirac. i. 34, 90). The council of Mâcon 581: "Ut archiepiscopus sine pallio missas dicere non praesumat" (can. 6).

(7.) Missam facere. St. Ambrose: "Missam facere coepi" (Epist. xx. 4); the council of Toledo, 646: "Missas facere" (can. 2), "faciendi missam" (3); Ordo Rom. I.: "Quando (presbyter) in statione facit missas" (c. 22; Mus. Ital. ii. 17); Charlemagne in 803: "Ipsi pro nobis et cuncto exercitu nostro missas, letanias, oblationes, eleemosynas faciant" (Capit. Reg. Fr. i. 405; sim. in Epist. ad Fastradam, ibid. 257).

(8.) Missam peragere. See Missam agere.

(9.) Missam recitare. "Ut missa recitaretur communis injunxi dilecto filio meo" (Braulio, A.D. 627, in Ep. Vitae S. Aemiliani praef. Acta Bened. saec. i. iii. 206).

(10.) Missam revocare meant to celebrate a mass, but the ground of the usage is obscure and doubtful. Mabillon thinks that there is in the expression an allusion per antiphrasim to the original sense of missa, "the people having been dismissed before are again called back to the sacrifice" (Lit. Gall. 57). But from what have they been dismissed? It is used when no previous service is implied as by Gregory of Tours, who says of a queen of the Franks that, after passing a night watching, she in the morning "missas expetiit revocari"[a] (Mirac. S. Mart. i. 12). He relates also of his own mother, that, being warned by a vision that an epidemic would attack her house, she heard a voice at the same time saying, "Vade et vigila totam noctem in honore (S. Benigni) et revoca missas" (Mirac. i. 51). Similarly Venantius Fortunatus: "Vigiliis in honore Sancti celebratis, ac missâ revocatâ, de praesenti curata est" (Vita S. Germani, 60; Migne, 88, col. 472); and again of queen Radegund: "Missâ revocatâ.... sacrum componit altare" (Vita, 14; u. s. col. 503). It will be observed that in all these cases a special mass performed at request is implied, for which without doubt the person mentioned supplied the materials directly or indirectly. In the first instance it is said that the queen "offered many gifts." The original notion is, therefore, probably, to supply or furnish a mass; for "revocare" often = "reddere." Thus, "Eulogius revocans Domino rerum" (Vita Frontonii in Rosweyd, 240); and (completely to our purpose) St. Aridius in his will directs that several persons benefited by it, "singulis mensibus eulogias vicissim ad missas nostras revocent" (ad calc. Opp. S. Greg. Tur. 1312). "Missam revocare" means, therefore, we conceive, to cause a mass to be celebrated, supplying the means. The same Aridius, ordering matins and a mass to be maintained by his monks for ever, expresses himself thus: "Ut....maturius matutina et missa sanctorum domnorum a monachis ibidem revocetur" (ibid. 1314).

(11.) Missam spectare. The Council of Orleans, 538: "Sacrificia matutina missarum sive vespertina ne quis cum armis pertinentibus ad bellorum usum spectet" (can. 29). Gregory of Tours: "Rex ecclesiam ad spectanda missarum solemnia petit" (Hist. Franc. viii. 7); "Ad basilicam...properavit, quasi spectatura missas" (ibid. ix. 9; see also x. 8, and S. Mart. Mir. iii. 19). This phrase was so familiar to Gregory that he falls into the use of it even when speaking of a blind man: "Cum reliquo populo missarum solemnia spectaret" (S. Mart. Mir. ii. 13).

(12.) Missam tenere. This idiom is clearly distinguished from missam facere by the council of Agde, A.D. 506: "Si qui in festivitatibus... in oratoriis, nisi jubente aut permittente episcopo, missas facere, aut tenere, voluerint, a communione pellantur" (can. 21). Here missam tenere is evidently said of the lay attendant. In canon 47 this is expressed: "Missas Die Dominico a saecularibus totas teneri speciali ordinatione praecipimus." So Gregory of Tours of a layman: "Procedens nobiscum ad ecclesiam missarum solemnia tenuit" (Hist. Franc. vi. 40). But the second council of Bracara, 560 or 563, appears to use it of priest and people both: "Si quis quintâ feriâ paschali, quae est Coena Domini, horâ legitimâ, post nonam jejunus in ecclesia missas non tenet....anathema sit" (can. 16). In the Rule of St. Benedict it is also used of the celebrant, as when providing for the reception of a priest into his monastery he says, "Concedatur ei....post abbatem stare et benedicere, aut missas tenere, si tamen jusserit ei abbas" (c. 60; Holst. ii. 55).

(13.) Missam tractare. "Non licet presbytero aut diacono, aut subdiacono post acceptum cibum vel poculum missas tractare" (Conc. Autiss. A.D. 578, can. 19). Ducange finds the expression in an edict of Hunneric already cited in (1): "Missas agere, vel tractare"; but this is a mistake. The context ("quibus voluerint linguis populo tractare") shews that "tractare" must be taken by itself, and that it means, as in other authors, to expound the Scriptures.

MISSAL (Liber Missalis, Missalis, Missale). [W. E. S.] I. The later missal contains the lessons and antiphons, as well as the canon, proper prayers or collects and prefaces, to be used at the celebration of the Eucharist throughout the year. Originally, however, the book so called did not contain either the lessons or antiphons. This is evident from the fact that the lectionary and antiphonary are often spoken of as books distinct from the missal, and that we have independent examples of both remaining. [See ANTIPHONARIUM; LECTIONARIUM.] Egbert of York, A.D. 732, who is, we think, the earliest writer who speaks of a Liber Sacramentorum under the name of missal, says, "Our master the blessed Gregory in his antiphonary and missal book (Missali libro)" (De Instit. Cathol. xvi. 1). We have that "missal book" (the Gregorian Sacramentary), and find in it neither antiphons nor lessons. Again: "Not our antiphonaries only bear witness, but those very copies which we have seen with their missals at the thresholds of the apostles Peter and Paul" (ibid. 2). He ordered that all who desired to be ordained priests should previously provide themselves with "a psalter, lectionary, antiphonary, missal (missale), baptismal office, martyrology . . . . and computus with cycle" (Can. de Remediis Peccatorum, i.). Charlemagne in 789: "If there be occasion to write out a gospel (i.e. a book of the gospels) or psalter and missal, let men of full age write them" (Capit. i. 70; in Capit. Reg. Franc. i. 68; vi. 371). Alcuin in 796: "Missas quoque reliquas de nostro tuli missali ad quotidiana et ecclesiasticae consuetudinis officia" (Ep. 46, ad Monach. Vedast. i. 59, ed. 1777); "Misi chartulam missalem vobis" (Ep. 192, ad Mon. Fuld. 256). Ludovicus Pius, 816: Bishops are to "take care that the presbyters have a missal and lectionary or other books necessary for them well corrected" (Capit. 28; sim. Cap. R. Fr. i. 103; vi. 229). A copier of books, writing about 826 to an old friend who had become archbishop of Mentz, says, "Send me some good parchment for writing out one lectionary and one Gregorian missal" (Iatto Otkero, inter Epist. Bonifacianas, 138; ed. Wurdtw.). Amalarius, 827: "The authors of the lectionary and antiphonary, and of the missal of which we believe the blessed Pope Gregory to be the author" (De Eccl. Off. iv. 30); "It is found written in the ancient books of missals and antiphonaries" (ibid. iii. 40). There were in 831 in the monastic library of St. Riquier at Centule several books known as missals: "Tres missales Gregoriani, missalis Gregorianus et Gelasianus modernis temporibus ab Albino (Alcuino) ordinatus. . . . missales Gelasiani xix." (Chron. Centul. iii. in Dach. Spicil. ii. 311; Par. 1723). The Gelasian Sacramentary (and, we may add, the Leonian) resembled the Gregorian in consisting of prayers and prefaces only. Had Alcuin inserted the lessons and antiphons, a circumstance so unusual would certainly have been noticed. They were probably distinct books for a century at least after his time. Thus Walter of Orleans, A.D. 867, orders his clergy to "have the church books, to wit the missal, gospel (evangelium = evangeliarium, as in the law of Charlemagne), lectionary (= epistolarium), psalter, antiphonary, martyrology and homiliary, by which to instruct himself and others" (Capitula, 7). An episcopal charge of that period says, "Let your missals, graduals, lectionaries and antiphonaries be complete and perfect" (App. ad Reginonis Discipl. Eccl. 505; ed. Baluz.).

II. We do not read of Missalia Plenaria (or Plenaria) before the 9th century, but they are then spoken of in such a manner as to shew that they were neither new nor of recent introduction. A will is extant, written about the year 840, which bequeaths "a plenary missal with the gospels and epistles" (Testam. Heccardi in Perard, Pièces servant à l'Histoire de Bourgogne, 26). We gather from this that a plenary missal of those days did not contain the eucharistic lessons. Leo IV., A.D. 847, in some instructions to his clergy: "Let every church have a plenary missal and lectionary and antiphonary" (De Curâ Past.; Labbe. Conc. viii. 36; sim. Ratherius of Verona, ibid. ix. 1271; and again Admonitio Synodalis, App. ad Regin. u. s. 503). The question was asked at visitations whether all the clergy were possessed of those several books, "Missalem plenarium, lectionarium, antiphonarium" (Inquisitio 10, apud Regin. u. s. 7). The missale plenarium of a later age contained the lessons and antiphons as well as the collects and prefaces (Merati in Gavanti; Observ. Praelim. i. 4); but it is clear from the foregoing testimonies, though the fact has escaped Ducange, Bocquillot, and others, that they were not included in the volume to which that name was originally given. Gerbert appears to be right in thinking that at first the plenary missal was a sacramentary which gave the missae for every day, and not those for Sundays and other chief festivals, or for other special use, alone (Disquis. ii. i. 29, p. 108; ii. 1, p. 116). There was a missal of the latter kind written in the 8th century in the library of St. Gall, and later examples are extant (ibid. 108). The missal which Alcuin mentions in his epistle to the monks of St. Vedast cited above was apparently one of this sort. It may well be doubted whether plenary missals in the other and later sense existed within our period. Gerbert (116) says that he never saw a MS. of that description belonging to the 9th century. No Roman missal of that age contains even the epistles and gospels. In France, however, the lessons without the antiphons had occasionally been incorporated with the missae long before; for we find them in the Besançon Sacramentary, which is assigned to the 7th century (Mabill. Mus. Ital. i. 275), though not in the other Gallican missals, which date from the eighth (Liturg. Gallic. Mabill. 175), or in the Frankish which Mabillon ascribes to the seventh (ibid. 178). A very ancient Tabularium or Polyptychon preserved at Rheims, the exact date of which, however, is not given, also points to France as the country in which the amalgamation began; for it mentions as one book, "a missal of Gregory with the gospels and lessons (= epistles)" (in Notis Baluz. Capit. Reg. Fr. ii. 1155).

Other information respecting missals will be given under SACRAMENTARY.

MISSI DOMINICI. The word missus is frequently found in Capitularies, designating a messenger, ambassador, or deputy. Commissioners named by the king, with a kind of vice-regal power within certain limits, were called missi regis. Of these there were in the Carolingian period two classes: (1) the ordinary missi dominici or dominicales, regales, fiscales, palatini principales, often called missi simply; and (2) extraordinary missi (legati or nuncii) appointed for special emergencies. It is with the first that we are here concerned.

Pepin (Capit. Aquitan. A.D. 768, c. 12, Pertz, Mon. Germ. iv. 14) ratifies the decisions of "missi nostri" whether in relation to church or state; but the more complete development of the system belongs to the age of Charles the Great. Probably with a view of diminishing the excessive power of the dukes, who exercised both judicial and administrative functions in their territories, he transferred to missi dominici the charge of taking account of any complaints that might be made against bishops, abbats, or counts, or other holders of similar offices (Capit. an. 779, c. 21; Capit. Papiense, an. 789–790, c. 10; Capit. Generale, an. 789, c. 11; in Pertz, iii. 38, 71, 69). After Charles became Roman emperor, he named secular and spiritual persons together on these commissions. In a capitulary of Aachen (Cap. Aquisgran. an. 802, Pertz iii. 91 f), he declares that he has chosen from his nobles as well archbishops as bishops, abbats and religious laymen, and given them charge over the whole of his kingdom; he grants to all his subjects to live according to right law by their means; and he requires the commissioners to note any points in which the law appeared defective, and report them to him, that he may amend them. For the purposes of this supervision, the empire was divided into circuits (missatica, legationes), coinciding generally with the province of a metropolitan, unless where the great extent of the province rendered a subdivision necessary; thus Mentz is said to have contained four circuits and Rheims two. In general two commissioners, a [illegible] bishop, bishop or abbat, and a count, [illegible]ed for each circuit (Pertz, iii. 97, 98), [illegible]sionally three or four. The missi rece[illegible] written instructions, and the emperor frequently gave them oral directions also (Pertz, iii. 121). As they were the immediate instruments of the central power, no part of the administration lay entirely beyond their sphere. They were (1) to enforce the due execution of the laws, both in church and state (Capit. an. 802, cc. 25, 26; cf. cap. missorum an. 806, c. 2, &c. Pertz, iii. 137, 164). (2) Suits not decided by the counts or their deputies they might themselves judge, for which purpose they were to hold assizes four times a year, in January, April, July, and October (Capit. Aquisgran. an. 812, c. 8; Pertz, iii. 174). (3) They were especially to look to the due maintenance of the arrangements for levying troops (Brev. Capit. an. 803, Pertz, iii. 119). (4) They were to have the oversight of public lands, whether belonging to the state or to the church. Registers or "terriers" of all landed estates were consequently required by them. Not only were the benefices of bishops, abbats, abbesses, and counts or vassals of the king to be described, but also those belonging to the fisc (Capit. Aquisgr. an. 812, c. 7; Pertz, iii. 174).

To facilitate the carrying out of their several duties, the missi held provincial courts, to which were summoned the higher dignitaries of the clergy, the counts and other officials, the king's vassals, &c. Those who did not appear were reported to the general court of the king (Cap. misso data an. 803, c. 5; Pertz, iii. 122).

The missi were to report to the king the results of their mission, both orally and in writing (Cap. ad leg. miss. an. 817, c. 13; Pertz, iii. 217). Cases of special difficulty were referred to the decision of the king himself (Capit. an. 803; Pertz, iii. 121). The decisions of the missi in any case required the king's confirmation (Capit. an. 812, c. 10; Pertz, iii. 174, &c.), so that in practice an appeal lay from the missi to the king.

These missi dominici continued in full activity until the dissolution of the Frank-Carolingian empire. As the central power declined, the functions of the missi were partly absorbed by the dukes in their several dominions, partly supplanted by new offices. In several dioceses the bishops acquired the rights once enjoyed by them (see e.g. Conventus Turonensis, an. 876, c. 12, in Pertz. iii. 531). (Jacobson in Herzog's Real-Encyklop. ix. 549 ff.; Gengler, Germanische Rechtsdenkmäler, Glossary, s. v. Missus.) [C.]

MISSIONS. 1. Though Christian Missions had their origin in the example and command of our Lord Himself (Matt. xxviii. 19, 20), yet, as has been often noticed, the church can tell but little of her earliest teachers. Three only of the Saviour's immediate followers hold any immediate place in the apostolic records. We are told, indeed, of the labours of St. Andrew in Scythia (Euseb. H. E. iii. 1), of St. Thomas in India, of St. Matthew in Aethiopia (Fabricii Lux Evang. pp. 92–115), but the very scantiness of these notices proves how little that is reliable has come down to us respecting the work of the founders of the earliest churches.

2. Moreover, this comparative silence extends to the records of the succeeding centuries. We know that the church gradually extended her conquests through Asia Minor, Greece, Italy, Southern Gaul and Northern Africa (Justin, Dial. c. 117; Tertull. Apol. 37; Adv. Jud. 7), the very centre of the old world and of its heathen culture, but there is little information to be found which bears upon the exact processes adopted in securing these triumphs.

3. Prayers, indeed, for the conversion of the heathen were early recognised as proper to Christian devotion, and are to be found in the liturgies alike of Eastern and Western churches [HEATHEN, p. 761], but we look in vain for any traces of actual organisations for this end.

4. In the first instance, as we might expect, the diffusion of Christianity proceeded from the evangelising labours of individual bishops and clergy. It was naturally regarded as part of their duty to win over to the faith the heathen that dwelt around them. Thus ULPHILAS, A.D. 325, the "Apostle of the Goths," devoted himself, heart and soul, to the conversion of his countrymen, and of the populous colony of shepherds and herdmen, which he had formed on the slope of Mt. Haemus. (See The Life of Ulphilas, by bishop Auxentius, published by Waitz, of Kiel, 1840.) Thus, also, Eusebius, bishop of Vercelli, A.D. 370, made his cathedral church the centre of a wide mission field, and St. Chrysostom founded, at Constantinople, A.D. 404, an institution, in which Goths might be trained and qualified to preach the gospel to their own people (Theodoret, H. E. v. 30); nor even during the years of his exile amongst the ridges of Mt. Taurus, did he forget those toiling in far distant mission-fields. In several extant epistles we find him advising the dispatch of missionaries to various places, consoling some under persecution, animating others by the example of the great apostle St. Paul, and soliciting funds for supporting mission stations. (St. Chrysost. Opp. iv. pp. 729, 747, 748, 750, 799; Le Quien, p. 1099, § 14.)

5. But missionary zeal is "essentially the child of faith," and has depended, in all ages, on the varying spirituality of the several branches of the church. The great evangelising efforts of the early church were mainly those of the West. The Thebaid, it is true, sent forth its hosts of monastic missionaries, who penetrated the country districts of the East, which still remained sunk in idolatry, even when Christianity had been acknowledged and protected by the state, and sowed the seeds of knowledge in the region of Phoenicia, on the one side, and beyond the Euphrates on the other. But even before the famous churches of the East had become the prey of the anti-Christian armies of Mahomet, lethargy and inaction, as regards Christian missions, crept over them, and the work either ended altogether or notoriously declined. "One by one, that glorious centre of light, knowledge, and life, which the Anthonys, the Hilarions, the Basils, the Chrysostoms had animated with their celestial light, were extinguished, and disappeared from the pages of history. Eastern monachism could neither renovate the society which surrounded it, nor take possession of the pagan nations, which snatched away, every day, some new fragment of the empire." (Montalembert, Monks of the West, i. 376, 377; Stanley, Eastern Church, p. 34; Milman, Latin Christianity, ii. 163.)

6. And even when we pass to the West, we must not expect speedy or immediate results. Herself scarcely recovering from the shock of change, the church found herself confronted with strange nations, of strange speech, and still stranger modes of life, who poured forth to fill the abyss of servitude and corruption, in which the empire had disappeared. They overran Gaul, Italy, Spain, Illyria, all the provinces in their turn. Chaos seemed to have come back to earth, and the agitations of society needed to be allayed, before mission work could be organized, or even effectually commenced.

7. But even now efforts were not wanting to deal with the inveterate paganism of the old world and the torrent of the northern invaders. From the islet of Lerins, off the roadstead of Toulon, where, in A.D. 410, a Roman patrician, Honoratus (S. Hilarii Vita S. Honorati, ap. Bolland, t. ii. Januar.), found a monastic home, went forth an influence, which created numerous missionary centres in Southern and Western Gaul, and sent bishops to Arles, Avignon, Lyons, Troyes, Metz, Nice, and many other places, who proved themselves at once the lights of their own dioceses, and the leading missionaries of their day amongst the outlying masses of heathendom.

8. When Clovis, in A.D. 493, became the single sovereign of the West who adhered to the confession of Nicæa, it might have been expected that the work of the numerous emissaries from Lerins would have been supplemented by the newly kindled ardour of the Frankish church.[a] And for a time orthodoxy advanced side by side with Frankish conquests. But the wars and dissensions of the successors of Clovis were not favourable to the development of Christian missions. Avitus of Vienne; Cæsarius of Arles, and Faustus of Riez, proved what might be done by energy and self-devotion. But the rapid accession of wealth more and more tempted the Frankish bishops and abbats to live as mere laymen, and so the clergy degenerated, and the light of the Frankish church grew dim. Not only were the masses of heathendom lying outside her territory neglected, but within it she saw her own members tainted with the old leaven of heathenism, and relapsing in some instances into the old idolatries. (Perry's Franks, p. 488.)

9. A new influence was, therefore, needed if the heathen tribes of Europe were to be evangelised, and He who had said, "Behold, I am with you alway, even unto the end of the world" (Matt. xxviii. 20), did not fail His church. He called the men who were to do the work, from two sister isles, high up in the northern seas, which had almost been forgotten amidst the desolating wars of the Continent. It was in the secluded Celtic churches of Ireland and the Scottish Highlands that the beacon was kindled, which, in the words of Alcuin, "caused the light of truth to shine to many parts of the earth."

10. Three well-marked stages distinguish the missionary history of the fifth and three following centuries:—

(a) A.D. 430–650.—While continental Europe was still agitated by the inroads of swarming tribes of barbarians, Ireland, unvisited by strange invaders, drew from its conversion by ST. PATRICK an energy which was simply marvellous. A burst of popular enthusiasm welcomed his preaching, and Celtic Christianity flung itself, with a zeal that seemed to take the world by storm, into battle with the mass of heathenism which was rolling in upon the Christian world. COLUMBA, the founder of Iona, and the Apostle of the Albanian Scots and Northern Picts; Aidan, the Apostle of the Northumbrian Saxons; COLUMBANUS, the Apostle of the Burgundians of the Vosges; Callich, or GALLUS, the Apostle of North-Eastern Switzerland and Alemannia; KILIAN, the Apostle and Martyr of Thuringia; VIRGILIUS, the Apostle of Carinthia, are but a few out of many,[b] who were raised up to pour back with interest upon the Continent the gifts of civilisation and the Gospel. "Armies of Scots" crowded to the shores of Europe. From the Orkneys to the Thames, from the sources of the Rhine to the shores of the Channel, from the Seine to the Scheldt, the missionary work of the "Scot" extended, nor did it hesitate to brave the dangers of stormy and icy seas, in bearing the message of the Gospel to the Faroe Isles, and even to far distant Iceland.

(b) A.D. 596–690.—Again, when the conquest of Britain by the pagan English had "thrust a wedge of heathendom" into the heart of the great Christian communion of the West, and the British church failed to evangelise her pagan invaders, GREGORY the Great sent AUGUSTINE to the "men of Kent." Thus, in the very year that Columba breathed his last, the Roman missionaries landed, and slowly but surely won their way. Any ground they lost was more than recovered by the missionaries from Iona, who planted churches in the wilds of Suffolk (Bede, H. E. iii. 19), and on the coast of Essex, converted Mercia (Bede, H. E. iii. 21), and made Lindisfarne to Northumbria (Bede, H. E. iii. 13) what Luxeuil was to Switzerland. The disciples of Columba and the disciples of Benedict met in the land of the fair-haired Saxon boys, whom Gregory encountered in the forum of Rome (Bede, H. E. ii. 1), and between them not only won it over to the faith, but prepared its sons to transmit the light they had received to the heathen tribes of still pagan Germany.

(c) A.D. 620–755.—For, thirdly, when the Teuton of the Continent was crying from his native forests, like the Macedonian of old, "Come over and help us" (Acts xii. 9), eminent Anglo-Saxon missionaries flocked forth to rival the zeal of the followers of Columbanus in seeking the conversion of their kinsmen according to the flesh. Ground was first broken by the enterprising WILFRITH, who in his flight from his English diocese, in A.D. 678, was flung by a storm on the coast of Friesland, where he was hospitably received by the native chief, Aldgis, and appears to have reaped a harvest of conversions. (Bede, v. 19; Vita S. Wilfridi Episcopi, in Acta SS. Bened. saec. iii.) His work was taken up about twelve years afterwards by WILLEBRORD,[c] a native of Northumbria, who, having been a student in one of the Irish monastic schools under Ecgberht, agreed, at his suggestion, to select eleven companions, and made the neighbourhood of Wilteburg, Utrecht, the chief scene of his labours (Vita S. Willibrordi, in Acta SS. Bened. saec. iii.; Annales Xanteses in Pertz, ii. 220; Bede, H. E. v. 10). His mission attracted many English helpers from their native land. Two brothers, named HEWALD, attempted to preach the word to the "old" or continental Saxons (Bede, H. E. v. 10), and sealed their devotion with their blood; SWITHBERT, having been ordained a missionary bishop by Wilfrith (Acta SS. Bened. iii. 586), laboured amongst the Boructuarians, whose territory lay between the Ems and the Yssel; Adelbert,[d] a prince of the royal race of Northumbria, selected the north of Holland as the scene of his toils; Werenfrid made Elste his headquarters; Plechelm, also, Otger and Wiro, came forth to labour amongst the natives of Gueldres (Lingard, Anglo-Saxon Church, ii. 334); while Wursing,[e] a native of Friesland, and other pupils of Willebrord, enlarged materially the sphere of his operations.

But the vast Teutonic pagan world had as yet been but partially assailed. The task of encountering German idolatry in its strongholds was reserved for a man of Devonshire, the well-known Winfrith, or as he was afterwards called BONIFACE (Pertz, Mon. Germ. ii. 334 sq.; cf. Bonifacius, der Apostel der Deutschen, Seilleurs, Mainz, 1845). He came forth first to help Willebrord at Utrecht, then to labour in Thuringia and Upper Hessia, then to do for Germany what Theodore had done for England, consolidate the work of earlier missionaries, and impart to the churches new stability and life. From England he attracted numerous and enthusiastic helpers. His kinsmen Wunibald and Willibald (Acta SS. Bened. III. ii. 176), their sister Walpurga, with thirty companions, and many others, crossed the sea, and shared the work in Germany, where, even before Boniface fell a martyr on the shores of the Zuyder Zee, the church had advanced beyond its first missionary stage. Monastic seminaries, as Amöneburg and Ordruf, Fritzlar and Fulda had risen amidst the Teutonic forests. The sees of Salzburg and Friesingen, of Regensburg and Passau, testified to his care of the church of Bavaria; the see of Erfurt told of labours in Thuringia, that of Buraburg in Hesse, that of Würzburg in Franconia; while his metropolitan see at Mainz had jurisdiction over Worms and Spires, Tongres, Cologne, and Utrecht. (Willibald, Vita S. Bonifacii, § 22; comp. Vita S. Columbae, Reeves, Adamnan, pp. 245, 299; Vita S. Wilibrordi, Acta SS. Bened. saec. iii. p. 354; Bede, v. 10.)

11. Two classes of missionaries were thus engaged in the conversion of Europe. The one laid the foundations, the other raised the superstructure. The first were mostly hermits and ascetics, the second disciples of Benedict, gifted with greater power of practical organisation, and a deeper knowledge of human nature.

(a) The Celtic pioneers.—Strange, indeed, to heathen Suevians and Alemannians must have appeared the Irish and Caledonian missionaries. Travelling generally in companies[f]—their outfit a short pastoral staff (Cambuta Jonae, Vita S. Columbani; Reeves, Adamnan, p. 324), a wallet containing food, a leathern bottle for water or milk (Vita S. Columbae, ii. 38), a case for the service books,[g] they took ship and landed either at one of the ports along the mouths of the Loire, or one of the harbours of Flanders. Thus, after paying their devotions at the shrine of St. Martin of Tours, or St. Hilary of Poitiers, they would hurry on to the nearest frontier of heathendom from the Vosges mountains along the Rhine to the lake of Constance, or in the Jura. Before long the scene under the oaks of Derry or in sea-girt Hy was reproduced in the heart of Europe.[h] At Annegraz and Luxeuil, the huts were of willow, switches, and brushwood; the [d] He also was a Northumbrian (Bede, v. 11).

[e] See the account of him in the Vita S. Liudgeri, c. 1–4, in Pertz, Mon. Germ. ii. 405, 406. Willibrord was also assisted by Wulfram, bishop of Sens. (Vita S. Wulframni, Acta SS. Bened. saec. iii. i. 342.)

In the Ulster Journal of Archaeology, vii. p. 303, it is stated that "the Irish anchorets were in the habit of painting their eyelids. Stigmata, signa, pictura in corpore, quales Scoti pinguntin palpebris." (Hattener, Denkmäler, i. 227, 237; see also a curious paper on the Chronicon Jocelini de Brakelonda, printed by the Camden Society, 1840.)

little chapel, with the round tower or steeple by its side;[j] the refectory, the kitchen, the byre for the cattle, the barn for the grain, and other buildings. Here these "soldiers of Christ,"[j] as they loved to style themselves, settled down, and lived and prayed and studied and tilled the waste. Men of learning, devotion, and singular missionary zeal, they soon impressed the hearts of wild heathen tribes. Hundreds flocked to listen to their religious instruction. Hundreds more, encouraged by their example, took to clearing and tilling the land. Luxeuil became the missionary capital of Gaul, and sent out its colonies into Burgundy, Rauracia, Neustria, Brie, Champagne, Ponthieu; reproduced the Scottish Brechin and Abernethy at St. Gall and Bobbio, and forced the careless Frankish churchmen for very shame to rouse themselves to the duties of missionary work.

(b) The English missionaries.—Thus these Celtic pioneers laid the foundations. Exactingly ascetic, they awed the heathen by their indomitable spirit of self-sacrifice, and the sternness of their rule of life. The singular success of their missions in Northumbria and Mercia, Essex and Suffolk, was even more completely realised on the continent; Luxeuil began with thatched hovels, poverty, and hunger; it ended by becoming the University of Burgundy and France. But the work, great as it was, lacked the element of permanence, and it became clear that if Europe was to be carried through the dissolution of the old society, and missionary operations consolidated and united, the rigours of the rule of Columbanus must be softened, and a milder and more practical system must be inaugurated, before the Teuton of the German forests could be effectually evangelised. The crisis was a momentous one, but it had already produced a Benedict. With his marvellous genius for organisation, he arose to inaugurate a new missionary era, and to give to missionaries a more definite unity of plan. [BENEDICTINE RULE AND ORDER.] And now, just when they were most wanted, his disciples, the sons of the new-planted English churches, came forth to their Teutonic kinsmen. Teutons themselves, they were fitted, like no others, to be the apostles of Teutons. The monastic missionary became the coloniser.[k] The labours of WILFRID and WILLIBRORD, in Frisia, were quickly supplemented and absorbed by the work of the great Apostle of Germany. What BONIFACE did at Fulda is a type of what the English Benedictines did everywhere. With practised eye they sought out the proper site for their monastic home; saw that it occupied a central position with reference to the tribes, amongst whom they proposed to labour, that it possessed a fertile soil, and was near some friendly water-course. (Comp. the foundation of the monastery of Fulda, so graphically described in the Vita S. Sturmi, Pertz, Mon. Germ. ii.) These points secured, the word was given, the trees were felled, the forest was cleared, the monastic buildings rose. The voice of prayer and praise awoke unwonted echoes in the forest glades. The brethren were never idle; while some educated the young, whom they had often redeemed from death or torture, others copied manuscripts, illuminated the missal, or transcribed a gospel. Others, again, cultivated the soil, guided the plough, planted the apple-tree or the vine, arranged the beehives, erected the water-mill, opened the mine, and thus, with wonderful practical aptitude for the work, presented to the eyes of men the kingdom of Christ, as that of One who had redeemed the bodies no less than the souls of His creatures.[l] No wonder that the efforts of St. Boniface and of his enthusiastic followers attracted the hearts of the heathen tribes. "The experience of all ages," it has been remarked, "teaches us that Christianity has only made a firm and living progress, where from the first it has brought with it the seeds of all human culture, although they have only been developed by degrees." (Neander, Light in Dark Places, p. 417).

12. Thus the prominence of the monastic orders in the missionary work of this period is clearly marked. Monasticism founded the Celtic churches in Ireland and Scotland; fled with the British churches to the fastnesses of Wales and Cumberland, from the Saxon invaders; returned with Augustine to the coast of Kent; with Aidan peopled the Farne Islands; with Columbanus penetrated the forests of Switzerland; with Boniface civilised Thuringia and Frisia; with Sturmi cleared the forests of Buchonia, and made Fulda an outpost of civilisation for the Teuton tribes, with its dom-church and schools, library and farmsteads, the influences of which were felt for years and years afterwards. But however the seeds of the gospel may have been sown in any place, whether by the influence of a Christian queen, or the faithfulness of Christian captives, uniformly, in conformity with apostolic practice, the management of the infant churches was entrusted to a local episcopate. Sometimes a bishop headed, from the first, the body of voluntary adventurers. More often, as soon as any considerable success had been achieved, one of the energetic pioneers was advanced to the episcopal rank, and in this capacity superintended the staff of clergy accompanying him,[m] and as soon as possible ordained a native ministry from amongst the newly converted tribes, and established a cathedral, or corresponding ecclesiastical foundation. (Comp. the consecration of Swithbert by Wilfrid for the mission in Friesland, Bede, H. E. v. 11.) Such a provision had recommendations of a most practical character. Already, before the inroad of the new races, the bishops had become not only a kind of privy council to the emperor, but were regarded in well nigh every town as the natural chiefs. They governed the people in the interior of the city; they alone stood bravely by their flocks when the barbarous host appeared before the defenceless walls; they alone, while the civil magistrate and military leaders often sought refuge in flight, were found able and willing to mediate between their people and the heathen conqueror. It is no wonder, then, that on the conversion of any district, the native king or chieftain was glad to have near him one who could assume the functions of the pagan high priest, and was bound by the duties of his office to stand between the noble and the serf, and defend the helpless and distressed, and intercede for the criminal. [BISHOP.] Nor were the bishops' diocesan synods unimportant agents in developing missionary work. We find them from time to time not only settling ecclesiastical questions, but grappling with grave moral and social evils. We find them forbidding the sacrifice of men and animals in honour of the heathen gods; the exposure of weak or deformed infants; the worshipping of groves and fountains; the practice of idolatry and witchcraft (Vita S. Bonifacii, c. 8; Conc. Turon. c. 22; Conc. Germ. c. v.). We find them inculcating a due regard for the sacredness of human life, striving to abolish slavery, to elevate the peasant classes, and to secure regular forms of law (Greg. Ep. ii. 10, vi. 12; Bede, H. E. iv. 13; Thorpe, Anglo-Saxon Institutes, ii. 314).

[j] Each professed his willingness to enter the world only as an athleta Christi in the propagation of the gospel (Reeves, Adamnan, p. 341).

[m] Even in the Columbian monasteries there were always bishops connected with the society, subject to the abbat's jurisdiction, who were assigned their stations, or called in to ordain, being looked upon as essential to the propagation of the church. (Reeves, Adamnan, p. 341; Todd, St. Patrick, 4-10.)

13. It is true that the converts, in whose interest these enactments were made, were too often admitted into the church by national and seemingly indiscriminate baptisms. Still it is to be borne in mind that the missionaries of the period had unusual difficulties against which to contend. Not only was society generally relaxed, not only were the recipients of the rite bound by peculiar ties to their native chiefs, but they were in a position very different from the converts of the apostolic age. No preparatory dispensation had made monotheism natural to them, or taught them, "line upon line," those elementary truths, which appear to us so easy to apprehend, because we have lived in an atmosphere permeated with their influence. They were not "proselytes of the gate," but infants in knowledge and civilisation, and they were admitted to "infant baptism" by teachers often themselves imperfectly educated, but who were "faithful in the few things" they did know, and were so made, in time, "rulers over many things."

14. We have, however, traces of a system of missionary instruction which is well-deserving of attention. From first to last it was pre-eminently objective. It dealt mainly and simply with the great facts of Christianity, with the incarnation of the Saviour, His life, His death, His resurrection, His ascension, His future coming, and then it proceeded to treat of the good works which ought to flow from a vital reception of these truths. Thus—

(a) To the Celtic worshippers of the powers of nature, and especially of the Sun, the Apostle of Ireland proclaimed the existence of one God, the Creator of all things, and then went on to dwell upon the life, death, resurrection, and ascension of His only begotten Son Jesus Christ, who is the true Sun, who was in the beginning before all, unbegotten, and from whom all things take their beginning, both visible and invisible. (S. Patricii Confessio; O'Connor, Script. Hibern. i. pp. cviii., cxvii; comp. also what is known as St. Patrick's Hymn, Todd, pp. 426–428.)

(b) Similarly, Augustine, in Kent, directed the attention of the royal worshippers of Woden and Thor to the picture of the Saviour on the cross (Bede, H. E. i. 25; Vita S. Augustini, ii. 16), and then, according to subsequent tradition (recorded by Alfric and expanded by Jocelin, Migne, Patrologia, saec. vii. 61), went on to tell him of such events in His wondrous life as were likely to make an impression on his mind; how for us men, and for our salvation, He became incarnate; how at His birth a star appeared in the East; how He walked upon the sea and calmed the storm; how at His death the sun withdrew his shining; how He rose from the dead, and ascended into heaven, and will come again to judge the quick and the dead.[a]

(c) The arguments of Oswiu, king of Northumbria, in his exhortation to Sigeberct, king of Essex, are mainly directed to the strain of the old Hebrew prophets against the absurdities of idolatry, and the folly of a system which taught the worship of deities that might be broken, absent, or trodden under foot. From the adoration of such gods he bids his royal brother turn to the true God, the Creator of all things, who is invisible, omnipotent, eternal, who will judge the world in righteousness, and reward the good with everlasting life.[b]

(d) The correspondence of Daniel, bishop of Winchester, with his friend and fellow-countryman, the martyr Boniface, is very remarkable. While deprecating any violent and useless declamation against the native superstitions, he suggests to the great missionary that he should put such questions as would tend to suggest the contradictions of heathenism, especially in reference to the genealogy of the gods, the temporal disadvantages which pagan superstitions entailed upon those who held them, and so lead on his hearers gently to Christian truth. (See Migne, Patrologia, saec. viii. p. 707.)

(e) The fifteen sermons of the great Apostle of Germany shew that he required of his converts something far more real than a merely superficial form of Christianity. The subject of the first is the "right Faith," in which he expounds the doctrine of the Trinity, the relation of baptism to the remission of sins, the resurrection of the dead, the future judgment, and the necessity of repentance. The second, preached on

[a] With this sermon of Augustine compare (i.) a sermon of St. Eloy, Vita S. Eligii, ii. c. 15; Surius, Acta SS. i. 784; Pertz, Mon. Germ. ii. 14, Vita S. Galli. (iii.) The first, ninth, and tenth of the 'Instructions' of Columbanus, Migne, Patrologia, saec. vii.

[b] Bede, H. E. iii. 22. Though, during the mission of Paulinus in Northumbria, Coifi, the chief priest, regards the new faith as merely worthy of a trial, like the systems of heathenism, and a question of temporal advantage, yet it is counterbalanced by the parable of the thane on the briefness and uncertainty of life, which strikes a deeper chord and betrays a yearning for the gospel of a life beyond the grave. (Bede, H. E. ii. 13.)

Christmas Day, is concerned with the creation of man, his fall, the promise of a Saviour, His advent, and the story of Bethlehem. The fourth treats of the "Beatitudes;" the fifth, of "Faith and the Works of Love;" the sixth, seventh, eighth, and ninth, of "Deadly Sins and the Chief Commandments of God;" the tenth and eleventh treat more fully of Man's Fall, of the Redemption wrought by Christ, His Sufferings, Death, Resurrection, and Future Coming. (Ib. saec. viii. 813.)

(f) Further information on the same point is supplied in the correspondence of Alcuin with the emperor Charlemagne.[p] In teaching those of ripe years, he says that order should be strictly maintained, which the blessed St. Augustine (de Catechizandis Rudibus) has laid down in his treatise on this subject. (1.) A man ought first to be instructed in the immortality of the soul, in the future life and its retribution of good and evil. (2.) He ought, secondly, to be taught for what crimes and sins he will be condemned to suffer hereafter, and for what good works he will enjoy eternal glory. (3.) He ought most diligently to be instructed in the doctrine of the Trinity, in the advent of the Saviour, His life, passion, resurrection, ascension, and future coming to judge the world. Strengthened and thoroughly instructed in this faith, let him be baptized, and afterwards let the precepts of the gospel be further unfolded by public preaching, till he attain to the measure of the stature of a perfect man, and become a worthy habitation of the Holy Ghost.[q]

15. Of vernacular translations, indeed, of the Scriptures and Liturgy, except in the Eastern church, we find, naturally, little trace in the missionary annals of this period.[r] Ulphilas, indeed, composed an alphabet for his Gothic converts, and translated for them the Scriptures into their own language, but it does not seem to have occurred to the missionaries of the West that this was one of the most important requisites for following up oral instruction.[s] All languages besides Latin and Greek they deemed barbarous, and shrank from giving them a place in the sacred services of the church. It is with misgiving that we think of Augustine at the court of Ethelbert, addressing his hearers through "the frigid medium of an interpreter." It is easier to imagine how Boniface and his disciples,[t] coming forth from the first Teutonic church, which remained Teuton, found access, through their own tongue, to the hearts of the tribes of Germany. Still, even in the English church, the mother-tongue was never entirely banished from the services. The Synod of Cloveshoo (A.D. 747) enacted that the priest should learn to translate and explain in the native language the Creed, the Lord's Prayer, and the sacred words used at the celebration of the mass, and, in the office of baptism, while individual prelates insisted on the need of clergy able to instruct their people in the elements of Christian knowledge. (Spelman, Concilia, p. 248; Johnson, English Canons, i. 247; comp. Bede, Ep. ad Ecgberctum, § 3; and Charlemagne, Capitul. § 14; i. 505.) A short form of abjuration of idolatry and declaration of Christian faith in the vernacular language is preserved among the works of Boniface (Migne, Patrologia, saec. viii. 810), and the work of Ulphilas for the Goths was followed up in some measure by Aldhelm's version of the Psalter (Wright, Biog. Brit. Lit. i. 222), and Bede's version at least of the Gospel of St. John, while Caedmon's Metrical Paraphrase was an earnest of the new grandeur, depth, and fervour which the German race was to give to the religion of the East. (Bede, H. E. iv. 24; Caedmon's Paraphrase, ed. Thorpe, p. 47.)

16. One point more remains to be noticed. It is impossible to pass in review the missionary history of the church from the sub-apostolic age to that of Charlemagne, without being struck with the slow and gradual steps by which each important triumph of the faith was won. The conversion of Europe, for instance, is sometimes spoken of as though it was an event of speedy accomplishment. It requires an effort to realise the fact that the close of the eighth century, to which our review has brought us, did not see even the half of Europe won over, even in the most nominal form, to the Cross of Christ. The whole of the great Scandinavian peninsula, all Bulgaria, Bohemia, Moravia, Russia, Poland, Pomerania, Prussia, and Lithuania remained to be evangelised. In most of the countries no missionary had ever set foot, or if he had, was obliged to retire at once before the furious opposition of heathen tribes. Even at the close of the fourth century, after Christianity had enjoyed, during more than sixty years, the sunshine of imperial favour, the Christians at Antioch, a city which had well-nigh greater spiritual advantages than any other, constituted only about half of the population (Chrysostom, Op. tom. ii. 567; vii. 810), and more than fifty years after the conversion of Constantine, the cultivated and influential classes of old Latin Rome still remained heathen,[u] while the word "peasant," synony-

[q] This doubtless in his school at York Alcuin himself taught Alubert and Liudger, when they returned from their labours in the Frisian mission field. (Vita S. Liudgeri, Pertz, Mon. Germ. ii. 407.)

[r] The Eastern church acted as if by intuition from the beginning, on the principle that the language of every nation, not one peculiar to the clergy, is the proper vehicle for public worship and religious life. (Stanley, Lectures on the Eastern Church, p. 309.)

[s] Gibbon, iv. 33; Müller, Lectures on the Scienc of Language, p. 175; Davidson, Biblical Criticism, p. 676. This same feeling led, also, in the East to the Coptic, Armenian, and Ethiopic versions of the Scriptures.

[t] The course of instruction preparatory to missionary work which Sturmi underwent is worthy of notice: "Psalmis tenaci memoriae traditis, lectionibusque quam plurimis perenni commemoratione functis, sacram coepit Christi per Scripturam spiritualiter intelligere sensu, quatuor Evangeliorum Christi mysteria studiosissime curavit addiscere. Novum quoque ac Vetus Testamentum, in quantum sufficiebat, lectionis assiduitate in cordis sui thesaurum recondere curavit." (Vitis S. Sturmi Abbatis, Pertz, Mon. Germ. ii. 366.)

[u] In the 5th century Leo, bishop of Rome, deplores the deep corruption even of Christian society, and adjures his flock not to fall back into heathenism. The old heathen cultus, particularly that of the sun (Sol invictus) had formally entered itself into the Christian worship of God. Many Christians, before entering the basilica of St. Peter, were wont to mount the platform in order to make their obeisance to the rising luminary. (Merivale, Conversion of the Northern Nations, p. 179.)

mous with "unbeliever," tells its own tale. Slow, however, as was the actual rate of progress (Milman, Latin Christianity, ii. 225), there never was a period during these centuries when the flood was not really rising, though the unobservant eye might not detect it. Periods of marvellous acceleration are followed by periods of no less singular retardation, and in the darkest times there were ever some streaks of light, and the leaven destined to quicken the mass of society was never wholly inert or ineffectual. Who, in the fifth century, would have believed that in the wild destroyers and supplanters of the ancient civilisation of Rome were the fathers of a nobler and grander world than any that history had yet known? This wonderful transition is now a thing of the past. It is an accomplished fact. But it was a transition which, as we have seen, was slowly and gradually brought about. Shall we be surprised if, in this matter of slow development, the history of Christian missions should repeat itself? [G. F. M.]

MISSIS, martyr; commemorated in Cyprus Feb. 20 (Hieron. Mart.). [C. H.]

MISSORIUM. Gregory of Tours (Hist. Franc. vi. 2) tells us that Chilperic shewed him "missorium magnum quod ex auro gemmisque fabricaverat in quinquaginta librarum pondere." Flodoard also (Hist. Remen. ii. 5) speaks of a silver-gilt missorium given to the church of St. Remi at Reims. A missorium is defined by Macro (Hierolex. s. v.) to be "vas seu theca;" by Ducange (Gloss. s. v.) to be "lanx seu discus." The weight of 50 pounds seems excessive for a plate or paten, and suits better the notion of a shrine or reliquary. Dom Bouquet (on Gregory, l. c.) says that some take missorium to be an "abacus cum omni suppellectile." [C.]

MITRE (κίδαρις; Mitra, Tiara, Infula). The allusions to a head-dress of any description worn by Christian ministers as part of their official dress, which we meet with during our period of 800 years, or indeed before A.D. 1000, are decidedly rare; and as a rule must be considered of very doubtful character. These we shall presently discuss at length, but we shall speak briefly first of the head-dresses worn by Jewish priests and high-priests, since some would maintain that there is a distinct continuity between the Jewish and Christian churches in the matter of vestments.

The cap worn by ordinary Jewish priests is called מִגְבָּעָה (Exod. xxviii. 40, xxix. 9, xxxix. 28; Lev. viii. 13), for which the LXX gives κίδαρις,[a] a word which we shall have to consider subsequently in its Christian connection. It was made of fine linen folded together several times and fitting closely to the head (Josephus, Antiq. iii. 7. 3, where see Havercamp's note)[b]. Josephus speaks of it as πίλος ἄκωνος, and compares it to a στεφάνη; but the exact shape is not certainly known, whether it be a high conical cap, rounded off at the top (so Bock, Liturg. Gewänd. vol. i. p. 346 and plate ii. [which is reproduced in Marriott, Vestiarium Christianum, plate viii.], following Braunius, de habitu sacerdotum Hebræorum, p. 518, who, however, does not speak very definitely: also Hefele, Beiträge, vol. ii. p. 225), or, as Marriott (p. 234), more like a skull cap, fitting to the shape of the head, "like a sphere divided in twain."

The cap of the high priest is styled מִצְנֶפֶת (Exod. xxviii. 4, 37, 39; xxix. 6; xxxix. 28, 31; Lev. viii. 9; xvi. 4), for which the LXX gives μίτρα or sometimes κίδαρις. The meaning of the root verb is to wind, the cap being doubtless akin to what we should call a turban. This, like the cap of the high-priest, was made of fine linen, but differed from it (to say nothing of a difference in general shape), in that on the front of it was a plate of gold (צִיץ); in the LXX πέταλον; in the Vulgate lamina) attached to a band of blue lace, whereby it was fastened to the mitre. On this plate was engraved Holiness to the Lord. The description of Josephus (Ant. iii. 7. 7; see also Bell. Jud. v. 5. 7) refers to a triple crown worn over the linen cap, doubtless a later addition to the original form, and probably implying a quasi-royalty on the part of the wearer.

We now pass to the Christian church. Here the two most commonly found terms for the ecclesiastical head-dress are mitra and infula, though, as we have already implied, early satisfactory instances of their use are hardly forthcoming. The general history and usage of the two words is curiously unlike. The Greek word μίτρα is connected with μίτος a thread, and has the two meanings of a girdle and a head-dress. Confining ourselves to the latter sense, we find the mitra as a cap worn by women. Thus Isidore of Seville (Etymol. xix. 31, 4) says of it "est pileum Phrygium caput protegens, quale est ornamentum capitis devotarum. Sed pileum virorum est, mitrae vero feminarum."[c] It was worn also by Asiatics without distinction of sex, and seems, as we may infer from Isidore, to have been specially characteristic of the Phrygians (see e.g. Virg. Aen. ix. 616).[d] We have already referred to the use of μίτρα in the LXX, and in the Vulgate we find mitra as one of the renderings of מִצְנֶפֶת (e.g. Exod. xxix. 9), the [a] In one passage (Exod. xxxix. 28 [xxxvi. 36, LXX]) it would seem at first sight that μίτρα was their rendering, but it seems to us that in the expression τὰς κιδάρεις . . . καὶ τὴν μίτραν it is more probable that the order of the two words has merely been interchanged, for it will be noticed that the first is plural and the second singular, instead of vice versâ.

[b] Josephus speaks of it as μασναεμβῆρ. This is of course the Hebrew מִצְנֶפֶת, which is the term for the mitre of the high-priest. Probably by the time of Josephus the word was used in a wider sense, and so we find it in Rabbinic Hebrew.

[c] A mitra, in addition to a veil, was placed on the head of a virgin when she was consecrated to a "religious" life (Martene, de Rit. Eccl. II. iv. 13).

[d] This cap will be remembered by its revival during the first French revolution.

other words put for it being cidaris and tiara.

Totally different in its origin from the mitra, the cap of women and effeminate men, is the infula, the fillet which decked the head of heathen priests and sacrificial victims. It is thus defined by Servius, "fascia, in modum diadematis a quo vittae in utraque parte dependent, quae plerumque lata est, plerumque tortilis de albo et cocco" (in Virgil. Aen. x. 538; see also Isidore, Etym. xix. 30, 4, where the above definition is cited). We several times find Virgil speaking of the sacrificing priest as wearing the infula (e.g. Aen. ii. 430, x. 538). Again, the victims about to be sacrificed, whether beasts or men, were decked with the infula (Virg. Georg. iii. 487; Lucretius i. 87; Suet. Calig. 27). In the last cited passage, the case is that of a gladiator, who, having been guilty of cowardice, was "verbenatus et infulatus" prior to execution

We shall now proceed to consider, seriatim, the cases adduced of the use of some kind of head-dress as part of the official dress of the Christian ministry in primitive times. The earliest instance is one which can perhaps hardly be strictly called a head-dress, but is sufficiently near to justify its presence here, and concerns no less a person than the apostle St. John. The passage in question occurs in a letter sent by Polycrates, bishop of Ephesus, to Victor, bishop of Rome (A.D. 192–202), on the subject of the Eastern controversy (Euseb. Hist. Eccles. v. 24; also cited in part, iii. 31: cf. also Jerome, de Viris illustribus, c. 45), in which he cites the names of different Asiatic bishops and martyrs who are claimed as having held to the Asiatic practice. Amid this enumeration we read, "Yea moreover John too, he who lay on the Lord's breast, who became a priest wearing the golden plate (ὃς ἐγενήθη ἱερεὺς τὸ πέταλον πεφορεκώς), and a witness and a teacher—he sleepeth in Ephesus." Before expressing any opinion as to the meaning of this passage, we shall cite a somewhat parallel instance from a later writer, Epiphanius. The reference has here been to Christ, as heir of the throne of David, which is a throne not only of royalty but also of priesthood. The Saviour thus stands at the head of a line of high-priests; James, the Lord's brother, being, as it were, successor, in virtue of his apparent relationship, and thus becoming bishop of Jerusalem and president of the church. "Moreover also we find that he exercised the priestly office after the manner of the old priesthood; wherefore also it was permitted to him once in the year to enter into the Holy of Holies, as the law commanded the high-priests, according to the Scripture. For so many before our time have related concerning him, as Eusebius[a], and Clement and others. Further, it was permissible for him to wear the Golden Plate[b] upon his head (ἀλλὰ καὶ τὸ πέταλον ἐπὶ τῆς κεφαλῆς ἐξῆν αὐτῷ φέρειν), as the above-mentioned trustworthy writers have testified." (Haer. xxix. 4; vol. i. 119, ed. Petavius.)

The word πέταλον, it will be remembered, is that employed by the LXX to designate the ציץ worn on the high-priest's forehead, and there can be no doubt, therefore, when we consider that the LXX would be the ordinary Bible of Polycrates and Epiphanius[c], that the meaning intended to be conveyed is either that these apostles actually wore on their foreheads a gold plate, in direct imitation of that of the Jewish high-priest[d], or that the language is distinctly and wholly metaphorical, meaning that each of these two apostles occupied in his turn the same position to the Christian church that the Aaronic high-priest had to the Jewish church. The question, it is evident, must mainly turn upon the words of Polycrates, whose position, both in date and locality, would make him an important witness as to St. John. Here, though it is impossible to feel positive and maintain that St. John certainly wore no such ornament, we feel that it is far more likely that the language is to be viewed as allegorical—(1) because of the allegorical character of the passage generally [cf. e.g. μεγάλα στοιχεῖα κεκοίμηται, etc.], on which see Lightfoot, Galatians, p. 345 n. (ed. 4); and (2) because the perfect participle seems very strange, if it were merely meant to indicate that St. John was in the habit of wearing the πέταλον. If that participle points rather to "a state or condition resulting from a past act," then the statement becomes simple enough if we assume that Polycrates aims at bringing out the fact of "the supreme apostolic authority of St. John, whose office in the Christian church was to bear rule in spiritual things over the spiritual Israel, even as the high-priest of old over Israel after the flesh" (Marriott, p. 39 n.). One thing, at any rate, is plain enough: if St. John and St. James, or either of them, did wear this ornament, it was an ornament special to themselves, and ceased with them, affecting in no sense the further use of the church.

The next instance we shall cite is from the oration delivered by Eusebius[i] on the consecration of the great church at Tyre (Hist. Eccles. x. 4). This highly rhetorical discourse begins with an address to Paulinus, bishop of Tyre, and his assembled clergy, as "friends of God and priests (ἱερεῖς), who are clad in the holy robe that reacheth to the feet, and with the heavenly crown (στέφανον) of glory, and with the unction of inspiration (τὸ χρῖσμα τὸ ἔνθεον) and with the priestly vesture of the Holy Ghost." Here

[a] This allusion is perhaps to be referred, considering the mention of the πέταλον that follows, to the above-cited letter of Polycrates. The passage of St. Clement, however, does not appear to be extant.

[b] Binterim (Denkw. i. 2. 352) cites from the proceedings of the eighth general council (fourth of Constantinople, A.D. 869), from a letter of Theodosius, patriarch of Jerusalem, to Ignatius, patriarch of Constantinople, in which the writer says that he sends as a present the long robe and superhumeral and mitre (mitra in Anastasius's Latin), adding that his predecessors had been successively decked with this sacred garb (Labbe, viii. 987). In any case, however, a late 9th-century tradition such as this need not detain us.

[c] It may be noted that in translating the extract from Polycrates, Jerome renders πέταλον by lamina, the word he had used in the Vulgate for the gold plate of the high-priest.

[d] Hefele (p. 225) remarks that though we are to take the πέταλον of St. John in its technical sense, neither Polycrates nor Eusebius asserts it to have been of gold. This, however, seems needless quibbling; if the word is supposed to be used technically the rest will follow.

[i] There can be no reasonable doubt that by the τις παρελθὼν Eusebius simply means himself. Hefele (Beiträge, p. 226) strangely makes Paulinus the speaker.

the rhetorical character of the whole discourse suggests that the above words are by no means improbably used in quite a figurative sense, and have reference to the spiritual characteristics of the new covenant, in contradistinction to the externals of the old. Hefele too, who argues strongly for the early use of the mitre, is not disposed to claim this passage in support of his view, but is evidently inclined to explain the στέφανος of the tonsure, which often goes by that name. At any rate, it is clear that no very certain conclusions can be built upon this example. Our next passage is in some respects similar. It occurs in one of the discourses of St. Gregory of Nazianzum (ob. A.D. 389), where he addresses his father, then bishop of Nazianzum, who sought to associate his son with him in the duties of his office. In the course of this he remarks, "therefore thou anointest the chief priest, and clothest him with the robe reaching to the feet, and settest the priest's cap [τὸν κίδαριν; one of the LXX words, it will be remembered, for the priestly and high-priestly head-dresses] about his head, and bringest him to the altar of the spiritual burnt-offering, and sacrificest the calf of consecration, and dost consecrate his hands with the Spirit, and dost bring him into the Holy of Holies." (Orat. x. 4; Patrol. Gr. xxxv. 829.) This citation may perhaps be assumed as evidence for the use of some kind of clerical head-dress in St. Gregory's time, but of what kind, or under what conditions worn, or whether the whole passage is to be viewed as allegorical, must remain doubtful. Much certainly in the passage is highly figurative, as the allusion to the calf, and to the Holy of Holies; which, so far as it goes, would be distinctly in favour of the latter view.

Some writers cite as evidence for the early use of some kind of mitre, a passage from Ammianus Marcellinus (xxix. 5), where he describes the outbreak of an African chief, named Firmus (A.D. 372). Against him was sent Theodosius, afterwards emperor, by whom the rising was completely crushed, and Firmus compelled to sue for peace. The historian, a heathen, speaks of the sending of "Christiani ritus antistites, oraturos pacem." Two days after, Firmus restored "Icosium oppidum . . . . militaria signa et coronam sacerdotalem cum caeteris quae interceperat." When Hefele (p. 227) can remark on this that thereby "is plainly meant the Infula of that bishop whom the heathen Africans had shortly before slain in the regions of Leptis and Ona" (op. cit. xxviii. 6), it may most decidedly be objected—(1) that the connecting of the two events, and indeed the assumption that the person slain (Rusticianus sacerdotalis) was a Christian, or that, if a Christian, he would have a "crown" at all, is a distinct begging of the whole question; and (2) that it is far more reasonable to understand by the corona sacerdotalis (the phrase used, it will be remembered, by a heathen) the golden crown, which abundant illustrations shew to have been worn by heathen priests. (See e.g. Tertullian, de Spectaculis, c. 23; de Idololatria, c. 18 [where see Oehler's note]; de Corona Militis, c. 10. We may also appeal to a canon of the council of Elvira, which is sufficiently curious to be given at length: "Sacerdotes qui tantum coronam portant, nec sacrificant, nec de suis sumptibus aliquid ad id praestant, placuit post biennium accipere communionem." Concil. Illib. can. 55; Labbe, i. 976.)

Equally inconclusive, in our opinion, is the series of passages quoted by Hefele and others, in which the infula is mentioned in connexion with Christian vestments. In classical usage, the word infula was not confined to the more special meaning we have already dwelt on, but drifted into the meaning of ornaments and insignia of magistrates, or even into that of a magistracy itself. [See examples quoted from the imperial codes and elsewhere, in Forcellini s.v.] In later ecclesiastical Latin again, we find the word distinctly used for a chasuble (see e.g. Hugo de S. Victore Spec. Eccl. 6, Patrol. clxxvii. 353; see also Ducange s.v.), apparently as being the official vestment par excellence. We should thus be prepared to argue that, in the absence of evidence pointing the other way, the natural explanation to give to these earlier allusions to a Christian infula is that the word betokens, in a half poetic sense, the official dress, and indeed hardly more than the quasi-official position of ordained persons. The allusions cited are the following. The Christian poet Prudentius, when dwelling on the names of famous martyrs connected with the city of Saragossa, says (Peristeph. iv. 77 sqq.)—

> "Inde, Vincenti, tua palma nata est,
> Clerus hic tantum peperit triumphum,
> Hic sacerdotum domus infulata > Valeriorum,"

where the concluding reference is to Valerius, bishop of Saragossa. The whole poem, however, is written in a highly-wrought strain of metaphor, and is a palpable imitation of classical imagery. This is quite sufficient to shew that no special stress can be laid here on the word infulata.

About a century later Gelasius (ob. A.D. 496) speaks of certain characteristics in a person rendering him "clericalibus[b] infulis [where the plural is noticeable] reprobabilem" (Epist. ix. ad episcopos Lucaniae, § 9; Patrol. lix. 51). Again in a biography [Hodoeporicon] of Willibald, a disciple of St. Boniface, written by a contemporary nun of Heidenheim, it is remarked on the consecration of Willibald as a bishop, that "sacerdotalis infulae ditatus erat honore" (c. 11; in Canisius, Thesaurus ii. 116). In a biography of Burckhard of Würzburg, another disciple of St. Boniface [probably written two hundred years after the time of St. Boniface, but before

[b] Hefele dwells on the adjective clericalibus, as implying a head-dress distinct from that worn by laymen, and cites Ducange (Glossarium, s. v. infula) who quotes the order of a synod which prohibits clerics from wearing an infula "de seta sive serico more laicali." Again, an ancient statute ordains that, except in case of necessity, clerics are not to wear "vestes saeculares," or "infulam seu pileum de die in capite," and, in case of disobedience, beneficed clergy are to be fined a year's income. On this it may be remarked that (1) the date of the above mentioned synod is given by Ducange as A.D. 1311, and the statutes are of the date A.D. 1289 (Martene, Anecd. iv. 671), and therefore are not relevant to the present matter; (2) the prohibition in the former citation evidently refers to the material of the infula; and (3) to allow that at a given time clerics wore head-dresses of a different shape from laymen, is quite a different thing from allowing that the head-dress formed a part of the official dress or entered in any sense into official ministrations.

A.D. 984; Rettberg, Kirchengesch. Deutschlands ii. 314], Burckhard is spoken of as "pontificali infula dignus" (see Acta Sanctorum, Oct. vol. vi. 574), and the then pope is said to be "summi pontificatus infulae non incongruus." On all the above instances it may be remarked that while they allow us to explain them if we will of a Christian official head-dress, they most certainly cannot be considered as evidence compelling us to such a belief; and in the absence of any direct trustworthy evidence from ancient pictures of the existence of such a head-dress, and considering the known later use of the term infula, we cannot but feel that the probability inclines strongly against those who claim the above series of passages as establishing the ancient use of a mitre.

Two more passages which have been cited are absolutely of no weight. The first is a line from Ennodius, a poet of the fifth century, with reference to St. Ambrose, "Serta redimitus gestabat lucida fronte[a] (Epig. 77; Patrol. lxiii. 318), but the context, even the following line alone, serves to shew that we are dealing with metaphor and not with fact—"distinctum gemmis ore parabat opus." Finally, in a poem (Paraenesis ad Episcopos) of Theodulf of Orleans (ob. A.D. 821), we are met with the line, "Illius ergo caput resplendens mitra tegebat" (lib. v. carm. 3, sub fin.; Patrol. cv. 380). The whole context, however, as Marriott has plainly pointed out, is dwelling on the contrast between the splendour of the Jewish high-priestly dress and the spiritual character which should be the ornament of the Christian minister. This contrast is elaborately worked out, and the line immediately following the one we have quoted is "contegat et[1] mentem jus pietasque tuum."

On a general survey of the foregoing evidence, it may, at any rate, be safely asserted that no case has been at all made out for a general use of an official head-dress of Christian ministers during the first eight or nine centuries after Christ. Many of the passages adduced in favour of such a view have been shewn to be, if not quite inconclusive, at any rate of very doubtful character. Hardly one can be called definite, plain or positive. Also, if direct evidence is sought on the other side, we may again appeal to a treatise of Tertullian we have already cited (de Corona Militis, c. 10). The words "Quis denique patriarches .... quis vel postea apostolus aut evangelista aut episcopus invenitur coronatus?" ought to be definite enough, as shewing the usage in his time. When, further, as we have already remarked, the remains of early Christian art, which can really be considered trustworthy, furnish no evidence whatever for the use of such a head-dress, but distinctly point the other way; we feel, that while not venturing altogether to deny the possible existence, of a local or temporary kind, of a mitre or head-dress, here and there, we may still fairly say with Menard that "vix ante annum post Christum natum millesimum mitrae usum in ecclesia fuisse" (Greg. Sacr. 557). Menard justly insists on the fact that in numerous liturgical monuments (e.g. a mass for Easter Day in the Cd. Ratoldi [written before A.D. 986], where the ornaments of a bishop are severally gone through), as well as in writers who have fully entered into the subject of Christian vestments, as Rabanus Maurus, Amalarius, Walafrid Strabo, Alcuin (Pseudo-Alcuin), there is no mention whatever of a mitre.

Even a writer as late as Ivo of Chartres (ob. A.D. 1115), while describing the Jewish mitra, makes no mention of its Christian equivalent. There are good grounds, however, for believing that at first the mitre was an ornament specially connected with the Roman church, from whence its use spread gradually over Western Christendom, though this use had evidently not become universal in Ivo's time. We shall very briefly cite an instance or two to illustrate this Roman connexion. The following is the earliest adduced;[b] when the archbishop Eberhard of Treves was at Rome in A.D. 1049, Leo IX. placed on his head, in St. Peter's on Passion Sunday, the Roman mitre. The pope's words in the charter are "Romana mitra caput vestrum insignivimus, qua et vos et successores vestri in ecclesiasticis officiis Romano more semper utamini." (Ep. 3; Patrol. cxliii. 595; cf. also Ep. 77, op. cit. 703, where the same privilege is granted to Adalbert, bishop of Hamburg. We there read of the mitre, "quod est insigne Romanorum.") Again, a few years later, in A.D. 1063, Alexander II. granted to Burchard, bishop of Halbestadt, the privilege of wearing the archiepiscopal pallium and mitre, because of his special services to the Roman see. We cite in this case a clause of some interest, as shewing the concession of the use of the Roman mitre as not confined to the episcopal order: "Insuper mitras tibi ac successoribus tuis ac canonicis excellentioribus, scilicet presbyteris et diaconis in missarum solemnia ministraturis, subdiaconis in majori ecclesia tua et suprascriptis festivitatibus portandas concedimus" (Ep. 10, Patrol. cxlvi. 1287). In A.D. 1119, Calixtus II. grants the use of the "episcopalis mitra" to Godebald, bishop of Utrecht (Ep. 37; Patrol. clxiii. 1130). One more example may suffice. Peter Damian, in an indignant letter (c. A.D. 1070) to Cadalous, bishop of Parma, who was the anti-pope Honorius II., says scornfully, "habes nunc forsitan mitram, habes juxta morem Romani pontificis rubram cappam" (Epist. lib. i. 20; Patrol. cxliv. 242).

Any discussion as to the variation in form and material of this later mitre is quite beyond our purpose; suffice it to say that while the description of Honorius of Autun (Gemma Animae, i. 214; Patrol. clxxii. 609), in the twelfth century, still seems to point to a cap made of linen (mitra ex byso facta[a]), that of Innocent III. in the thirteenth, shews that in the case of the bishop of Rome, at any rate, it was made partly of gold, and approximated to its later shape (de sacro altaris mysterio, i. 60; Patrol. cxxii. 796).

[1] At is doubtless to be read as Marriott suggests.

[a] A possibly earlier instance is referred to by Marriott (p. 241), from a coin of Sergius III. (ob. A.D. 911), where the mitra is said first to appear as replacing an older papal head-dress, the Camelaucium. This, however, must perhaps not be pressed in the absence of confirmatory evidence.

[b] See for an example probably of this type, Marriott, plate xliv. (and cf. p. 220), figured from a MS. of the 11th century. This is the earliest example of the kind known to Marriott, except perhaps one in the Benedictional of St. Ethelwald, a MS. of the 10th century. Here, however, the figure wears a kind of gold circlet, which may indicate royal rank and not be an ecclesiastical head-dress in the strict sense at all.

It will have been observed that nothing has been said as to the restriction of the use of the mitre to the highest order of the clergy. On this, however, it can only be remarked that, as far as the first eight centuries at least are concerned, practically nothing from the whole of our scanty body of evidence is adducible. The mention of the infula in the life of Willibald has sometimes been cited, but we have already seen how slight is the basis on which the whole argument in connexion with the word infula rests.

In conclusion, the practice of the Eastern church may be most briefly referred to. Here the mitre, properly speaking, is unknown, and thus we find Symeon, archbishop of Thessalonica in the fifteenth century, declaring that all ecclesiastics, whether bishops or priests, except only the patriarch of Alexandria,[a] performed the sacred rites without any covering on the head (Expositio de divino templo, c. 45; Patrol. Gr. clv. 716; cf. Responsa ad Gabrielem Pentapolitanum, c. 20, ib. 871. Reference may be specially made to Goar, Euchologion, p. 314). In the Armenian church, however, bishops have, it is said since the eleventh century, worn a kind of mitre, apparently in imitation of Rome, the priests of that church wearing a kind of bonnet.

A passing allusion may be made here to the mitra virginum, mentioned by Isidore of Seville, which appears to have been worn in addition to the veil by those who made profession of virginity. Isidore remarks that such a person, "because she is a virgin, may display the honour of a hallowed body 'in libertate capitis' [cf. ἐξουσία, 1 Cor. xi. 10] and 'mitram quasi coronam virginalis gloriae in vertice praeferat'" (de Eccl. Off. ii. 17. 11; Patrol. lxxxiii. 807). Again, in a letter of St. Remigius of Rheims, to Clovis, condoling with him on the death of his sister Albofleda, who had died shortly after baptism, he says of her, "fragrat in conspectu Domini flore virginitatis, quo scilicet et corona, quam pro virginitate suscepit" (Ep. 1; Patrol. lxv. 965). The use of the mitra by professing virgins is alluded to by Optatus (de Schismate Donatistarum, ii. 19; Patrol. xi. 973; also vi. 4, ib. 1072, where see Dupin's note).

Literature.—For the matter of the foregoing article, I have to express my obligations to Hefele's essay, Inful, Mitra und Tiara in his Beiträge zur Kirchengeschichte, Archäologie und Liturgik, vol. ii. pp. 223 sqq.; Marriott, Vestiarium Christianum, pp. 187, 220, etc.; Binterim, Denkwürdigkeiten der Christ-Katholischen Kirche, i. 2. 348 sqq.; Bock, Geschichte der liturgischen Gewänder des Mittelalters, vol. ii. pp. 153 sqq.; Martene, de Antiquis Ecclesiae Ritibus, lib. i. c. 4, § 1; and Ducange, Glossarium, s. vv. Infula, Mitra. MITRIUS, martyr; commemorated Nov. 13 (Hieron. Mart.). [C. H.]

[a] Balsamon, cited by Goar (l. c.), derives this from the presidency of Cyril at the council of Ephesus. However, this need not be taken very seriously. The same writer and Symeon of Thessalonica absurdly refer the origin of the Roman mitre to a privilege specially granted by Constantine to pope Silvester.

MITTON, martyr; commemorated at Alexandria May 4 (Hieron. Mart.). [C. H.]

MITTUNUS (1) Presbyter; commemorated in Africa May 4 (Hieron. Mart.).

(2) Martyr; commemorated at Constantinople May 8 (Hieron. Mart.).

(3) Two martyrs; commemorated at Thessalonica June 1 (Hieron. Mart.). [C. H.]

MIXTUM or MISTUM. (1) A morning meal or "jentaculum" in monasteries, consisting of bread and wine only. (Reg. Bened.)

(2) The word mixtum is also used as equivalent to the Greek κρᾶμα, to designate the mixed chalice in the Eucharist. [ELEMENTS, p. 604.] [C.]

MNASON, of Cyprus; commemorated July 12 (Boll. Acta SS. July, iii. 248). [C. H.]

MOCIANUS, martyr with Marcus; commemorated July 3 (Basil. Menol.). [C. H.]

MOCIUS (1) Martyr; commemorated Jan. 29 (Cal. Byzant.).

(2) Reader and martyr; commemorated with bishop Silvanus and deacon Lucas Feb. 6 (Basil. Menol.)

(3) Presbyter, native of Byzantium, martyred under Diocletian at Heraclea; his relics deposited by Constantine in his great church at Constantinople; commemorated May 11 (Basil. Menol.; Cal. Byzant.); MOCIUS or MUCIUS, May 11 and 13 (Boll. Acta SS. May, ii. 620); a church dedicated to him and St. Menas at Constantinople (Codinus, de Aedif. 38). [MUCIUS (3).] [C. H.]

MOCTEUS (MOCHTEUS), Irish bishop, cir. A.D. 535; commemorated Aug. 19 (Boll. Acta SS. Aug. iii. 743). [C. H.]

MODANUS, perhaps a bishop, in Ireland, of the 6th or 7th century; commemorated Aug. 30 (Boll. Acta SS. Aug. vi. 565). [C. H.]

MODERAMNUS, bishop of Rennes, cir. A.D. 719; commemorated Oct. 22 (Boll. Acta SS. Oct. ix. 619). [C. H.]

MODERATA, martyr; commemorated at Sirmia Ap. 6 (Hieron. Mart.; Bed. Mart. Auct.). [C. H.]

MODERATUS (1) Martyr with Felix at Auxerre, probably in the 5th century; commemorated July 1 (Boll. Acta SS. July, i. 287).

(2) Bishop and confessor at Verona in the 5th century; commemorated Aug. 23 (Boll. Acta SS. Aug. iv. 596). [C. H.]

MODESTA (1) Martyr with Patricia and Macedonius at Nicomedia; commemorated Mar. 13 (Usuard. Mart.; Bed. Mart.); Modestia (Hieron. Mart.).

(2) Martyr; commemorated in Africa Ap. 6 (Hieron. Mart.). [C. H.]

MODESTINUS, martyr; commemorated Mar. 13 (Hieron. Mart.). [C. H.]

MODESTUS (1) Martyr; commemorated in Africa Jan. 12 (Hieron. Mart.).

(2) Martyr; commemorated in Africa Jan. 13 (Hieron. Mart.).

(3) Martyr with Posinnus; commemorated at Carthage Feb. 12 (Hieron. Mart.; Boll. Acta SS. Feb. ii. 580).

(4) Infant martyr, with Ammonius, at Alexandria; commemorated Feb. 12 (Usuard. Mart.; Bed. Mart. Auct.; Boll. Acta SS. Feb. ii. 580); Molestus (Mart. Rom. Vet.).

(5) Bishop of Treves, cir. A.D. 480; commemorated Feb. 24 (Boll. Acta SS. Feb. iii. 463).

(6) Presbyter; commemorated in Asia Mar. 12 (Hieron. Mart.).

(7) Martyr; commemorated at Caesarea Mar. 28 (Hieron. Mart.).

(8) Martyr, with Vitus and Crescentia; commemorated in Lucania June 15 (Hieron. Mart.; Usuard. Mart.); in Sicily (Vet. Rom. Mart.; Bed. Mart. Auct.).

(9) Levita, martyr at Beneventum in the 4th century; commemorated Oct. 2 (Boll. Acta SS. Oct. i. 325).

(10) Martyr; commemorated in Cappadocia Oct. 14 (Hieron. Mart.).

(11) Martyr with Euticus, Materus, Disseus; commemorated Oct. 21 (Hieron. Mart.; Boll. Acta SS. Oct. ix. 14; Bed. Mart. Auct.).

(12) Martyr with Afriges, Macharius, and others; commemorated Oct. 21 (Hieron. Mart.; Bed. Mart. Auct.; Boll. Acta SS. Oct. ix. 14).

(13) Martyr with Tiberius and Florentia at Agde; commemorated Nov. 10 (Usuard. Mart.).

(14) Martyr; commemorated at Syracuse Dec. 13 (Hieron. Mart.). [C. H.]

MODIANUS, martyr; commemorated at Rome June 2 (Hieron. Mart.). [C. H.]

MODIUS. The modius or bushel measure is sometimes represented on Christian tombs. Martigny refers to Lupi's Dissertations, &c., on the Epitaph of the Martyr Severus, p. 51, tab. viii., for the best known example. The inscription over a Christian named Maximinus says that "he lived 23 years the friend of all men;" and his effigy is carved on the stone with a rod in his hand, and a bushel full of corn, from which ears are springing, is placed near him. Padre Lupi thinks this is an allusion to Luke vi. 38—the full measure, pressed down and running over, which Maximus hoped for in death; or to the grain of corn sown and washing away in earth, to bear much fruit, John vii. 24. And he gives another example of the modius in Boldetti, p. 371, from the tomb of a Christian named Gorgonius. He observes, however, very sensibly and truly, that Maximus may have been a mensor cereris augustae, or have had some connexion with the corn-trade, and quotes a further instance of the modius on the tomb of a baker, one Vitalis (Bitalis), dated 401. There is no reason why the survivors should not have attached the symbolism of the Lord's wheat and garner, or of His reward, to the usual signs of the business in which the dead had been engaged; and some disputes might be saved as to Christian symbolism if we consider that in primitive days as well as our own, devout and imaginative people saw and delighted in meanings which may have been overlooked then, as now, by people equally good but more matter of fact. Martigny refers to his article, Instruments et Emblèmes représentés sur les tombeaux chrétiens, p. 324, Dict., the first part of which enumerates emblems of the trades of the smith, woolcomber, husbandman, baker, and surgeon. See Fossor.

I. GENERAL HISTORY OF MONASTICISM.—The history of monasticism is one of the strangest problems in the history of the world. For monasticism ranks among the most powerful influences which have shaped the destinies of Christendom and of civilisation; and the attempt to analyse it philosophically is more than usually difficult, because the good and the evil in it are blended together almost inextricably. To those who contemplate it from a distance, wrapped in a romantic haze of glory, it may appear a sublime and heroic effort after superhuman excellence. To others approaching it more nearly, and examining it more dispassionately, it seems essentially wrong in principle, though accidentally productive of good results at certain times and under certain conditions. They regard the blemishes which from the first marred the beauty of its heavenward aspirations, as well as the more glaring vices of its later phases, as inseparable from its very being. To them it is not so much a thing excellent in itself, though sometimes perverted, as a mistake from the first, though provoked into existence by circumstances, not an aiming too high, but an aiming in the wrong direction. By declaring "war against nature," to use the phrase of one of its panegyrists (Montal. Monks of the West, i. 357), it is, in their eyes, virtually "fighting against God." In their judgment it degrades man into a machine. In their estimation the monk shunning the conflict with the world is not simply deserting his post, but courting temptations of another kind quite as perilous to his well-being. In brief, far from being an integral and essential part of Christianity, it is in their eyes a morbid excrescence.

Monasticism, in the proper sense of the word, cannot be traced back beyond the 4th century. Almost from the very commencement of Christianity ascetics are mentioned (ἀσκηταί, σπουδαῖοι, ἐκλεκτῶν ἐκλεκτοτέροι), persons, that is, pre-eminent in the Christian community for self-denial and sanctity; but these were "in the world," though not "of it." In the 3rd century eremites or hermits began to form a distinct class in the East and in Africa; in the 4th they began to be organised in coenobitic communities. The origin of monasticism has sometimes been imputed to a growing indifference to faith in the Atonement (e. g. Hospinian de Orig. Monachatûs, Epist. Dedic.), but it would be easy to cite passages from Augustine and other panegyrists of monks conclusive against this theory as inadequate, if not altogether groundless. Rather the origin of the monastic life is to be found partly in the teaching of the schools of Alexandria, partly in the social state of the world external to Christianity. The luxury and the profligacy of the Roman empire even more than its outbursts of persecuting fury alienated the most earnest disciples of the Cross from taking their part in things around them and drove them far from the haunts of men, inspired by the passionate longing of the Psalmist for "the wings of a dove," that they might "fly away into the wilderness and be at rest." The causes at work were many and complex. To the timid and indolent the monastery was a refuge from the storms of life; it was a prop and a defence against themselves to the weak and wavering; to the fanatic it was a short and speedy way to heaven; to the ambitious, for the haughtiness which was its especial bane in later days, soon intruded into the cell, it was a pedestal from which to look down on the rest of mankind; to men of nobler temperament it seemed, according to the notions then becoming prevalent, the only fulfilment of what have been called "the counsels of perfection." (Chrys. adv. Opp. Vit. Mon. i. 7 et passim; Socr. H. E. iv. 23, 4; Soz. H. E. i. 12–15, iii. 14, vi. 28–34.)

Monasticism was not the product of Christianity; it was its inheritance, not its invention; not its offspring, but its adopted child. The old antagonism between mind and matter, flesh and spirit, self and the world without, has asserted itself in all ages, especially among the nations of the East. The Essenes, the Therapeutae, and other Oriental mystics, were as truly the precursors of Christian asceticism in the desert or in the cloister, as Elijah and St. John the Baptist. The Neoplatonism of Alexandria, extolling the passionless man above the man who regulates his passions, sanctioned and systematised this craving after a life of utter abstraction from external things, this abhorrence of all contact with what is material as a defilement. Doubtless the cherished remembrance of the martyrs and confessors who in the preceding centuries of the Christian era had triumphed over many a sanguinary persecution, gave a fresh impulse in the 4th century to this propensity for asceticism, stimulating the devout to vie with their forefathers in the faith by their voluntary endurance of self-inflicted austerities.

Some of the various terms used by early Christian writers for the monastic life shew how it was commonly regarded, and illustrate its twofold origin. The monks are frequently termed "the philosophers," and the monastery their "school of thought" (φιλόσοφοι; φροντιστήριον, σχολή, &c.), as the successors and representatives of Greek philosophy. They are termed "the lovers of God," "the servants of God" (φιλόθεοι, θεράπευταί, servi Dei, famuli Dei, &c.), as being the lineal descendants of Hebrew prophets and seers. As undergoing a discipline of extraordinary rigour, as inuring themselves to hardships, like good soldiers, stripping themselves of every encumbrance, and drilling themselves for the warfare with Satan, they are called "the renouncers," the "athletes of Christ," and the scene of their self-imposed toils and struggles is their "wrestling-yard" or "gymnasium" (ἀποταξάμενοι, renunciantes; παλαίστρα, ἀσκητήριον, &c.). They are called endearingly "fathers" (nonni, abbates), by way of affectionate reverence; "suppliants," as giving themselves to prayer (ἱκέται); "the angelic," as leading the life of angels (ἰσάγγελοι, coelicolae); "fellow-travellers" (συνοδῖται); "dwellers in cells" (cellulani). Their abodes are called "holy places" (σεμνεῖα), "seats of government" (ἡγουμενεῖα), "sheepfolds" (μάνδραι). The terms monastery (μοναστήριον), originally the cell or cave of a solitary hermit, laura (λαύρα), an irregular cluster of cells, and coenobium (κοινόβιον), an association of monks, few or many, under one roof and under one government, mark the three earliest stages in the development of monasticism. In Syria and Palestine each monk originally had a separate cell; in Lower Egypt two were together in one cell, whence the term "syncellita," or sharer of the cell, came to express this sort of comradeship; in the Thebaid, under the customs of Pachomius of Tabenna, each cell contained three monks. (Bened. Anian. Conc. Regul. c. 29; Cass. Instit. iv. 16; Coll. xx. 2; Pallad. Hist. Laus. c. 38; Soz. Hist. Eccl. iii. 14.) At a later period the monks arrogated to themselves by general consent the title of "the religious" (religiosi), and admission into a monastery was termed "conversion" to God. (Ferreol. Reg. Praef.; Smaragd. Vit. Bened. Anian. c. 56.)

Passages laudatory of monasticism abound in the Christian writers, both Greek and Latin, in the 4th and 5th centuries. Basil of Neocaesarea, one of the founders of monasticism in Asia, and his friend Gregory of Nazianzum, the learned Jerome in his cell at Bethlehem, and the eloquent Chrysostom in the midst of a noisy populace at Constantinople, profound thinkers and men of action like Augustine of Hippo and Theodoret of Cyrus, all vie with one another in reiterating its praises (Basil. Constit. Mon.; Gregor. Naz. Or. 12; Chrys. Vit. Mon.; Aug. de Mor. Eccl. 31, de Op. Mon. c. 28, etc.; Hieron. passim; Theodoret, Hist. Rel.; Epiphan. Ancor. 107, etc.). The great Augustine is said to have lived in a kind of monastery with the clergy of his cathedral; and by his eulogies of the monastic life in his 'Commentary on the 36th Psalm' to have won Fulgentius, bishop of Ruspe, in the 6th century, to become a monk himself. In one enthusiastic passage he expresses a fervent hope that monasticism may shoot out its branches and offshoots all over the world (De Op. Mon. 28). Jerome goes so far as to speak of embracing the monastic life as a kind of second baptism (Ep. 39, ad Paul.). And yet in the writings of those who extolled monasticism most highly there are cautions and warnings not a few against the dangers which beset it. Augustine, with characteristic insight into the strange contradictions of human nature, describes, almost as one of the greatest of modern painters has represented it on his canvas, the recoil of a novice on first entering a monastery from the vices and inconsistencies of some among its inmates (In Ps. c.; cf. Hieron. Ep. ad Rust. 125, ad Eustoch. 22). Pride was always the besetting sin of the cloister. Ambition and covetousness crept in even among those who had renounced the world, its pomps and vanities (Hieron. Epp. ad Rust. 125, ad Eustoch. 22; Aug. Ep. 60, ad Heliodor.), and sensuality assailed those who had retired, as they hoped, to a safe distance from the temptations of the flesh (Hieron. Epp. ad Rust. 125, ad Eustoch. 22). The loneliness, the silence of the cell, often brought on that torment of the over-scrupulous, a religious melancholy, and sometimes downright insanity (Hier. Ep. ad Rust. 125; Cass. Instit. v. 9). And though, as a rule, the monks were among the fiercest and noisiest champions of orthodoxy, at times, in their ignorance and isolation from the church at large, they were equally zealous for the extravagant notions of heretical fanatics (Sozom. H. E. i. 12). Whatever side they espoused, they were the fiercest of its partisans. In retaliations on the heathen for the cruelty which they had inflicted on the church, in putting down heresy by force, in extorting from the civil authorities the pardon of criminals, monks were ever foremost. By the advice of Gennadius, patriarch of Constantinople, and in consequence of the tumults in Antioch about Peter the Fuller, Leo the Thracian, in the middle of the 5th century, made an edict forbidding monks to quit their monasteries and excite commotion in cities (Milm. Hist. Lat. Christianity, i. 294). The outrages of the Nitrian monks against Orestes, the praefect, in their zeal for Cyril of Alexandria, of Barsumas and his rabble against Flavian of Antioch in the "robber council" of Antioch, and the ferocity which would not leave the saintly Chrysostom in peace even at the point of death, are no extraordinary instances of what the monks of the 5th century were capable of in their theological frenzies. By a strange, yet not uncommon inconsistency, the monk in his cell listened eagerly for the rumours of polemical controversy in the world which he had abjured, and reserved to himself the right of rushing into the fray, not as peacemaker, but to take part in the combat. They claimed for themselves an authority above that of bishops, emperors, councils. As in the Iconoclastic controversy, so generally they were on the side of superstition. The Egyptian monks clung tenaciously to their anthropomorphic conceptions of the Deity. One of them, an old man named Serapion, exclaimed with tears, on hearing that God is a Spirit, "They have taken away our God! We have no God now" (Cassian. Coll. x. c. 3; cf. Ruffin. de Verb. Senior. c. 21). Some monks in Asia Minor inculcated rigid abstinence generally, and condemned marriage as sinful (Soc. H. E. ii. 43, iv. 24; Concil. Gangr. c. A.D. 330, cc. 1, 2, 9). Antinomianism prevailed among some of the Mesopotamian monks in the 4th century (Epiphan. Haeres. lxx.). Augustine speaks of Manichaean tendencies among monks (De Mor. Eccles. i. 31).

In the 4th century the growing reverence for celibacy aided monasticism to make its way into almost every province of the Roman empire, the civilised world of that day. (Aug. de Mor. Eccles. i. 31; Theod. Hist. Eccl. 30). The elder Macarius in the Scetic or Scithic desert, the elder Ammon on the Nitrian mount, higher up the Nile Pachomius in the Thebais, treading in the footsteps of Antony, the celebrated hermit, founded enormous communities of monks, with some sort of rude organisation. The numbers of monks in Egypt thus herding together and withdrawn from ordinary duties of a social and political life, were reckoned at this time by thousands. (Soz. H. E. iv. 14, vi. 31; Cass. Inst. iv. 1.) In Syria Hilarion and his friend Hesychas, with Epiphanius, afterwards bishop of Salamis in Cyprus, in Armenia Eustathius, bishop of Sebaste, the first, according to some writers, to prescribe a monastic dress, in Asia Minor Basil, the first, to impose the vow (Soz. H. E. vi. 32; Hieron. Vit. Hilar.; cf. Helyot, Hist. des Ordres; Bulteau, Hist. des Moines d'Orient), led the way. In Africa the rage for the monastic life, according to Augustine, was chiefly among the poor (De Op. Mon. 22). The severe enactments of the persecuting emperor Valens were powerless to check the rush of popular feeling in this direction (Soc. H. E. iv. 24). Jerome speaks of multitudes of monks in India, Persia, Ethiopia (Ep. 107 ad Lact.).

From Syria and Egypt the passion for monasticism spread rapidly westwards. Severinus, called "the Apostle of Noricum," was a monk, like most of the great missionaries of this period, and propagated monasticism side by side with Christianity. The islands of the Adriatic sea soon swarmed with monks, nor were the isles in the Tuscan sea slow to follow their example (Hier. Ep. de Mort. Fabiol.; Hieron. Ep. 60 ad Helio.). About the middle of the 4th century, Athanasius, in his exile from Alexandria, sought shelter at Rome, and there, in the metropolis of the world (Aug. de Mor. Ecc. 33), the growing taste for monasticism enjoyed to the full all the advantages which his reputation for orthodoxy and sanctity could lend it, or which it could derive, half a century later, from Jerome's fervid and uncompromising advocacy. There was much in the monastic life thoroughly in keeping with what remained among Romans of their pristine sternness; it was a congenial reaction from the luxury and effeminacy of the day. Eusebius, contemporary with Athanasius, fostered it at Vercellae, in Northern Italy, where, as bishop, he resided under the same roof with some of his clergy, all living together by rule; and somewhat later, the illustrious Ambrose promoted its development in and about Milan, then, as now, one of the chief cities in that part of the peninsula (Aug. de Mor. Eccles. 33). Cassian, early in the 5th century, carried his experiences of eremitic and coenobitic life in Egypt and the Thebaid to Marseilles, already an important trading place, there establishing two monasteries, afterwards of great celebrity. He found similar institutions flourishing in the islands then called Stoechades, and now so familiar to invalids, off the southern coast of France, at Toulouse, and in the adjacent district, under the direction of Honoratus, Jovinianus, Leontius, and Theodorus. St. Martin, bishop of Tours (Caesarodunum), turned his episcopal palace into a monastery, and at his death was followed to the grave by 2000 monks (Sulpic. Vit. St. Mart.). In the earlier part of his life he had founded a monastery (Locogiagense. in modern times Ligugé), near Poictiers (Pictavium). One of his disciples, Maximus, founded a monastery on L'Isle Barbe (Insula Barbara) near Lyons, and another at Trier or Treves (Augusta Trevirorum) in the East. Romanus, a pupil of Benedict, of Monte Casino, with his brother. Lupicinus, faithful to their master's teaching, planted monasteries on the Jura mountains in the West, early in the 6th century (Mabill. Annal. O.S.B.). In Spain, probably from its proximity to Africa, and easy communication with that country, then the representative of Western or Latin Christianity, monasticism flourished at an earlier date even than in southern Gaul, under the auspices, apparently, in the first instance of an African named Donatus (Ildefons. de Vir. Illustr. iv.). So early as in A.D. 380 a decree of a council at Saragossa, forbidding priests to affect the dress of monks, shews that monasticism had even then made considerable progress in Spain (Concil. Caesaraugust. c. 6; cf. Mabill. Annal. O. S. B. iii. 38, 39). In the British Isles, monasticism flourished extensively long before the mission of Augustine to England; but the Roman missionaries on their arrival received anything but a cordial welcome from their British brethren, a feeling of mutual distrust and hostility arising from the differences which existed in ritual, costume, &c. But rapid as was the growth of monasticism, it had many and grave difficulties to contend with. The very enthusiasm in its favour, which the ardour of men like Jerome kindled among devout persons, only intensified in other quarters the bitterness and rancour of antagonism. The tumultuous uproar of the Roman crowd at Blesilla's funeral (Hier. Epp. 127 ad Princip. 39 ad Paul.) was a popular protest against the austerities which were supposed to have been the cause of her death. Salvian in the 5th century speaks of the unpopularity of the monks in Africa, and of the jibes and jeers which their pale faces and sombre dress excited in the streets (De Gubern. viii. 4). And though the imperial government on rare occasions, probably under some exceptional influence, shielded the monasteries, as when Justinian allowed minors and slaves to embrace the monastic life without the permission of their superiors (Cod. I. iii. 53, 55; Novell. v. 2), yet, as a rule, the civil power regarded with a not unreasonable jealousy the absorption of so many of its citizens into a current which withdrew them not for a time only but for life, for the obligation soon came to be considered a lifelong one (Aug. Serm. 60 ad Frat.), from all participation in responsibilities of a social and political nature.

From the first there was a marked contrast, which has been well expressed by the terms "endogenous" and "exogenous," between eastern and western monachism. The dreamy quietism of the East preferred silent contemplation of the unseen world to labour and toil; its self-mortification was passive rather than active. So far as it prescribed work at all, it was more as a safeguard for the soul against the snares which Satan spreads for the unoccupied, than with a view to benefiting others. Weaving mats and baskets of rushes or osiers was all that was required, as a harmless way of passing the time, or of busying the fingers while the thoughts were fixed on vacancy. The soft and genial climate, too, spared the Asiatic or the African the trouble of providing for his own daily wants and those of his brethren with the sweat wrung from his brow. And the same habit of indolent abstraction held him back from those literary pursuits, which were in many an instance the redeeming characteristic of the great monasteries of the West, even while it gave the rein to an abstruse and bewildering disputativeness, ever evolving out of itself fresh materials for disputing. In Europe it was quite otherwise. There, even within the walls of the monastery, was the ever-present sense of the necessity and the blessedness of exertion. There, the monk was not merely a worker among other workers, but by his vocation led the way in enterprises of danger and difficulty. Whatever time remained over and above the stated hours of prayer and study was for manual labours of a useful kind, and farming, gardening, building, out of doors and within the house, for caligraphy, painting, &c. The monks in Europe were the pioneers of culture and civilisation as well as of religion; usually they were the advanced guard of the hosts of art, science and literature. From this radical divergence of thought and feeling, two main consequences naturally followed. A less sparing, a more generous diet was a necessity for those who were bearing the fatigues of the day in a way which their eastern brethren could form no idea of. A more exact, a more minute arrangement of the hours of the day was a necessity for those who, instead of wanting to kill time, had to economise it to the best of their ability. The closer and more systematic organisation which, from the date, at least, of Benedict of Monte Casino, marked the monasteries of the West, and the more liberal dietary which he deliberately sanctioned were admirably adapted for the Roman and the Barbarian alike in the Europe of his day. To the one, with his innate and traditionary deference for law, the orderly routine of the cloister was infinitely preferable to the lawless despotism of the empire; and even the sturdy independence of the Goth bowed willingly beneath a yoke which it had chosen for itself without constraint.

> "Is ruth the prison unto which we doom > Ourselves no prison is."

In the East the monasteries, as a rule, were larger, but less firmly administered. There the laxer system of the "Laura" prevailed more widely and lasted till a later period than in Europe (Mabill. Praeff. V. vi.). In East and West alike, the control exercised by the bishop of the diocese over the monasteries in his jurisdiction was from first to last scarcely more than titular. But in Latin Christendom the centralising authority of the pope supplied the want of episcopal control, not, however, without the vices which are inherent in an overstrained centralisation.

Before the 5th century there was no uniformity of rule among the various monasteries even of one race or country. Cassian complained that every cell had its rule; that there were as many rules as monasteries (Instit. ii. 2). In some cases, under the roof of the same monastery, a divided allegiance was given to several rules at once (Mab. Annal. O. S. B. Praef. 18). All this was perhaps inevitable from the fact that the monastic life had its origin not in an impulse given by any one directing and controlling spirit, but in the exigencies of the age generally. Gradually order emerged out of this chaos. The ascetic writings commonly ascribed to Basil of Caesarea sometimes to his friend Eustathius of Sebaste, exercised from the first over the monasteries of the East an influence which they have never lost in those unchanging lands where change is an impiety. The rule of Basil—the first written code of the sort—was popular for a time in Southern Italy, a stronghold, from the circumstances of its colonisation, of Greek sympathies, was translated into Latin at the instance of Urseus, abbat of Pinetum, probably near the famous pine woods of Ravenna (Mab. Ann. O. S. B. I. 15), was used in Gaul during the 5th century at Lemovicus (Limoges) in conjunction with Cassian's Institutes (ib. IV. 40); and won for itself the commendation of Cassiodorus and Benedict. Some European monasteries at first adopted their rules from Egypt, the mother-country of asceticism; thus the so-called rule of Macarius was in force in a Burgundian monastery, and the "rule of Antony" in a monastery near Orleans (Mab. Ann. O. S. B. I.). Cassian was the precursor of Benedict in the arduous work of systematising the development of monasticism. But it is inexact to speak of "Cassian's severe and inflexible rule" (Milman, Lat. Chr. II. ii.). Strictly speaking, Cassian is the author of no rule properly so entitled; he was a compiler of materials suggestive of legislation, not a legislator himself. It was probably through his influence, in part at least, that many of the Gallic monasteries copied the type presented to them by the celebrated monastery of Honoratus at Lerina (Lérins), which seems to have been itself in its commencement a copy from those great Egyptian communities, which Cassian knew well from his own personal experience, wherein the brethren, dwelling each in his little separate cell, all under one abbat, met together at stated times for the sacred offices, and for refreshment (Mab. Ann. O. S. B. I. 29, 30).

The appearance of the rule of Benedict, first and great in the long list of monastic reformers, was the commencement of uniformity in the monasteries of the West. Starting from its birthplace, Monte Casino, on the wildly picturesque spurs of the Apennines, it asserted its supremacy in Italy before the end of the 6th century, in the countries which are now France and Germany after the era of Winfried or Boniface, and in Spain, where the rule of Isidore had prevailed, after the 9th century. In the next century it was almost universally accepted throughout Christian Europe (Pelliccia, Eccl. Chr. Pol. I. iii. 1, 4).

Like Aaron's rod it swallowed up its rivals. For a time, indeed, the more ascetic rule of Columbanus, emanating from the remote shores of Britain, where, before his missionary labours in Gaul and westwards, he had been trained under the rigorous tutelage of the famous Comgall, abbat of Bangor, came into conflict in central Europe with the Benedictine rule, and disputed its pre-eminence. But the followers of Columbanus never became a separate order. The monasteries wherein his rule was [illegible] solely and absolutely were never [illegible]. More usually his rule was combined [illegible] of Benedict, as in the monasteries of Luxovium (Luxeuil) and Bobium (Bobbio) in the 7th century. The most characteristic part of his rule the Poenitentiale, was too peremptory, too Draconic ever to become generally popular. After the synod of Mâcon, A.D. 625 (Concil. Matiscon.), in which the rule was defended by Eustathius, abbat of Luxeuil, from the charges brought against it by one of his monks, the Columbanist rule may be said to have ceased to exist separately. The Benedictine rule was milder and more flexible than its compeers; it was more in harmony with the temperament of the Italian peninsula, whence at that time other Christian lands in the West received their ecclesiastical laws; it enjoyed the favour and patronage of Rome, the capital of Christendom (Mab. Annal. O. S. B. Praef. pp. 23, 25). Wherever the two rules existed side by side in the same monastery, the Italian rule, inevitably and as of necessity, sooner or later ousted the Hibernian. Even in its own birth-land, notwithstanding the obstinate tenacity with which the native monks ("Scoti," i.e. Irish) clung to their prepossessions about the right time for keeping Easter and the right way of shaving for the tonsure, &c., the rule of Columbanus failed to hold its own against the encroachments of its exotic rival. In the 8th century, the rule of Benedict was carried by Saxon missionaries beyond the Tweed (Holsten, Praef. in Cod. Regul. S. Bened. Anian. pp. 403–405).

Amid all these divergencies and discrepancies, that which gave cohesion and stability to the monastic system was the almost absolute authority of the abbat, an authority greater than that of a captain of an English man-of-war in modern times, and almost on a par with that of an Oriental despot (e.g. Conc. Francof. A.D. 794). For his monks to hear was to obey. He held his office, ordinarily, for life. Within the walls, primarily intended for defence against enemies from without, but which soon came to be quite as useful for keeping the brethren in, he reigned supreme; and his watchful eye followed them even beyond the precincts (Conc. Turracon. A.D. 516, c. 11). Each monk in turn was a spy on the others (Greg. M. Epp. x 22); was bound to inform the father-abbat of any misconduct on their part, bound, too, by habitual confession to the abbat, to accuse himself. It was an integral part of Benedict's policy thus to magnify the office of the abbat. It was, in a word, the keystone of his arch. Gregory the Great, a century later (the Roman church has always been skilful in utilising her monastic auxiliaries), was very severe against vagabond monks (Greg. M. Epp. I. 40, vi. 32, vii. 36, &c.; cf. Conv. Aurel. A.D. 511, c. 19). On the same principle Charles the Great enacted that solitary recluses should enroll themselves either as monks or canons (Car. M. Capit. 802 A.D. I. c. 17, 806 A.D. IV. c. 2, &c.; cf. Justin, Novell. 133.) Throughout the history of monasticism, the vow of unhesitating and unquestioning obedience has been one great secret of monastic vitality.

From the first the necessity had been recognised of repressing insubordination with an iron hand. Jerome and Augustine had censured the lawlessness of the "Remobothi," the "Sarabaitae," the "Gyrovagi," and other monkish vagrants (Hier. Epp. ad Eustoch.; Aug. de Op. Mon. cc. 28, 31; Rett. i. 21). Jerome, indeed, had recommended the very plan which afterwards became a prominent feature in the Benedictine policy, that the abbat should have a provost or prior under him as the officer next in command to himself, assisted by deans in the larger monasteries. Benedict himself preferred that the government of the monasteries should be carried on by abbat and deans without the intervention of a prior, lest there should be any rivalry between the abbat and his lieutenant. As monasteries, both in Eastern and Western Christendom, began to be founded in closer proximity to great cities, these and similar precautions against disorder became more and more necessary. Gregory the Great, exercising an almost ubiquitous supervision over Latin Christendom, recommended a probation of two or three years before a novice should become a monk (Greg. M. Epp. iv. 23). Again and again, in his solicitude for the preservation of a rigid monastic discipline, he insists that the abbat must be a monk whose moral and spiritual fitness has been well proved and tested before his election; that he is to relieve himself, as far as possible, of mundane distractions by having a good lay-agent; that he is to be strict in correcting offenders; that he is to retain in his own hands the appointment of the deans; and, in the appointment of a prior, to exercise his own discretion, if necessary, by deviating from the order of seniority, and by selecting the brother whom he believes best qualified for the office (ib. pass.). Council after council issued its fulmination against recalcitrant or disorderly monks, and endeavoured to weld together the organisation of each monastery firmly and compactly under one head. Thus the council of Agde, A.D. 506, ordered that no member of the community should live in a cell apart from the cloister, except by the abbat's special leave, nor, even so, outside the precincts ("intra saepta") (Conc. Agath. c. 38; cf. Conc. Venet. A.D. 465, c. 7; Novell. 133). The same council enacted that no abbat should superintend more than one monastery, hospices excepted (cf. Gregor. M. Epp. x. 41). The abbat was usually elected by the monks (Bened. Anian. Concord. Regul. IV. i.). Louis, the son and successor of Charles the Great, restored this ancient privilege to the great abbeys of his dominion, from whom his father had wrested it. [ABBAT.]

During the period of turbulence and confusion in Europe, which followed the crash of Rome under the onset of the barbarians, and before the disintegrated empire had been reconstructed by the strong hand of Charles the Great, the monks were everywhere the champions of order against lawless violence, of the weak and defenceless against the brute force of the oppressor. Again and again they confronted kings and nobles without fear, and without favour, as Columbanus for instance, among the Franks, rebuked the profligacy of the Merovingian princes. The proudest monarch, the most reckless of his barons, bowed in reverence before the mysteriously awful attributes of the pale, emaciated recluse coming forth like a phantom from his cell, or, at least, affected the friendship of so powerful an ally. The cloister, always a sanctuary and asylum for the friendless and the unfortunate, became in an age when even the tenure of the throne was so precarious, a convenient place for the incarceration of those whom it was desirable to put out of the way without killing. What had been at first in many cases involuntary, came to be prized for its own sake. Clothilda, the widow of Clovis, in the 6th century, when threatened with death or the tonsure for her sons, preferred "death before degradation." In the 8th century two ex-kings, Carloman the Frank, and Rachis the Lombard, sought and found shelter at the same moment by their own choice, in the monastery of Monte Casino. Louis, the successor of Charles the Great on the throne of the Franks, was only dissuaded by his nobles, in A.D. 819, from becoming a monk; fourteen years later he was compelled by his sons to retire to the monastery of St. Medard, at Soissons. The list of sovereigns who from the 5th to the 10th century, either by constraint or by choice, became monks, is indeed a long one. Distinguished offenders among the Franks had the option of being shut up in a monastery or of undergoing the usual canonical penances (Capitul. Reg. Franc. vi. 71, 90; vii. 59).

Early in the 6th century, for the first time, according to Mabillon, criminal priests or deacons were sentenced by a council in the south-east of France to incarceration in a monastery (Conc. Epaonense, A.D. 517, c. 3; cf. Gregor M. Epp. viii. 10). In the 7th century, in the words of the great historian of the Western church, "the peaceful passion for monachism had become a madness, which seized on the strongest, sometimes the fiercest souls. Monasteries arose in all quarters, and gathered their tribute of wealth from all lands" (Milman, Hist. of Lat. Christianity, ii. 221).

Under the fostering care of the great Charles, monasteries were not merely a shelter and a refuge from social storms, and centres from which radiated over fen and forest the civilising influences of the farm and the garden, but schools of useful learning, according to the requirements and capacities of the period. Already, under the Merovingians, sons of princes, for instance, Meroveus, son of Chilperic, had been sent to monasteries to be taught (Mab. Ann. O. S. B. iii. 54). Charles made many and liberal grants of land to the monasteries, and his monk-loving son gave even more bountifully. But fine buildings and wide domains, besides attracting the cupidity of the spoiler, brought with them the pride and the luxury, which follow in the train of wealth and prosperity (Milman, L. C. ii. 294). Abbats too often took advantage of the absence of neighbouring barons on military service to seize their fiefs, stepping into their place, and becoming themselves feudal chieftains. But they were not content with the comparatively limited jurisdiction of their predecessors. The recognised appeal to the king in their case soon fell into desuetude; they assumed a position above their feudal peers, as suzerain lords; and on the principle that a thing once devoted to God becomes His only, His always, His altogether, they claimed various immunities for their lands from the ordinary tolls and taxes. "Their estates were held on the same tenure as those of the lay nobility; they had been invested with them especially in Germany, according to the old Teutonic law of conquest. Abbacies were originally, or became, in the strictest sense benefices. Abbats took the same oath with other vassals on a change of sovereign. Abbats and abbesses were bound to appear at the Heerbann of the sovereign." (Milman, ib. ii. 289.) Though the abbats themselves were forbidden to carry arms, and took their oath of fealty as counsellors, their "men" were as much bound to follow the king in his wars as the "men" of his lay vassals (ib.). The first instance recorded of a fighting abbat is that of Warnerius, in his breastplate and other accoutrements, taking an active part in the defence of Rome against the Lombards in the 8th century (ib. ii. 243). Abbats, not unnaturally perhaps, in circumstances like these, grew rapidly less and less distinct in their manner of life from their compeers, the lay aristocracy around them. Their illustrious patron had to repress their hunting and hawking propensities, ordering them to do their shooting and their other field sports by deputy, in the person of the lay brothers (Capit. Car. M. A.D. 769, c. 3, A.D. 802, I. c. 19; Conc. Mogunt. A.D. 813, c. 14), and he denounced severely monks who are "lazy and careless." Charles reserved to himself the appointment of the great abbats. Under the feebler sway of his successors monasteries became more and more secular. The younger and the illegitimate sons of noble or royal families came to regard the richer abbeys as their patrimony, and resented the intrusion of men of lower birth into these high places of the church. And though then, as always, in spite of every discouragement, genius and piety sometimes forced their way to the front, and though sometimes baser arts won preferment, the larger ecclesiastical fiefs passed so generally into the hands of the nobles, as to make the great abbats almost a caste (Milm. Lat. Chr. ii. 329).

The relation of monks to the clergy, and their continually recurring jealousies, form a curious chapter in the history of monasticism. Originally monks, as a class, were regarded as laymen. Though even from the first there were individual instances of persons becoming monks after being ordained. Still, as monks, all ranked collectively with the lay, not the clerical part of the Christian community. The term "clerici" was applied not only to the clergy properly so called, but to the numerous officials connected with the church in various secular capacities, as bursars, doorkeepers, &c. Accordingly, the monk, even if he were not himself a layman, was naturally classed with laymen, as being unconnected with ecclesiastical offices of any sort. Monks, for their part, were more than content to be so regarded. It was one of their axioms that a monk should shun the company of a bishop as he would the company of a woman, lest he should be ordained perforce and against his own free will; for monks were in request for the diaconate or the priesthood as well as abbats for the office of bishop[a] (Cass. Inst. xi. 17; Bingham, Orig. Eccles. iv. 7). Monks indeed had no cause to be ambitious of ecclesiastical dignities. In the 5th century they took precedence of deacons (Epiphan. Haer. lxviii.); and in the East their archimandrites had places at the councils of the church (C. P. I., Conc. Eph. Act. I. Sess., Con.). Like other barriers between the monk and his fellow men, this demarcation between monks and clergy became less strongly marked after the 4th century; the gradual relaxation of primitive austerity in the monastery being partly the cause and partly the result of this mutual approximation of the one to the other (Hieron. Ep. ad Eustoch.). Other causes also were at work. The monastery was often a nursery or "training-college" for the clergy (Hieron. Ep. ad Rust.; cf. Conc. Vasens. A.D. 529). On the one hand, dioceses needed clergy other than the parochial clergy for missionary work; on the other hand, the monastery needed one priest at least, if not more than one, as its resident chaplain. The illiterate clergy looked naturally to the nearest monastery for help in the composition of sermons. Deacons, though forbidden to preach, were allowed to read homilies in church; and these were furnished in case of need by the monks, men, sometimes at least, of learning, in comparison with the country clergy (Mabill. Annal. O. S. B. iii. 56). And they, who were thus assisting the clergy in their work, affected not unreasonably a clerical costume. More than one council in the 6th century made its enactment against monks wearing the "orarium," or stole, and against their wearing boots or buskins instead of their own rude sandals (Conc. Agath. A.D. 506; Conc. Aurel. i. A.D. 511; Conc. Epaon. A.D. 518; cf. Conc. Laodic. A.D. 361). Sometimes, at first more usually, the spiritual wants of the monastery were supplied by the bishop sending a priest at the abbat's request, to perform mass at stated times; sometimes by a priest being appointed to reside in the monastery; sometimes by one of the monks themselves being ordained (Greg. M. Epp. pass.). On festivals the monks usually resorted to their parish church (Altaserr. Ascet. i. 2). [ORATORY.]

One of the hardest tasks of successive popes was to regulate and adjust the rival claims of their monks and their clergy. Gregory the Great, like his distinguished predecessor Leo, the first of the popes of that name, seems to have laboured to prevent either party from intruding beyond its own proper province into the duties and privileges of the other. He forbade monks to officiate without leave outside their walls (cf. Leo I. Epp. 118, 119). He forbade the parochial clergy to retreat at pleasure from their cures to the quietness and leisure of a monastery. He ordered baptisteries to be removed from monasteries. He discouraged clerical abbats; and he censured the parochial clergy, who either entered a monastery or quitted it without their bishops' sanction. Sometimes, however, he transferred the charge of a church neglected by its parochial clergy to the monks of the adjoining monastery, on condition that they should provide accommodation among themselves for a priest who should act as their "vicar" (Epp. i. 40; iii. 18; iii. 59; iv. 1; iv. 18). After the 6th century monks began to be classed in popular estimation with the clergy (Mab. AA. O. S. B. Praef. Sæc. ii.); and the ecclesiastical policy of the great Carlovingian legislator in the 8th century, by subjecting the abbats to the jurisdiction of the bishops and archbishops, unintentionally favoured this notion. A council at Rome, in A.D. 827, ordered abbats to be in priests' order (Conc. Rom. c. 26); a council at Aachen about the same time permitted them to admit any of their monks into minor orders; another at Mainz soon afterwards permitted them to hold benefices (Conc. Aquisgr. A.D. 817, c. 60; Conc. Moguntin. A.D. 827). Monks were the predominating element in the synods of the ninth century, sometimes sitting apart from the clergy in a separate chapter (AA. SS. Jun. ii. c. 22, St. Minuerc.). In the eleventh and twelfth centuries more than one council prohibited monks from having charge of parishes; but Innocent III., their patron and champion, sanctioned their officiating even in parishes where they had no "domicilium" or residence. Gregory of Tours uses the terms "monachi" and "clerici" indiscriminately. But the long-standing rivalry between the monks and clergy lasted on, notwithstanding this superficial fusion, or rather all the more acrimoniously, because of their being brought more frequently into collision.

The right of the bishop of the diocese to exercise jurisdiction over the monasteries in his diocese, and the limits within which his authority ought to be exercised were a constant source of irritation on both sides. The struggle between bishop and abbat dates from the very commencement of monachism; council after council endeavoured to arbitrate between their conflicting claims; but it was inevitable that fresh occasions of dispute should arise continually. At first, and so long as the monk was distinctly regarded as a layman, there was less danger of rivalry or collision. The council of Chalcedon (A.D. 451) enacted, that the bishop of each city should superintend its monasteries according to "the traditions of the fathers," and that every refractory monk should be excommunicated; that no monk should enter the city of Constantinople (already the monks had caused disturbances there) without the bishop's permission; and that the consecration of the monastery by the bishop should be the guarantee against its being secularised (Conc. Chalced. cc. 4, 8, 23, 24). Africa, notorious already for the turbulence of its vagabond monks, was the first to raise the standard of revolt. One of the abbats in the diocese of Byrsa, having been excommunicated by his own bishop, Liberatus, appealed to the bishop of Carthage, metropolitan in the proconsular province of Carthage (Du Cange, Glossar. Lat. s. v. Primas). At a synod in Carthage (A.D. 525), presided over by Bonifacius, bishop of Carthage, in right of his see, sentence was pronounced in favour of the abbat. Indeed, in their desire to prevent any intrusion on the part of Liberatus, the council went so far as to lay down the rule, that monasteries being as heretofore ("sicut semper fuerunt") entirely exempt from the obligations which restrain the clergy ("a conditione clericorum libera") should be guided only b their own sense of what is right ("sibi tantum ac Deo placentia"), and this decision was confirmed by a synod nine years later, in the same city (Concc. Carth. A.D. 525; A.D. 534). Mabillon thinks that this right of appeal to another bishop, involving for the monastery the right of choosing its own visitor, was a security against episcopal oppression. A similar dispute between Faustus, abbat of Lirinensis Insula (Lérins) and Theodorus, bishop of Forojulium (Fréjus), was settled at Arles far more equitably. There it was enacted, that clerical monks should obey the bishop in questions relating to their office as clergy, while lay monks should obey their abbat only; on the one hand, that no one should officiate in the monastery, except as delegated by the bishop, and, on the other, that the bishop should never receive any lay-brother to ordination, without the consent of the abbat (Labb. Concil. ed. 1762, viii. pp. 635–656). But even this was no final or permanent solution of the ever-recurring difficulty. Councils again and again through the 6th and 7th centuries reaffirmed this fundamental distinction between monks as monks, and monks as clergy, but in vain. The tendency of things actually was to make the monastery within its own domain more and more independent of its bishop.

No new monastery could be founded without the bishop's sanction (Conc. Chalced. A.D. 451, c. 24; Conc. Agath. A.D. 506, c. 27); just as a layman needed the same permission to erect a church (Conc. Herd. A.D. 524, c. 3). If the bishop himself were the founder he might devote a fortieth part of his episcopal income as endowment, instead of the hundredth part permissible for the endowment of a new church (Conc. Tolet. A.D. 655, c. 5). But, the monastery once founded, the choice of a new abbat belonged not to the bishop but to the monks themselves. But the bishop might interfere, in case of their electing a vicious abbat. They were free to elect whom they would, one of their own body by preference, if possible, but, in the event of there being no eligible candidate among themselves, a stranger from another monastery (Bened. Anianens. Concord. Reg. v. s.; Conc. Roman. A.D. 601; Conc. Tolet. x. A.D. 656, c. 3). Nevertheless the abbat was to hold his office under the supervision of the bishop; he was to attend the bishop's visitation yearly; if he failed in the discharge of his duty, he was to be admonished and corrected, or even, in case of gross misconduct, deposed by the bishop, not, however, without a right of appeal to the metropolitan or to a general assembly of abbats (Conc. Aurel. A.D. 511, cc. 19, 20; Conc. Epaon. A.D. 517, c. 19; Conc. Arelat. A.D. 554, c. 3; Conc. Roman. A.D. 601). Outside their monastic precincts the bishop was supposed to have a general jurisdiction over the monks in his diocese, and in this way, obviously, might often prove himself an invaluable and almost indispensable ally to the abbat, seated within his monastery, in coercing and reclaiming truants. (Conc. Aurel. A.D. 511, c. 19; Conc. Arelat. A.D. 554, c. 2). Monks were forbidden to wander from one diocese to another, or from one monastery to another, without commendatory letters from the bishop as well as from the abbat; if contumacious, they were to be whipped (Conc. Tolet. A.D. 635, c. 53; Conc. Venet. A.D. 465, cc. 5, 6). The bishop's permission was requisite, not the abbat's only, for a monk to occupy a separate cell apart from the monastery (Conc. Aurel. A.D. 511, c. 22). In short the bishop was in theory, if not actually, responsible for the moral conduct of the monks in his diocese. Of course his control was more of a reality over their ecclesiastical ministrations. The bishop might not ordain a monk, nor remove a priest-monk from a monastery to parochial work without the abbat's consent, might not interfere to prevent a priest or deacon from taking the monastic vow (Conc. Agath. 506, c. 27; Conc. Roman. A.D. 601); might not ordain a monk who broke his vow and relapsed to the life secular (Conc. Aurel. 511, c. 21). Still, in accordance with the principle promulgated at Arles in A.D. 556 (u. s.), it was generally admitted that the monk's vow of obedience to his abbat was not to supersede the canonical obedience of the clerk to his bishop; and, though the force of circumstances might naturally draw the monk to his abbat and to his brother monks whenever their peculiar rights and privileges were threatened, the bishop could always retort effectively by simply holding back his hand when called to give the monastery the benefit of his episcopal services. From the reiterated cautions of the councils in this period against any encroachment of the bishops on the property of the monasteries, it would seem as if a wealthy monastery was sometimes a "Naboth's vineyard," as old monastic writers express it, in the eyes of a greedy or overbearing prelate. Bishops are forbidden by the council of Lerida, in the north of Spain, A.D. 524, to seize the offerings made to monasteries (Conc. Herd. c. 3); forbidden to tyrannise over monasteries or meddle with their endowments by the council of Toledo (Conc. Tolet. iv. c. 51), and by the council of Rome, A.D. 601 (Conc. Rom. A.D. 601). Another council of Toledo in A.D. 656, ordered any bishop guilty of appropriating a monastery for the aggrandisement of himself or of his family to be excommunicated for a year (Conc. Tolet. x. c. 3).

The master mind of Gregory the Great was quick to recognise the importance of keeping the monks distinct from the secular clergy, and, at the same time, of providing some efficient, official supervision, against laxity or immorality in the monastery. Of those numerous letters of Gregory, which attest his almost ubiquitous vigilance over the ecclesiastical affairs of western Christendom, and the commanding influence which made itself felt far and near, not a few contain his adjudication in quarrels of abbats with their diocesans. His personal sympathies were divided, for he had himself been an ardent and devoted monk, before becoming the head of the ecclesiastical system of Europe; and, like a true statesman, he saw that the way to make the cloister and the diocese mutually helpful, was to guard against any confusion of the boundary-lines between their respective spheres. The office of the monk, he writes, is distinct from that of the clerk (Greg. M. Ep. v. 1); it is dangerous for a monk to leave his cell to become a priest; a clerk once admitted into the monastic brotherhood ought to stay there, unless summoned to work outside the walls by the bishop (Ep. i. 42). The abbat is first to be elected by the monks, and then to be formally consecrated by the bishop (Ep. ii. 4, 2). On one occasion Gregory, taking the selection of an abbat into his own hands, sends a certain monk, Barbatianus, to be instituted abbat in the diocese of Naples. But in writing to the bishop, Gregory qualifies his mandate by adding, that Barbatianus is to be appointed "if the bishop approves his life and character" ("si placuisset vita ac mores"). Barbatianus, as abbat, admitted into the monastery without due probation a postulant, who soon afterwards ran away. Gregory blames the bishop for neglecting to make proper enquiries beforehand about Barbatianus (Epp. ix. 91, x. 24). Similarly, he reprimands bishops very severely for not looking more closely after the morality of their monasteries, and, in more than one instance of a monk or a nun breaking the monastic vow and returning to the world, he lays the fault on the carelessness of the bishop as visitor (Epp. viii. 34, x. 22, 24, viii. 8, ix. 114, x. 8, etc.). He charges the bishops to exert themselves in reclaiming runaway monks, and to be strict in repelling them from holy communion (Ep. ix. 37, etc.). The bishop is not to set up his cathedral throne in the monastery, nor to hold public services there; he is not to ordain any monk for the services of the monastery unless by the abbot's request, nor for ministerial work outside the monastery without the abbat's leave (Ep. ii. 41, etc.); he is not to encourage the monks to rebel against their abbat; above all (and this seems to have been the most frequent cause of contention), he is not to harass or oppress the monasteries, by visiting them too frequently, by putting them to inordinate expense on those occasions, by interfering with the revenues of the monastery and with its internal management, or in any other way; on the contrary, he is to defend their rights and privileges diligently (Epp. i. 12, vi. 29, viii. 34, ix. 111). In order to escape from the pressure of episcopal control, monasteries not infrequently placed themselves under the bishop of another diocese (Mab. Ann. O. S. B. i. 42).

The policy of Charlemagne towards monasteries was more repressive than that of Gregory; it substituted also the emperor for the pope as the mainspring of the system, as the person to whom the final appeal should be made. It was his aim at once to make the monastic discipline more binding, and to prevent the monastery from becoming a separate republic, independent of church and state. He sought to aggrandise the abbat as delegate of the bishop and the emperor, but not as a power in himself, to strengthen him in his authority over his monks, but at the same time to keep him obedient and dutiful to his bishop. The emperor's idea was, that the clergy and monks of his realm should be, like his feudal retainers, a compact, well-organised militia for defensive and offensive service; the monks in their cells and the clergy in their several dioceses were all to live by rule, the rule of the monastic order or the rule canonical, the monks teaching[b] in the schools attached to their monasteries, the clergy busily at work in their way under their bishop. All that could be done by legislation was done, and done with consummate skill, for this purpose under the emperor's direction in the parliament synods of his reign. But in spite of councils and their canons, the monasteries grew insensibly more autonomous, the parochial clergy more secular. It was far more easy, as Gregory had found, to say that the bishop must be responsible for good order in monasteries of his diocese than to enable him to enforce his authority on a monastery indisposed accept it. It was enacted by the council of Vern, or Verne, near Paris, that if the bishop cannot himself correct an offending abbat, he must invoke the aid of the metropolitan, and, that failing, of a synod; that, the offender is to be excommunicated by the bishops generally, and a successor appointed by the king or his council (Conc. Vernens. A.D. 755, c. 5), and this was confirmed under Charles (Conc. Aquisgr. A.D. 802, c. 15). It had been also provided, that the abbat should render an account to his bishop as well as to the king, of any exemptions or immunities which he claimed (Conc. Vern. c. 20). The monks were not even to elect their abbat without the bishop's approval (Conc. Francof. A.D. 795, c. 17); and as the abbat received his office at the hands of the bishop, so he was to allow to the bishop, as visitor, free ingress into the monastery, reserving however for himself the right of appeal, first to the metropolitan, and from him to the crown (Car. M. Capit. A.D. 812, iii. 2; Conc. Francof. A.D. 794, c. 4). About this time the Eastern church enacted that the bishop or metropolitan should appoint a bursar or treasurer ("oeconomus") in every monastery not provided with one already, to keep account of the receipts and expenditure; and that any abbat convicted of granting admission into the monastery for money, should be banished to another monastery and there do penance (Conc. ii. Nicaen. A.D. 787, cc. 11, 19; cf. Conc. Chalced. A.D. 451, c. 26).

Louis, the successor of Charlemagne, always devoted to monks, enriched the monasteries, and made them more secure in their possessions; but the power of the great feudal bishops was increasing proportionately; and sometimes the rapacity or the tyranny of their ecclesiastical superior drove a monastery to place itself under the protection of the king or one of his barons (Milman, Latin Christianity, ii. 294–5). The popes took some monasteries under their own special tutelage, as the patriarchs had done in the east; and before the end of the 12th century some of the greatest abbats were appointed by the pope, and some of the most important questions concerning the temporal and spiritual affairs of monasteries generally were regulated solely by him (Pellicia, Eccl. Chr. Pol.).

In the isles of the west, by their position and by other circumstances removed from immediate contact with central Europe, the course of events was somewhat different. Before the Saxon occupation of Britain, monks and monasteries were already very numerous, but monastic discipline was lax. No Benedict had mapped out the daily life of the monastery. Columba was rather a missionary than a monastic reformer, and his influence, though very widely extended, was rather the personal influence of a holy man, than the stereotyping influence of a legislator. Columbanus had bequeathed his rule to other lands rather than to his own country. The fervid temperament of the Kelts was in itself less patient of control, less amenable to discipline. Solitaries, that is monks living as hermits, each in his cell, apart from the monasteries, were not so systematically discountenanced, nor so carefully supervised in Ireland, as on the continent. The character, also, of their ecclesiastical organisation tended to make the monastery less dependent on its bishop. Originally, the chieftains of the clan or tribe, even after its conversion to [b] The emperor's attention was awakened to the need of an educational reformation by some badly written letters to himself from certain monasteries (Mabill. de Stud. Monast. i. c. 9).

Christianity, exercised a patriarchal authority in spiritual, as well as in temporal matters; and as the conventual establishments grew in number and importance, the headship of them was still retained generally in the family of the chieftain, the office of the abbat, like the office of the bard, who was usually to be found in every Keltic monastery, being, as a rule, hereditary (Montalembert, Monks of the West, iii. pp. 194, 281–287).

Among the Saxons in England a similar result was produced by other causes. When Christianity came, the second time, into the island, it came in the guise of monachism. The monk and the missionary were one. Many of the British monks had been massacred by the heathen invaders; many had fled for safety to the peaceful and prosperous monasteries of their brethren in Ireland. But their places were quickly filled by their Teutonic successors. Almost every large church was attached to a monastery; and in the first instance the monks were the parish-priests of the diocese (Milman, Latin Christianity, ii. c. 4). All this gave the monasteries in England a hold over the people which they never lost, till their dissolution in the 16th century; and as the tie grew weaker which had grouped the monks around the bishop of the diocese, and as the monastery became detached from the minster, all this strengthened the abbats in their independence. The formal exemption of monasteries from episcopal control in things secular dates from the 7th century; and the council of Cealchythe (Chelsea?) a century later only affirmed that the monks should take the bishop's advice ("cum consilio episcopi") in electing an abbat (Conc. Calcuthens. A.D. 787, c. 5). For all practical purposes the authority of an individual bishop in England over a monastery was hardly ever more than nominal; and in course of time the lordly abbats of the great monasteries vied in power and magnificence with the occupants of the greatest sees.

The history of monasticism, like the history of states and institutions in general, divides itself broadly into three great periods of growth, of glory, and of decay. Not indeed as if the growth were unchecked by hindrance, the glory unchequered by defects, the decay never arrested by transient revivals from time to time of the flickering flame of life. Still the successive seasons of youth, maturity, old age, are marked plainly and strongly enough. From the beginning of the 4th century, to the close of the 5th, from Antony the hermit to Benedict of Monte Casino, is the age of undisciplined impulse, of enthusiasm not as yet regulated by experience. It has all the fervour, and all the extravagance of aims too lofty to be possible, of wild longings without method, without organisation, of energies which have not yet learned the practical limits of their own power. Everything is on a scale of illogical exaggeration, is wanting in balance, in proportion, in symmetry. Purity, unworldliness, charity, are virtues. Therefore a woman is to be regarded as a venomous reptile, gold as a worthless pebble, the deadliest foe and the dearest friend are to be esteemed just alike (e.g. Ruffin. de Vit. SS. c. 117). It is right to be humble. Therefore the monk cuts off hand, ear, or tongue, to avoid being made bishop (e.g. Pallad. Hist. Laus. c. 12) and feigns idiocy, in order not to be accounted wise (Ruff. ib. c. 118). It is well to teach people to be patient. Therefore a sick monk never speaks a kind word [illegible] the brother monk who nursed him [illegible] (Rosw. Vit. Patr. c. 19). It is right [illegible] lips from idle words. Therefore a monk holds a large stone in his mouth for three years (ib. c. 4). Every precept is to be taken literally, and obeyed unreasoningly. Therefore some monks who have been plundered by a robber, run after him to give him a something which has escaped his notice (Mosch. Prat. c 212). Self-denial is enjoined in the gospel. Therefore the austerities of asceticism are to be simply endless. One ascetic makes his dwelling in a hollow tree, another in a cave, another in a tomb, another on the top of a pillar; another has so lost the very appearance of a man, that he is shot at by shepherds who mistake him for a wolf (Pallad. Hist. Laus. c. 5; Mosch. Prat. c. 70; Theodoret, Philoth. c. 15). The natural instincts, instead of being trained and cultivated, are to be killed outright, in the utter abhorrence of things material as a defilement of the soul. Adolius, a hermit near Jerusalem, and it is merely one instance out of many, is said to have fasted two whole days together ordinarily and five in Lent, to have passed whole nights on Mount Olivet, in prayer, standing and motionless (Pallad. ib. c. 104), and habitually to have slept only the three hours before morning. Dorotheus, a Scetic monk, used to sleep in a sitting posture, and when urged to take his proper rest, would reply "Persuade the angels to sleep!" (ib. c. 2). Cleanliness became a sin, as a kind of self-indulgence. The common duties of life were shunned and neglected, because the end of all such things was near. No wonder, if with no more active occupation than meditation, or twisting osiers into baskets, the soul of the recluse preyed upon itself, and peopled the dreary solitude around it with demons and spectres. No wonder, if in this superhuman effort to burst the barriers of our mortal nature by a protracted suicide, men mistook apathy for self-control, and became like stocks or stones, or brute beasts, while wishing to be as God. [MORTIFICATION.]

The period which follows, from the first Benedict to Charlemagne, exhibits monasticism in a more mature stage of monastic activity. The social intercourse of the monastery duly harmonised by a traditional routine, with its subordination of ranks and offices, its division of duties, its mutual dependence of all on each other and on their head, civilised the monastic life; and as the monk himself became subject to the refining influence of civilisation, he went forth into the world without to civilise others. The contemplation of spiritual things was still proposed as the highest object in view. But stated and regular hours for the religious services left leisure for other occupations, and brainwork took its proper place alongside of manual labour. The Benedictine rule implied, if it did not assert in so many words, that monks are to make themselves useful to others as well as to themselves; and the practical result is seen in the conversion of the greater part of Europe to Christianity, and in the revival of European learning and arts among the wild hordes from the north, the conquerors of Rome. Had it not been for monks and monasteries, the barbarian deluge might have swept away utterly the traces of Roman civilisation. The Benedictine monk was the pioneer of civilisation and Christianity in England, Germany, Poland, Bohemia, Sweden, Denmark (Mabillon, de Stud. Monast. i. c. 9). The schools attached to the Lerinensian monasteries were the precursors of the Benedictine seminaries in France, of the professorial chairs filled by learned Benedictines in the universities of mediaeval Christendom. With the incessant din of arms around him, it was the monk in his cloister, even in regions beyond the immediate sphere of Benedict's legislation, even in the remote fastnesses, for instance, of Mount Athos, who, by preserving and transcribing ancient manuscripts, both Christian and pagan, as well as by recording his observations of contemporaneous events, was handing down the torch of knowledge unquenched to future generations, and hoarding up stores of erudition for the researches of a more enlightened age. The first musicians, painters, farmers, statesmen in Europe, after the downfall of Rome Imperial under the onslaught of the barbarians were monks (Mabill. de Stud. Mon. i. cc. 4, 7, 8, 9, 12, 22).

In what are called the middle ages, the various monasteries of each order were under the presidency of the monastery, originally the seat of the order. This development had not been contemplated by the rule of Benedict. The abbat of the parent monastery convoked the chapters-general. In the 9th century, the abbat of Monte Cassino was nominally, if not actually, supreme over all abbats. In the 10th, Odo of Cluguy was supreme over the abbats of his order of Benedictine. At a later date, among the friars, the cloisters of each province were under the authority of a "provincial," and the whole order under a "general" usually resident at Rome (Ferd. Walter, Manuel du Droit eccles.; Pellicia, Chr. Eccles. Politica).

How the original monastic idea came in course of time to be lost sight of, as monasteries became wealthy and powerful, how monastic simplicity was corrupted and enervated by luxury, how one monastic order vied with another for worldly aggrandisement, how, too often, the unfraternal rivalry was embittered by jealousies of the pettiest kind, and how the monastic orders became the janissaries or praetorian cohort of the papacy, is beyond our present scope to describe. The difference between Rome under Commodus and Rome in the days of Cincinnatus is hardly greater than the difference between a great mediaeval monastery, with all its pomp and ostentation of appurtenances, and the conception of a monastery in the rules laid down by the first founders of monasticism. Every new rule, every new order, has been in turn a protest against degeneracy, a spasmodic effort to revert to pristine simplicity. But the disintegration and the decadence of the monastic idea are due, not exclusively, nor indeed mainly, to causes acting upon it from without, but rather to something within itself, an inherent part of its very being from the first. If we look below the surface, and endeavour honestly to analyse the complex elements which, as ever happens in human actions, conspired to result in monasticism, we cannot but observe there, powerfully at work, a very subtle form of selfishness. Fear of ultimate punishment, hope of ultimate recompense, instead of being merely secondary and subsidiary motives, thrust themselves forward as the dominating principle of this apparent self-abnegation, too abnormal, too stupendous to be ever realised on earth, unless by sacrificing at the same time the responsibilities and the privileges which have been providentially constituted an essential part of man's probation. In his fanatical eagerness to secure his own salvation, the devotee of monasticism abjured the claims of home and country. He "died to the world" (Gregor. M. Epp. i. 44, Not. Benedictin.), not simply in the sense of mortifying evil affections, but as dead henceforth to the ordinary sympathies of humanity.

II. PARTICULAR RULES.—Monastic rules in the ordinary sense are necessarily subsequent to the establishment of the coenobitic system. The earliest monks were such according to the strict meaning of the word—μοναχοί, solitaries—occupying isolated cells in the deepest recesses of the desert, or the most inaccessible mountain gorges, as far as possible from other human habitations. The life of an anchoret was therefore absolutely independent. Each solitary was at liberty to frame for himself such a rule as he found best adapted for the development of the life of spiritual communion, contemplation, and abstraction from all worldly concerns, which was his object. He might seek counsel from others, but he was free to follow or reject it. No one could claim to lay down a law for another. But as time went on, and the monastic life could number its votaries by thousands, a desire was naturally felt to profit by the experience of others, and the more celebrated ascetics were called upon by their younger and less disciplined brethren to draw up ordinances for their guidance in what began to be called "the true philosophy."

Rules of St. Antony and St. Isaiah.—The codes of rules of this nature, which bear the names of St. Antony and the Syrian abbat Isaiah, printed by Holstenius in his Codex Regularum, are, it is acknowledged, compilations of a later date, and partially adapted to the coenobitic system. They have however considerable value, as affording a faithful picture of the mode of life of the earliest solitaries, and indicating the temptations to which they were most liable. They are generally characterised by sound common sense, and an intimate knowledge of human nature. The object of the rule, to which all else was subsidiary, was true humiliation for sin, with earnest contrition, as a means of gaining the pardon and favour of God. Rigid self-discipline is enforced as a means to this end, valueless in itself. The ostentatious display of asceticism, almsgiving, or devotion is sternly prohibited, and warnings are given against spiritual pride. The day is to be divided between manual labour, reading, and prayer. "Ora et lege perpetuo" (Reg. S. Anton. c. 2; Reg. Is. 11); even when going to draw water the monk is to occupy himself in reading (Ant. c. 23); the Psalms are to be the chief subjects of his perusal and meditation, to keep him from impure thoughts (Ant. c. 40; Is. 13). The appointed hours of prayer are to be strictly observed. Before the monk goes to rest he is to devote two hours to watching, in prayer and praise. Midnight is to be spent in watching to prayer (Is. c. 57), and as soon as he rises he is to pray and meditate on the word of God, then begin his work (Ant. c. 32). Prayer is to be made standing, and that with the utmost reverence of body; the monk must not lean against the walls of his cell, or shift his weight from one foot to another (Is. c. 36). Food is never to be tasted before the ninth hour, except on Saturday and Sunday; only one meal is to be taken in the day (Ant. c. 2); eating to satiety is to be avoided, still more gluttony (Ant. c. 32); a little wine is allowed, but all drink must be taken slowly, not gulped down noisily. If two or more monks eat together each is to take what is placed before him, and not stretch out his hand to another dish (Ant. 33; Is. 20). The sick are not to be forced to eat, nor to be robbed of their portion (Ant. c. 5). Meat is to be avoided altogether (Ant. c. 14). Wednesdays and Fridays are to be kept as strict fasts, unless a monk is sick (Ant. c. 15). The time for taking food and its quantity is to be fixed by each monk for himself, and the rules laid down are to be strictly observed, giving to the body as much as it wants, that it may be able to pray and worship God. Excessive fasting is to be avoided (Is. c. 54, 56). The monk must maintain solitude, live alone, work alone, walk alone, above all sleep alone (Ant. c. 68, 8; Is. c. 18). He is specially to avoid conversing with boys or youths, and as the most dangerous of all, with women (Ant. c. 3; Is. c. 1). Even his relations living in the world are to be shunned, and the thought of them repressed. He must not loiter in other monks' cells. But if any one knocks at his cell he is to open to him immediately, and receive him with a cheerful countenance. No idle questions are to be put to him, but he is to be asked at once to pray, and a book is to be given him to read. If he is tired, water is to be given for his feet; if his clothes are ragged, they are to be mended; if foul, washed. If he chatters foolishly he is to be cautiously silenced; if he is an idle runagate he is to be refreshed and sent about his business (Is. c. 33). When the owner of the cell departs, the visitor is not to raise his eyes to see which way he goes (Is. c. 35). If the guest leaves anything behind the host must not examine it to see what it is (Is. c. 34). If it is some vessel or implement of common life he is not to use it without his leave (Is. c. 60). Crowded churches are to be shunned (Ant. c. 20). If anything takes a monk to the city he must keep his eyes on the ground, finish his business as soon as he can, and return promptly. In offering his wares for sale he is never to haggle about the price (Is. c. 50). If an old man accompanies him on the road he is not to be allowed to carry anything; if younger men, they are to share the load equally, or if it is very light each is to take it by turns (Is. c. 43). Idleness is to be shunned as the greatest of dangers (Ant. c. 43). The monk must force himself to work against his will, and fulfil any task assigned to him without murmuring (Is. c. 7). If two monks occupy one cell, neither is to lord it over the other, but each is to be ready at once to do what the other bids him (Is. c. 30). The utmost respect is to be paid to others; none should spit or gape in another's presence (Is. c. 21). All sense of property is to be put away. If a monk returns to a cell he has left and finds it occupied, he is not to try to turn out the intruder, but go and seek another cell (Is. c. 63). If he changes his cell he is to take nothing away with him, but leave all to his successor (Is. c. 64). All ostentation in dress is to be avoided; young monks are to go shabby and wait till they grow old before they wear a good dress (Is. c. 38). A monk must not shew off his voice, but pray in a low tone (Ant. c. 27). If he copies a book he is not to ornament it (Is. c. 23). The love of riches is to be regarded as the bane of a monk (Is. c. 66). The sick and infirm are to be visited, and their water vessels filled (Ant. c. 34). Alms must be given up to, but not beyond, one's means. A monk should never laugh, but always wear a sad countenance as one that mourns for his sins, except when other monks come to visit him, when he is to shew a bright face (Ant. c. 47; Is. c. 33). The diseases of the soul are to be opened to his spiritual father (Is. c. 6, 43). All is to be done that others may glorify their Father which is in heaven (Ant. c. 30). (Regulae S. P. N. Antonii ad filios suos monachos; Isaiae Abbatis Regula ad Monachos. Holstenius, Cod. Reg. tom. i. pp. 4–9.)

Rule of St. Pachomius.—When the eremite gave place to the coenobite, and the solitary cell developed into a convent peopled with a numerous society, the need of rules for the government of the fraternity was immediately felt. Regulations had to be laid down as to the dress, food, and daily occupations of the inmates, as well as for their stated meetings for worship and ordinary intercourse. The earliest rule of this nature is that of Pachomius, the founder of the coenobitic system, born, like Antony, in the Thebaid, A.D. 292. We have this rule in Jerome's Latin translation, with a preface from the pen of that father. It is a document of great interest, comprising 194 separate heads. The society, for which it was drawn up, was first planted on the island of Tabennae in the Nile, from which it extended with such rapidity that before the founder's death in A.D. 348 it comprised nine coenobia for men, and one built for his sister for women. The number of monks in Jerome's time amounted to 50,000.

The whole society formed one vast industrial and religious fraternity, every member of which owed implicit obedience to a chief (omnium monasteriorum princeps) who resided in the parent house, at which the entire body assembled twice a year, at Easter, and in the month of August. The Paschal meeting was the great religious festival of the year. That in August was held for clearing up accounts, both religious and secular. All received absolution, and those who were at variance were reconciled. The administrators of each monastery brought in their accounts, all necessary business was transacted, and officials were appointed for the coming year (Hieron. Praefat. in Reg. Pachom. c. 7, 8). Each monastery was divided into thirty or forty houses (domus), each house containing about forty brethren; three or four houses being grouped according to the employments of the brethren into a "tribe," the members of which went to work together, or succeeded one another in the weekly ministry. Each monastery was presided over by an abbat (pater), and had its staff of stewards (dispensatores), hebdomadaries, and ministers. A provost (praepositus) exercised authority in each house. To him the brethren gave a weekly account of their work (ibid. c. 2, 6). The authority of the provost was very strictly defined; within certain limits he was absolute. Nothing was to be done without his sanction. All the property of the house was in his keeping, and he was to dispense it as he thought good, going round to the workshops for that purpose. No one was to murmur at his assignment, or try to exchange with another monk (Reg. S. Pachom. c. 97, 111, 157). But his authority was chiefly economical. His disciplinary power was restricted to ordering penance. Cases of insubordination or crime were to be brought before the abbat, and the provost exposed himself to rebuke if he neglected in three days' time to report them (ibid. c. 181, 152). The importance of his office may be measured by the number, particularity, and strictness of the injunctions for its execution, and the solemn maledictions against the abusers of their authority (ibid. c. 159). He was allowed to have a deputy. If he slept out of the house he was not to be readmitted, even after penance, without the superior's leave (ibid. c. 137). Under the provost were the hebdomadarii, weekly officers who served a week in rotation in various duties connected with divine worship, manual labour, or domestic duties (ibid. c. 12–15). [HEBDOMADARIUS.] Every day, after mattins, the hebdomadarii were to ask the abbat for orders, and carry them into execution. They were to visit all the "houses" to see what each wanted, to give out the books, and collect and replace them at the end of the week (ibid. c. 25). These officers, together with the provost, were to be vigilant guardians of the property of the convent. All tools were to be brought back at the end of the week, counted, and locked up till the beginning of the next (ibid. 66). They were to see that the mats on the pavements of the oratory were beaten, a proper quantity of rushes given out for ropemaking, and a register kept of the ropes made each week (ibid. c. 20, 21). A stated daily amount of work was to be required of each brother, but they were not to be distressed by an excessive demand (ibid. c. 177, 179). The day began with public prayer (collecta). No monk was allowed to be absent unless he was sick, or had just returned from a fatiguing journey (ibid. c. 143, 187). The monks were summoned by a horn or trumpet. A penance was imposed on those who came late. No one was to presume to sing without leave, on pain of penance. They were all to repeat scripture in order when called on by clapping the hand. Those who blundered or halted were chidden. No one was to look at another when praying. If any one talked or laughed during service he was to stand before the altar with his head and hands held down, and be rebuked by the superior. No one was to leave the collecta before the end of service, except under necessity (ibid. c. 3–11). Mattins over, the monks were to attend a conference, or a disputation proposed by the provost, or to hear the praeceptа majorum read. If a monk fell asleep during reading he was made to stand during the superior's pleasure (ibid. c. 20–23). There was one common meal after mid-day. A table was also set in the evening for the children, old men, and labourers, and for all in the extreme heats of summer. Some ate only at one, some at both meals, some of one dish only, others of more. Some ate only a little bread. If a monk was disinclined to come to the public table he was allowed bread and salt in his cell (Praef. Hieron. c. 5). It was an offence to come late to table, or to talk or laugh during the meal, to stretch out the hand over the table, or to look at others eating. If the provost bid a monk change his place he must obey instantly. Anything wanted must not be asked for, but indicated by a sign (Reg. Pachom. c. 28–33). Neither wine nor broth were allowed (ibid. c. 45). No one was to have more, or more delicate food than another. The plea of indisposition was to be decided on by the superior (ibid. c. 40). No monk might work in his cell. Those who went out to work took pickled vegetables with them (ibid. c. 80). At the end of the meal sweetmeats (tragemata) were given to the monks at the door of the refectory, to be taken to their cells, but not in their hoods, and eaten there. The dispenser was not to take his own share, but to receive it from the provost (ibid. c. 27, 29). A similar rule held good in the distribution of food, materials for work, and the like. A strict community of all things was enforced. No one was to presume to take anything for himself, neither vegetables (c. 73), palm-leaves for weaving (c. 74), ears of corn, grapes, nor fruit (c. 75). Those who were set to gather dates might eat a few, and some were to be brought to the brethren who stayed at home, for their eating; windfalls must not be eaten nor taken to the cells (c. 114), but piled up at the root of the tree (c. 78). No one was to claim anything in his cell as his own, and on changing it, he must leave all it contained to the new-comer. No monk might have his own pair of tweezers for pulling out thorns; a common pair was to hang in the window where the codices were placed (c. 82). No addition must be made to the clothing provided by the superior, viz. two tunics (levitonaria), one worn with use; a long cape for the neck and shoulders (sabanus); a leathern pouch to hang at the side; galoshes (gallicae) and two hoods; a girdle and a staff (c. 81): anything besides this equipment a brother might possess was to be brought to the provost, and placed at his disposal (c. 192). The hoods were to bear the mark of the convent (c. 99). The monks were to sleep alone on a mat spread on the floor without a bolster (c. 81, 88). The cell door was to be always unfastened (c. 107). No one was ever to sleep in any place but in his own cell (c. 87). The rule guards most carefully against the dangers of unrestricted intercourse between members of the society. No one was to enter another's cell without necessity, or remain there when his business was concluded (c. 102). They were never to speak to one another in the dark, or hold one another's hands, or lie together on the same mat. No one was to go out alone (c. 56), but when two walked together they must be a cubit apart (c. 94). A monk was forbidden to anoint, wash, or shave another, or take out a thorn for him, except by the provost's permission (c. 93–95). Two might not ride together on an ass, or on the tilt of a waggon (c. 109). When forced to be together, as when kneading bread, or carrying the dough to the oven, silence was to be maintained, and the mind given to meditation on Holy Scripture (c. 116). The same rule was to be observed on board ship, nor were they to go to sleep on deck, or in the hold, nor allow others to do so (c. 118, 119). The greatest vigilance was to be observed against wandering thoughts. All who had mechanical duties to perform, e.g. to summon the brethren, give out materials, or serve food or dessert, were to meditate on a portion of scripture. When they went to work they were never to talk on secular matters (c. 59, 60). All tattling abroad, or bringing gossip home, was strictly prohibited (c. 85, 86). The rule of Pachomius, in broad distinction to some later rules and the practice of the majority of solitaries, is very particular in its directions about the washing of the monks' clothes. This was to be done in common, at the provost's order; the clothes were to be dried in the sun, but not exposed later than 9 A.M., lest they should get scorched. When brought home they were to be gently suppled (leviter molliuntur). If not quite dry one day they were to be laid out a second. There was to be no washing on Sundays except for sailors and bakers (c. 67–73). Invalids received special care. A sick monk was conducted by the provost to the infirmary (triclinium aegrotantium), which he alone was permitted to enter. Extra clothing and food were given to him, according to his need. He was forbidden to carry these to his own cell. He might not be visited even by relations, except by the licence of the provost (c. 42–47). A monk who had hurt himself, or was poorly, but who was still about, might have extra clothing and food at the discretion of the provost (c. 105). There was to be a guest-house (xenodochium), where all who claimed hospitality were to be entertained with due honour. Weaker vessels and women were not to be repulsed, but to be received with caution in a place apart assigned to them (c. 51). If a relation came to see a monk, by the special sanction of the abbat he was allowed to go out and converse with him, with a trustworthy companion. If any good things were brought him to eat he was permitted to carry sweetmeats and fruit to his cell, but whatsoever had to be eaten with bread was to be conveyed to the sick-house, and there partaken of (c. 52). If a monk had to leave the convent to see a sick relative he was bound to observe the rule of the monastery as to eating and drinking (c. 54). He could only attend a kinsman's funeral by the provost's leave (c. 55).

Different degrees of penance were ordained for minor offences: breaking earthenware (c. 125), losing the property of the convent (c. 131), spoiling his clothes (c. 148), appropriating what did not belong to him (c. 149); and heavier punishments for offences of graver complexion; angry and passionate words (c. 161); falsehood (c. 151); false witness (c. 162); corrupting others (c. 163); stirring up dissension (c. 163). Any article found whose owner was unknown was to be hung up for three days before mattins, to be claimed (c. 132). A novice was first to be taught the rules of the order, and was then set to learn twenty Psalms, or two Epistles, or some other part of scripture. If he could not read, he was to have three lessons a day, and be forced to learn to read even against his will ("etiam invitus legere compelletur"). Every inmate of the convent was expected to know by heart at least the Psalter and the New Testament (c. 139, 140). If any of the boys brought up in the monastery proved idle, and careless, and refused to amend, they were to be flogged. The provost was to be punished if he neglected to report their misdeeds to the abbat (c. 172, 173).

The rules which pass under the names of the early anchorets, Serapion, Paphnutius, and the two Macariuses, though with no claim to be regarded as the production of those fathers, are important as additional evidence of the character of the earliest coenobitic life. The separate ordinances in the main correspond to those of Pachomius. They supply more distinct information as to the apportionment of the early part of the day. The time between the conclusion of mattins and the second hour, 8 A.M., was to be spent in reading, unless any necessary work had to be done for the society. From the second to the ninth hour was to be devoted by each severally to his own work, without murmuring (Lequl. Patrum, c. 5, 6). Passing over the rule of Orsiesius, abbat of Tabennae, the disciple of Pachomius (d. c. A.D. 368), which, as its title, "Doctrina sive tractatus" implies, is a prolix hortatory address to the members of his society, embracing all the chief particulars of Pachomius's system, not a code, and the Regula Orientalis, compiled in the 5th century by Vigilantius the deacon from the earlier monastic rules, which exhibit nothing deserving special notice, we come to the rules of the founders of Cappadocian monasticism, Eustathius of Sebaste, and Basil the Great.

Rule of St. Basil.—St. Basil's mŏnastic institutions run to a considerable length. They are comprised in his Sermones Ascetici, and his two collections entitled respectively Regulae fusius tractatae, and the Regulae brevius tractatae. The Constitutiones Asceticae printed in Basil's works, are assigned by the best authorities to Eustathius of Sebaste. The ἐπιτίμια or Poenae in Monachos Delinquentes, an early example of a Poenitentiale, does not proceed from Basil's pen.

The picture of monastic life in these various rules is characterised by Basil's high-toned piety, and a common-sense drawn from the intimate knowledge of human nature he had gained in his intercourse with the world in early life, which is often wanting in rules of later date. The principle with which he starts is that "the one object of the ascetic life is the salvation of the soul, and that everything that conduces to that should be reverentially observed as a divine command." The unpractical and repulsive form too soon assumed by Eastern asceticism has no place in Basil's idea of the monastic life. Self-discipline is set forth by him, not as having any merit in itself, but as an instrument for enabling the spirit to rise above the flesh, and conquering the appetites and passions of fallen nature to give its whole powers to communion with God. The body was to be rendered the obedient servant of the higher nature, not made unfit for such service by exaggerated austerities. Selfishness is inconsistent with his idea of the religious life. "It was the life of the industrious religious community, not of the indolent and solitary anchoret which was to Basil the perfection of Christianity. . . . Prayer and psalmody were to have their appointed hours; but by no means to intrude upon those devoted to useful labour. . . . Life was in no respect to be absorbed in a perpetual mystic communion with the Deity" (Milman, Hist. of Christianity, bk. iii. c. 9; vol. iii. p. 109). Basil was a zealous advocate of the coenobitic as opposed to the eremitic life, which he condemns as concentrating on self the gifts and graces intended for the benefit of mankind. The solitary buries his talent in the earth, and renders it useless by sloth. He can neither feed the hungry, nor clothe the naked, nor visit the sick. He has no one towards whom he can exhibit humility, or compassion, or patience. If he errs he has no one to bring him back; if he falls no one to lift him up; his offences remain hidden for want of any one to rebuke him. The solitary life, therefore, he decides to be both difficult and dangerous. (Basil, Reg. fusius tract. c. 7). He advises that a coenobitic establishment should be in a retired place, far from the converse of men (ibid. c. 6), and that there should not be more than one such house in the same place, to avoid rivalry and squabbles, to diminish expense and trouble, and to save aspirants from the difficulty of choice and from fickleness of purpose (ibid. c. 35). The number of brethren should be over rather than under ten. A man of tried character and morals should be placed at their head, who might be a pattern of all Christian virtue, and commend his authority by his blameless life. Implicit obedience must be paid him, and his word must be law. He should be old rather than young, but advanced years is not to be deemed the chief qualification (Serm. Ascetic. i. p. 320 sq., ii. p. 324; Reg. c. 48). The superior is to rebuke offenders without fear or favour (c. 25). The brethren are to lay bare to him all the secrets of their hearts, as the confessor of the establishment (c. 36). He should have a deputy to supply his place if sick, absent, or busy (c. 45). No brother is to be admitted without examination and trial for a definite period (c. 10). Married persons may be received on the assurance of mutual consent (c. 12), and children when presented by their parents or lawful guardians. Orphans of both sexes were to be adopted as the children of the community. These were not to be placed on the register until they were old enough to judge for themselves, and could understand the meaning of the monastic vows. They were to be separated from the brethren, except at public worship, and to follow special rules as to sleep, food, hours, etc., suitable to their age (c. 15). Runaway slaves, after admonition and reformation, were to be sent back to their masters. If the master was an evil man who commanded things contrary to God's law, the slave was to be exhorted to obey God rather than man, and to bear patiently the trials he might have to endure (c. 11). Those who entered the society were not bound to resign their property into the hands of their natural heirs if they were likely to abuse it, but should entrust it to those who would use it for God's glory (c. 9). The idea of ownership was to be studiously repressed; no one was to call anything, either shoe or vestment or vessel or any necessary of life, his own. All that the brethren required was to be kept in a common storehouse, and dispensed at the discretion of the superior, according to the needs of the brethren (Serm. Ascet. i. p. 322; ii. p. 324). A monk was forbidden to form any special friendships, and was to endeavour to love all equally (ib. p. 322). The whole life was to be given to prayer (ib. p. 321); but to secure regularity in devotion the canonical hours were to be observed, the midday prayer being divided into two to make up the "seven times a day" of Ps. cxix. v. 164 (ib. p. 322). Work was not to be neglected on the plea of devotion, but the tongue was to be vocal in prayer and psalmody while the hands were busy. The brothers working at a distance were to keep the hours in the field (Reg. c. 37). Every member of the body was to give himself to the works he could do best, so that the whole community might be supported by the labours of its own hands. The nature of these labours was strictly defined. They were to be such as were of real use to the community, not such as might contribute to luxury; such, also, as could be practised without noise, crowds, or disturbing the unity of the brethren. On these grounds weaving and shoemaking were to be preferred to building, carpentering, or braziers' work; but of all occupations agriculture was most recommended (c. 381). The produce of these handicrafts were to be entrusted to a grave, elderly man, deserving of confidence, who would dispose of them without compelling the brethren to leave the convent (Serm. Ascet. i. p. 321). Fairs were to be particularly avoided, even those which under the name of religion were held around the martyrs' tombs (Reg. c. 40). If it was necessary for the brethren to sell their goods themselves, they should, as much as possible, come together to one town and remain there, even if the market was not so good, rather than wander from town to town. All the monks from different convents should assemble in the same inn, both as a mutual safeguard, and to ensure the keeping of the hours of prayer. Towns should be chosen which had a high character for piety (Reg. c. 39). The food eaten should be such as would nourish the body, and whatever was put on the table was to be partaken of; nor was wine to be rejected as something detestable, but drunk when necessary. Satiety, however, was to be avoided, and all eating for the gratification of the appetite (Serm. Ascet. i. § 4, p. 321; Reg. c. 18). No rigid uniformity was to be laid down as to the amount of food taken, but the superior was to judge in each case what was sufficient, with special regard to the sick (c. 19). Squabbles for the highest places at table were discreditable to a family of brothers (c. 21). If guests visited them no difference was to be made for them, but they were to partake of the ordinary fare (c. 20). The monk's clothes should shew humility, simplicity, and cheapness, and should be characteristic of his vocation. He was to wear the same garment by day and night, and never change it for work or resting (c. 22). He was always to be cinctured with a leathern girdle (c. 23). Silence was to be strictly observed except in prayer and psalmody (c. 13), and loud laughter was absolutely forbidden, though a gentle cachinnation was approved of as a sign of a cheerful heart (c. 17). Nods or signs were to be used in place of words or oaths. But even these were forbidden if they indicated sullenness or discontent, or illwill towards others. When it was necessary to speak it should be in a low and gentle voice, except when rebuke or exhortation had to be given, when a louder tone was not forbidden (Serm. Ascet. ii. p. 326). The rejection of medicine under a false notion of its being an interference with the will of God is decidedly condemned. It was to be accepted as God's good gift, to enable the body to render Him more ready service. It must not, however, be trusted to of itself, nor always resorted to on any slight cause. When the malady was distinctly a punishment for sin, it was a grave question whether any attempt should be made to remove it, instead of accepting it submissively as God's gracious chastisement (c. 55). No one was permitted to leave the convent without the licence of the superior (p. 326). Long journeys and protracted absences from home were to be avoided as far as possible. When for the interest of the convent it was necessary that a visit should be paid to a distant place, if there was one in the society who could be trusted to travel without harm to his own soul, and with advantage to those whom he might meet, he might be sent alone. Otherwise several brothers were to go together, who were to take care never to separate from one another, but to be a mutual safeguard. On their return a very strict inquiry was to be made into their conduct during their absence, and suitable penances imposed if they had in any way transgressed the laws of the society. All idle gadding about and huckstering under the plea of business was prohibited as utterly inconsistent with the monastic life (c. 44). All women and idle persons were to be excluded from the convent precincts. If such presented themselves, on no pretext was there to be any intercourse between them and the brethren. The superior alone was to question them as to their business and receive their answers (p. 322). Intercourse with relations was carefully guarded, and was only to be permitted in the case of those with whom edifying conversation could be held. Those who set at nought God's commandments were not to be admitted. All talk which could revive the memory of the monk's former life in the world was to be studiously shunned. A monk's relations were to be regarded as the common kinsmen of the society, not specially his own (c. 32). The necessary intercourse between the male and female members of a religious society was to be ordered so as to give no room for scandal. Two of each sex were to be present at every such interview (c. 33). Labour and rest was to be equally shared among the brothers, who were to be told off in rotation in pairs, every week, for the necessary duties of the establishment, so that all might gain an equal reward of humility (p. 322 ad fin.). A discreet and experienced brother was to be selected, to whom all disputes were to be referred, who, if he could not settle them himself, was to bring them before the superior (c. 49). The superior must be careful not to rebuke anyone angrily, lest instead of delivering his brother from the bonds of his sin he bind himself (c. 50). If rebuke was not sufficient penance must be imposed corresponding to the offence, e.g., exercises of humility for the vainglorious; silence for the empty chatterers, vigils or prayer for the sluggards, hard work for the lazy, fasting for the gluttonous, separation from the others for the discontented and querulous (c. 28, 29, 51). Other usual penances were exclusion from the common prayers, or psalmody of the society, or a restriction of food. Incarceration was the punishment for the rebellious, who, if they continued obstinate were to be expelled (p. 322, c. 28). The superior himself was to receive needful warning and correction from the oldest and most prudent brother of the society (c. 27). The superiors of different establishments were to meet at stated times for mutual counsel as to the regulation of their societies, when difficulties were to be discussed, the negligent reprimanded, and suitable commendation given to those who had fulfilled their duties well (c. 54).

The Regulae brevius tractatae, 313 in number, are very short decisions of questions relating to monastic life; e.g. whether it is allowable to talk during psalmody, if a sister who refuses to sing is to be forced, whether a serving brother may speak in a loud tone, if all must come punctually to dinner, and what is to be done with those who come late; as well as resolutions of theological and moral questions, and of scriptural difficulties. The collection is valuable as helping to form a faithful picture of monastic life in detail, but does not answer to the idea of a "rule," as dealing with minor details rather than with broad principles.

The 34 Constitutiones which, as has been stated, are probably to be assigned to Eustathius of Sebaste, are partly addressed to solitaries, partly to coenobites, seventeen to the one, and seventeen to the other class. They are based on the same lines as the rules of St. Basil, and do not add much to our knowledge of monastic life. The duties of humility, obedience, temperance, and independence of all worldly interests are expressed, and rules laid down for the regulation of intercourse with the brethren, and with seculars. The monk must not seek honour or dignity, or desire holy orders (c. 24); he must have no personal friendships (c. 29), nor private business (c. 27); he must not be nice in the choice of his clothes or shoes (c. 30), or be particular in his food (c. 25).[a]

Very wholesome counsels are given to the superiors, to treat the brethren with all fatherly kindness, and not enjoin duties beyond their power, though they must take care that no one hides his strength to shirk his tasks (c. 28, 31, 32). They must also exhibit great caution in receiving brethren from other monasteries, lest by admitting the disobedient and mutinous, they encourage laziness and disorder, dishearten the diligent and faithful members of their houses, and render the maintenance of discipline more difficult (c. 33).

The Rule of St. Augustine.—More than one rule for monks is extant under the name of St. Augustine. These are all spurious. The only rule which can claim authenticity is that for nuns contained in his 109th letter, from which it has been extracted and arranged in sections, as the Regula Sancti Augustini sanctimonialibus praescripta. The convent for the use of which this rule was drawn up was that founded by St. Augustine himself at Hippo, and presided over till her death by his sister. She had been succeeded by a nun of long standing who had served under her with her entire confidence, but whose rule had proved so distasteful to the sisters that they rose in open rebellion against her, and clamoured for her removal. In other respects the picture of the convent given in this letter is far from edifying. The society was not only mutinous, but disorderly. Instead of a perfect equality of food and habit, the richer sisters claimed superior indulgences on account of the property they had brought into the house, and looked down on the poorer members, who in their turn grumbled; and accused the superior of partiality. Jealousies, heartburnings, and squabbles were rife. Hard words flew about; unseemly jests and sports among the sisters were not unknown. Presents and letters stole in from the outside world. The life of the sisters was one of self-indulgence rather than of self-discipline, and, foulest charge of all, when they walked about or attended church, their aspect and deportment was far from being characterised by the purity befitting the spouses of Christ. They had begged St. Augustine to visit them, but he declined lest his presence should only bring their dissensions to a head, and force him to adopt severe measures for their correction. He therefore wrote a letter, in which, after severely rebuking the sisters for their contumacy, he proceeds to lay down a code of rules for their future discipline. He first enunciates, as the fundamental principle of coenobitic life, perfect oneness of heart and spirit, and complete community of all things, power being allowed to the lady superior, praeposita, to regulate the distribution of food and clothing in accordance with the requirements of each (c. 1). If ladies of property enter the monastery, they must gladly make their wealth over to the common stock, but they must not hold their heads high on that account, or look down on their poorer sisters, finding more to glory of in their association with the lowly than in the rank of their parents. Nor are the poorer sisters to congratulate themselves on obtaining in the convent food and clothing such as they could not have had outside, or think much of themselves on account of their being members of the same society with ladies whom they could not approach in the world, lest, while the rich are humbled in convents, the poor should be puffed up (c. 2, 3). The oratory is to be used only for its proper purpose of singing and prayer, lest, if the sisters gather in it to gossip, those who wish to go there for private devotion should be hindered. They must think of the meaning of the words while they sing, and not sing anything but what is set down (c. 4). When at table, they are not to chatter, but listen to the reading. They must not grudge more delicate food to the feeble in health, or to those who had been accustomed to a more refined mode of life, not regarding them as the happier for having such indulgences, but themselves for not requiring them (c. 5). Dress, as might be expected, presents a great difficulty. All the dresses ought to be in one wardrobe, and looked on as common property, so that no one should take it ill if she does not always have the same dress given out to her, but sometimes has a worse one than another sister, still less that she should grumble or squabble about it. Even if a nun is allowed to have a dress to herself, it must always be put in the same wardrobe with the rest, and no one is permitted to make anything, either for her bed or her person, not even a girdle or cap. If any present of clothing is made to a nun, she must not keep it to herself, but give it to the superior, who will let her have it when she really wants it. Their hair is to be closely covered, no locks being allowed to stray from under the cap by carelessness, or of set purpose; nor must the head-gear be so thin as to let the hair be seen through (c. 6, 10). The nuns' clothes are not to be washed too often, but only when the superior thinks right (c. 11). The sisters are not to have a bath oftener than once a month, unless the physician orders it. Not fewer than three must take it together, and these not by their own choice, but named by the superior. Indisposition is not to be accepted as an excuse for having a bath unless under medical sanction (c. 12). To receive letters or presents of any kind was regarded as a crime of the deepest dye, to be punished severely, if need be, by the bishop himself (c. 9). All immodest or unseemly frolicking between the sisters is strictly forbidden (c. 19), as well as all gazing on men with desire, or of such a character as to excite desire. They must remember that those who do so are seen when they think no one sees them, and even if they escape all mortal eyes, they cannot escape the eye of the all-seeing God (c. 7). The sick are to be under the charge of one sister specially told off for that purpose, who is to ask for what they want from the cellarer, and fulfil her duties without murmuring (c. 13). The b[illegible]are to be given out at a fixed time, and at no other (c. 14). If a sister detects another in a grave fault, she is to admonish her seriously, but if she perseveres she is to call in the aid of two or three more, and if she still continues obstinate, she is to be reported to the superior, by whose verdict, or that of the presbyter in charge of the convent, she is to be punished (c. 8). All differences or quarrels between sisters are to be checked at once, and forgiveness is to be granted immediately on the expression of penitence. Any one who is unwilling to forgive is out of place in a convent (c. 15, 16, 17). Due self-respect forbids a sister asking pardon of those whom duty has compelled her to rebuke, even if she is conscious that she has used over-harsh language. But she must ask pardon of God alone (c. 18). The rule closes with an order that to do away with the excuse of forgetfulness, the rule is to be read out aloud once every week.

[a] Some very curious particulars are given as to the use of the pickle allowed in some convents to give zest to the bread or vegetables. Eustathius does not forbid its use, but recommends its being mixed up with so large a mess of bread or vegetables as to deaden the tempting flavour (c. 25).

The Benedictine rule has been fully treated of in a separate article [BENEDICTINE RULE AND ORDER].

The Rules of Caesarius of Arles.—Among the Western monastic rules which yielded to that most perfect order, was the almost contemporary rule of Caesarius, bishop of Arles (d. A.D. 542). This rule, which, in two divisions, embraces both monks and nuns, and was a great advance upon those that had preceded it, has been censured as needlessly pedantic and minute. The censure is little deserved, at least as regards that for monks. That for nuns is much inferior in elasticity to that of St. Benedict, and enters perhaps needlessly into details. But, as has been remarked, the rules "must be judged by their age, and regarded in the light of the whole spirit of monasticism" [CAESARIUS, ST.]. The rule for monks starts, as usual, with the perfect community of all things. No one was to have a cell, or even a cupboard, which could be closed (c. 3). Talking was forbidden during singing (c. 3) and at table, when one of the body was to read aloud (c. 9). No religious of either sex was to stand sponsor to a child, lest it should induce too much familiarity with the parents (c. 10). Late comers to service were to be caned on the hand. No one was allowed to reply when rebuked by his superior (c. 11). Monks were to read to the third hour and then fulfil their appointed tasks (c. 14), which were not to be chosen by themselves, but assigned them by the superior (c. 7). The receiving of presents or letters without the cognisance of the abbat was strictly prohibited (c. 15). The fasts were to be limited to Wednesdays and Fridays from Easter to September. Saturday was added from Christmas to a fortnight before Lent. From September to Christmas, and from a fortnight before Lent to Easter, they were to be observed every day except Sunday, when to fast was a sin. Poultry and flesh-meat was forbidden at all times save to the sick. No one was permitted to have anything by his bedside to eat or drink (c. 22, 24). A monk excommunicated for any crime was to be confined in a cell, in company with an elder brother, and employ his time in reading until he was bidden to come out and receive pardon (c. 28). The service for Saturdays, Sundays, and festivals was to include twelve psalms, three antiphons, and three lections: one each from the prophets, epistles, and gospels (c. 25).

St. Caesarius's rule for nuns is, as has been said, much more minute and particular than that for monks. It is based upon that of St. Augustine, the chief provisions of which it embodies almost verbatim. Among the most remarkable additional regulations are the following. No one, not even the abbess, was to have a waiting-maid of her own (c. 4). No infant was to be received, nor any child under six or seven years old, who was too young to learn to read and render obedience (c. 5). All the sisters were to perform the kitchen duties and other domestic offices in rotation, with the sole exception of the mother or superior. The cooking sisters were to have some wine for their labour (c. 12). At the vigils, to keep off sleep, work was to be done which would not distract the mind from listening to the reading. If a sister got drowsy, she was to be made to stand (c. 13). The chief occupation of the sisters was to be spinning wool for the clothing of the convent, which was all to be made within the walls, under the superintendence of the provost (praeposita) or woolweigher (lanipendia). Each sister was to accept her appointed task with lowliness and fulfil it with modesty (c. 14, 25, 26). No talking was allowed at table. The reading over, each was to meditate on what she had heard (c. 16). All were to learn to read, and to devote two hours, from six to eight in the morning, to study (c. 17). All were to work together in the same apartment. There was to be no conversation while thus engaged. One sister was to read aloud for one hour, after which all were secretly to meditate and pray (c. 18). The sisters were most solemnly charged "before God and the angels" to buy no wine secretly, or to accept it if sent them, but to give it over to the proper officers, who should dispense it to the sick and weakly. Inasmuch as it was customary for a convent cellar to have no good wine, the abbess was to take care to provide herself with such as would be suitable to the sick or delicately nurtured (c. 28). The officers were to receive their keys as a sacred trust, on the Gospels (c. 30). No men were to be admitted, except bishops and other ministers of religion commended by their age and character. The utmost caution was to be observed in the introduction of workmen where any repairs were needed (c. 33). Even females still in the lay habit were to be excluded (c. 34). Banquets were not to be prepared for bishops, abbats, or distinguished female visitors, except most rarely and on very special occasions (c. 36). The abbess was not to take any refreshment alone, except when forced to do so by indisposition or any close occupation (c. 38). If new clothes were sent to a nun, she might accept them with the abbess's leave, provided they were of the proper fashion and colour (c. 40). No dyeing was permitted in the convent except of the simplest hues. The counterpanes and bed furniture were to be of the plainest (c. 41). No embroidery was permitted, with the exception of sewing crosses of black or cream-coloured cloth on cushions or coverings. No male clothing or that of secular females was to be taken into the convent either for washing, mending, or any other purpose (c. 42). No silver plate was to be used except for the service of the oratory (c. 41). To the regula, a recapitulatio is appended, containing additional rules of great particularity relating to diet and the duties of the cellarer and porter.

Rule of St. Isidore of Seville.—A picture is given us of the internal arrangement of a Spanish monastery in the 7th century in the rule of St. Isidore of Seville (d. A.D. 636). The separate rules are of much greater length than is usual in other codes, and may be rather called short homilies on a given text. The monks, when not engaged in public worship or private prayers, were to be always engaged in working with their hands at the various arts or handicrafts with which they were best acquainted. While at work, they were to sing and pray. In summer the day was to be thus divided: from early morning to 9 a.m., work; from 9 to 12, reading; 12 to 3 p.m. rest; 3 to vespers, work. In autumn, winter, and spring, reading and work changed places before and after 9 a.m. (c. 6). When saying the hours, the monks were to avoid talking and laughing, and to prostrate themselves in adoration at the end of each psalm (c. 7). Three times a week there was to be a collatio, when the brothers were to come together to receive instruction from one of the seniors (c. 8), at which any monk might ask questions concerning anything he had not understood in his private reading (c. 9). All were to eat together in the same refectory, ten at a table, the abbat taking his place at the head, and partaking of the same fare with the rest. On all days but Sundays and feast days, when a very little meat was allowed, the diet was to be of vegetables alone, "viles olerum cibos et pallentia legumina." No one was to eat to satiety. Silence was to be kept while one brother read aloud. The gates of the monastery were to be closed at meal-times, and no layman was to venture to intrude. No food was to be taken, save by the sick, except at meal-times (c. 10). The monk's dress was to be sufficient to keep him warm, but remarkable neither for splendour nor meanness. They were never to wear linen. They were to have three tunics and as many capes (pallia) and one hood apiece, to which was to be added a sheepskin, napkin, or a scarf (mappulae), hose (manicae pedales), and a pair of thick shoes (caligae). The stockings were only to be worn indoors during the severity of winter or on a journey. The brethren were to consult decorum by wearing their capes indoors, or, if not, their mappula. A severe denunciation is levelled at those who paid any attention to the appearance of their face, "per quod petulantiae et lasciviae crimen incurrat." All were to have their hair cut short after one fashion, it being reprehensible "diversum habere cultum ubi non est diversum propositum" (c. 13). The brethren were all to sleep in one chamber, if possible. Not fewer than ten were to occupy the same apartment under the superintendence of a decanus. No one was to have better or handsomer bed furniture than another. Each was to be content with a straw mat, a blanket, and two sheepskins. The pillows denied by earlier and sterner rules were allowed them, not one only, but two. A torche-cul, "faecistergium," formed part of their equipment for the night. The beds were to be inspected by the abbat once a week, that no brother might have more or less covering than he needed. Each was to sleep alone. Perfect silence was to be observed. A light was ever to be kept burning (c. 14). The offences against the rules of the monastery were to be visited with different degrees of punishment according to their gravity. The slightest after ordinary penances was a three days' excommunication (c. 16). Excommunication was pronounced by the abbat or provost. The excommunicated party was confined to one place, and absolutely cut off from intercourse with the brethren. No one might talk, pray, or eat with him. He was to fast till evening, when one meal of bread and water was furnished him. Except in the depth of winter, he must sleep on the ground or on a mat, and wear nothing but a closely shorn frock, or a hair shirt and rush shoes (c. 17). All moneys given to the house were to be divided into three parts—one to buy indulgences for the old and sick, and superior food for feast days, one for the poor, one for the monks' clothing and other necessaries (c. 18).

The officers of the monastery under the abbat were—(1) The provost, praepositus, who had to manage all law-suits, the care of the estates and buildings, the oversight of the farms, vineyards, and flocks. (2) The sacrist, who had to see that the bell was rung for day and night offices, to take care of the veils, vestments, sacred vessels, books, lights, and all things pertaining to public worship. The wardrobe of the members was also under his care, and he was to give out the thread for making or mending the clothes. The plate of the establishment and all articles of metal were under his charge. To him also was committed the oversight of the tailors, seamsters, chandlers, &c., of the house. (3) The doorkeeper was to guard the entrance, announce all comers, and take care of guests. (4) The cellarer had charge of the victualling department, giving out to the hebdomadary whatever was necessary for the material wants of the brethren, the guests, and the sick. Every week he was to take account of the articles entrusted to the outgoing hebdomadary, and hand them over to the incomer. The whole oversight of the sources of supply, both for the table and the wardrobe, was laid on him, and the labourers, bakers, shepherds, farm servants, shoemakers, &c., were under his command. (5) The hebdomadary was the brother told off in rotation for all minor duties, such as setting the table, preparing the dishes, and ringing the bell. (6) The gardener had the care of the hives of bees in addition to the proper duties of his office. (7) The preparation of the bread devolved partly on laymen, partly on monks. All the more laborious work, the cleaning and grinding the wheat, belonged to the former, the monks only kneading the dough. The laymen were deemed the more skilful bakers. The bread for guests and the sick was to be made by them. (8) An old and very grave monk was entrusted with the care of the storehouse in the city, who was to be accompanied by two boys. (9) A holy, wise, and aged brother was to be selected to bring up and teach the boys; and (10) one who possessed the gift of administration was to act as almoner and hospitaler (c. 19). The utmost care was to be taken of those who were really sick, but caution was observed lest sickness was simulated to obtain indulgences. Baths were not permitted, except to those whose health required them (c. 20). Guests were to be received with all cheerfulness and honour, and their feet washed (c. 21). Absence from the convent was forbidden, except by express permission of the superior. Two should always go together if duty called them to the town or elsewhere, who, before they set out and on their return, were to receive the solemn blessing of the society in the church. None was allowed to see relatives or friends, or to receive letters, or send letters or presents without special leave. Monks visiting another monastery were bound to live according to the law of the society to avoid giving scandal to the weak (c. 22). On each occasion of the decease of a monk, the holy sacrifice was to be offered before his burial for the remission of his sins, and a general celebration was to take place at Whitsuntide for all the departed. The dead were all to be buried in the same cemetery, "that one place might embrace those in death whom charity had united in life" (c. 23).

We have the rules of another Spanish house in the Regula Monachorum and the Regula Monastica Communis of St. Fructuosus, archbishop of Braga in Portugal, in the 7th century (Holstenius, vol. i. p. 188, sq.). These will reward examination, but space forbids our entering on them here. The most detailed rule belonging to this period is that known as the Regula Magistri ad Monachos (Holstenius, ib. p. 224 sq.), containing no less than ninety-five canons of considerable prolixity, each containing an answer to a question of a disciple. The date and country of the author are doubtful, but it is clear that his rule is subsequent to that of St. Benedict, and various expressions and allusions render it probable that the rule was composed in Gaul. The minuteness and puerility of some of the rules shew the decay of the free self-reliant spirit of the original founders of monasticism.

Rule of St. Columba.—Our examples of monastic rules have hitherto been taken from Asia and southern Europe. We will conclude with the transcript of that attributed to one of the noblest patterns of Northern monasticism—St. Columba. Although, in the words of Mr. Haddan, "the nature of its contents and the absence of evidence that St. Columba ever composed a written rule, mark it almost certainly as the later production of some Columbite monk or hermit," this document may be regarded as embodying the principles and general regulations of early Celtic monasticism, and therefore of great value. This rule was first printed by Dr. Reeves from a MS. in the Burgundian Library at Brussels. It is found also in Haddan and Stubbs, vol. ii. p. 119. The translation alone is here given from Skene's Celtic Scotland, vol. ii. p. 508.

"The rule of Columcille here beginneth:

"(1) Be alone in a separate place near a chief city (i.e. an episcopal see) if thy conscience is not prepared to be in common with the crowd.

"(2) Be always naked, in imitation of Christ and the evangelists.

"(3) Whatsoever, little or much, thou possessest of anything, whether clothing, or food, or drink, let it be at the command of the senior and at his disposal, for it is not befitting a religious to have any distinction of property with his own free brother.

"(4) Let a fast place, with one door, enclose thee.

"(5) A few religious men to converse with thee of God and His testament and to visit thee on days of solemnity; to strengthen thee in the testaments of God and the narratives of the Scriptures.

"(6) A person, too, who would talk with thee in idle words, or of the world, or who murmurs at what he cannot remedy or prevent, but who would distress thee more were he to be a tattler between friend and foe, thou shalt not admit him to thee, but at once give him thy benediction, should he deserve it.

"(7) Let thy servant be a discreet religious, not tale-telling man, who is to attend continually on thee, with moderate labour of course, but always ready.

"(8) Yield submission to every rule that is of devotion.

"(9) A mind prepared for red [bloody] martyrdom.

"(10) A mind fortified and steadfast for white martyrdom [i.e. self-mortification, and bodily chastisement].

"(11) Forgiveness from the heart to every one.

"(12) Constant prayer for those who trouble thee.

"(13) Fervour in singing the office for the dead as if every faithful dead was a particular friend of thine.

"(14) Hymns for souls to be sung standing.

"(15) Let thy vigils be constant from eve to eve under the direction of another person.

"(16) Three labours in the day, viz. prayers, work, and reading.

"(17) The whole to be divided into three parts, viz. thine own work and the work of thy place as regards its real wants; secondly, thy share of the brethren's work; lastly, to help the neighbours only by instruction, or writing, or sewing garments, or whatever labour they may be in want of, as the Lord has said, 'Thou shalt not appear before me empty.'

"(18) Everything in its proper order, for 'no man is crowned except he strive lawfully.'

"(19) Follow almsgiving before all things.

"(20) Take not of food till thou art hungry.

"(21) Sleep not till thou feelest desire.

"(22) Speak not except on business.

"(23) Every increase that cometh to thee in lawful meals, or in wearing apparel, give it for pity to the brethren that want it, or to the poor in like manner.

"(24) The love of God, with all thy heart and all thy strength.

"(25) The love of thy neighbour as thyself.

"(26) Abide in the testaments of God throughout all times.

"(27) Thy measure of prayer shall be until thy tears come.

"(28) Or thy measure of work of labour till thy tears come.

"(29) Or thy measure of thy work of labour, or of thy genuflexions, until thy sweat often fomes if thy tears are not free." [E. V.]

III. ARCHITECTURE.—The object of the present section is to give some account of the structural and architectural development of the buildings comprised under the general term "monastery."

The word monastery has in popular use travelled far from its original meaning. True to its derivation, μοναστήριον was primarily the dwelling-place of a solitary ascetic, μοναχός, where he lived in complete isolation from his fellow-men. Cassian thus defines very clearly the difference between a monasterium and a coenobium. "Monasterium potest unius monachi habitaculum nominari. Coenobium autem non potest nisi plurimorum cohabitantium degit unita communio." (Collat. xviii. 18.) The founders of Christian monasticism (the Jews, it will be remembered, had had both hermitages and coenobitic communities), Paul and Antony in Egypt, and Hilarion in Palestine, and the crowd of Eastern anchorets who emulated their example in abnegation of the world and severe self-discipline, made their dwelling in deserted tombs, rock-hewn or natural caverns, or huts of the rudest construction, whose contracted dimensions barely afforded shelter for a human body. Hilarion, c. A.D. 328, is described as living in a cabin on the sea-shore, near Gaza, built of boards and broken tiles, and thatched with straw, too small either to stand or lie down in (Soz. Eccl. Hist. iii. 14). This affords an example of the earliest form of Christian monasticism, before the ascetics had felt the necessity of withdrawing entirely from the world. In such cases they placed their habitations at no great distance from a village or town, where they lived singly, independent of one another, supporting themselves by the labour of their hands, and distributing what remained after the supply of their own scanty wants to the poor around. Increasing fear of contact with the world, and a vain hope of escaping temptation by fleeing from the society of their kind, aided by persecution, contributed to drive these ascetics into mountain solitudes, and the most remote recesses of the desert. But even there they could not be alone. A hermit's reputation for superior sanctity robbed him of the isolation he coveted. "In all parts the determined solitary found himself constantly obliged to recede farther and farther. He could scarcely find a retreat so dismal, a cavern so profound, a rock so inaccessible, but that he would be pressed upon by some zealous competitor, or invaded by the humble veneration of some disciple . . . . The more he concealed himself the more was he sought out by a multitude of admiring and emulous followers. Each built or occupied his cell in the hallowed neighbourhood. A monastery was thus imperceptibly formed around the hermitage" (Milman, Hist. of Christianity, bk. iii. c. 11, vol. iii. p. 207). This gradual formation of a monastic community is strikingly exemplified in the case of Antony (A.D. 312), who, as Neander remarks (Ch. Hist. vol. iii. p. 316, Clark's tr.), "without any conscious design of his own thus became the founder of a new mode of living in common. Thus arose the first societies of anchorets, who lived scattered in single cells or huts, united together under one superior." Other examples of this rudimentary coenobitism are given by St. Julianus Sabbas, who, having retired to a cave in Osrhoene, was followed by eager votaries, with whom he shared his rock-hewn dwelling, as many as a hundred at last finding shelter in its labyrinthine recesses (Theod. Vit. Patr. p. 774). Passing from the East to the West we find St. Honoratus also at the end of the 4th century, while occupying a cavern at Cape Roux, near Fréjus, converting the Isle of Lerins into a second Thebaid, through the multitude of the disciples that flocked to him, and took up their abode in adjacent caverns. The foundation of Saint-Antoine de Cadamus, in the Pyrénées Orientales, and la Sainte-Baume, in the Bouches du Rhône, and the celebrated Spanish religious site of Mont Serrat, are mentioned by Le Noir (Architecture monastique) as still exhibiting interesting examples of the manner in which monasteries, in the later sense, grew up around the cavern, which was the consecrated retreat of some one solitary celebrated for his sanctity. Le Noir gives a plan shewing no fewer than thirteen different hermitages collected round the centre of chief sacredness at Mont Serrat. A Byzantine painting of the funeral of St. Ephrem Syrus, of the 10th or 11th century, preserved in the Christian Museum at the Vatican, engraved by Agincourt (Peinture, pl. lxxxii.), affords a graphic representation of one of these communities [MONKS, IN ART]. Seven or eight caverns are depicted, each with its bearded inmates, some engaged in prayer, others in basket-making or forge work. From the roof of the caverns depend lamps and sacred pictures. St. Martin of Tours, in A.D. 356, housed the monks he collected about him at Ligugé, near Poitiers, in wattled huts, his own being of the same character, "ipse eo lignis contextam cellulam habebat" (Sulpic. Sever. Vita Beati Martini). At a later period of his life, when he had resigned his bishopric at Tours, and retired to Marmoutier (Majus Monasterium), he again collected a confraternity about him, the cells being hollowed out of the soft calcareous rock.

The first to introduce order and system into these irregular collections of monastic recluses was Pachomius (d. A.D. 348), who may be regarded as the founder of coenobitic life among Christians. The solitaries continued for the most part to live in their old cells, but they were incorporated into a regular community by the adoption of rules, of which Pachomius was the author, for the division of their time, their daily occupations, their stated gatherings for worship and food, etc., all the members being subject to the head or father of the body. The first ascetic community of this nature was formed on the island of Tabennae, in the Nile, in Upper Egypt, between Tentyra and Thebes. Eight others were founded in Pachomius's lifetime, numbering 3000 monks. The advantages of a settled organisation and a recognised authority caused the rapid spread of the institution. A multitude of affiliated coenobia sprang up in Egypt and the Thebais, recognising Tabennae as their mother house, which within fifty years of Pachomius's death could reckon 50,000 members. These coenobia may be compared to religious villages, peopled by a hard-working ascetic brotherhood, from which females were rigidly excluded. Each coenobium was surrounded by an enclosure, "diversas cellas in una aula" (Pallad. Hist. Lausiac. ii.), with a single door guarded by a doorkeeper (Regula Sancti Pachomii, xxvi. xxx.), and comprised from thirty to forty dwellings, each group of three or four being united for common labour. These cells, each of which, according to Sozomen (H. E. iii. 14), housed three monks, were detached ("manent separati sejunctis cellulis," Hieron. Epist. ad Eustoch. xxii. § 35; "tres in cella manent," Pallad. Hist. Lausiac. ii.), and arranged in orderly rows or avenues (καῦραι). There was a common refectory, with its kitchen and cellars, to which the brothers were summoned for their common repast by the sound of a horn at 3 P.M. (ibid. ii. xix.), up to which time they fasted. There was a garden with its gardeners (xxxviii.). For sick monks there was an infirmary, with a triclinium aegrotantium (xx.), and for strangers and wayfarers a guest-house, xenodochium. There was also a common oratory, to which the monks were summoned by a horn or trumpet. The monks slept in their cells, not in beds, but on reclining chairs. They devoted their time to handicrafts, chiefly the making of baskets and mats from the rushes of the Nile, but also paying attention to agriculture and shipbuilding. At the end of the 4th century each of the Pachomian coenobia had a vessel of its own, built by the monks themselves. There were also artisan brothers who supplied the community with its chief necessaries. Pallad us, who visited the Egyptian coenobia towards the close of the 4th century, found at Panopolis, among the 300 members, fifteen tailors, seven smiths, four carpenters, fifteen tanners, and twelve camel drivers (Pallad. Hist. Lausiac. c. 39). Each coenobium was regulated by its own oeconomus, the whole body being subordinate to the oeconomus of the entire Pachomian confraternity (ὁ μέγας οἰκονόμος, residing at the principal monastery, where they met twice a year under the presidency of the archimandrite (the "chief of the fold"), and at their last meeting gave in an account of their administration during the year (Vit. Pachom. § 52; Hieron. Praefat. in Regul.; Pachom. § 8, quoted by Neander, vol. iii. p. 318, Clark's edition). Coenobitic institutions were introduced into Palestine by Hilarion, c. 328. He founded a monastery on the Pachomian principle, near his native town of Gaza, the houses affiliated to which soon spread over the whole of Syria. Chrysostom in early life joined one of these monastic communities in the vicinity of Antioch, and we learn many particulars relating to them from his writings. The monks lived in separate huts, κάλυβαι, dotted over the mountain side. They had a common refectory in which they partook of their frugal evening meal of bread and water, reclining on hay. Sometimes they took their repast out of doors. There was also an oratory in which they assembled four times a day for prayer and psalmody (Chrysost. Homil. in Matt. 68, 69; Homil. in 1 Tim. 14). The coenobitic system spread rapidly in Asia. It was introduced into Armenia by Eustathius of Sebaste, into Pontus and Cappadocia by Basil the Great, and the influence of Ephrem Syrus secured for it an enthusiastic reception in Mesopotamia, but few, if any, details of the arrangement or construction of the monastic buildings have come down to us. A century later we learn much respecting the construction of Syrian coenobia, and the distinction between such institutions and a "Laura," from the life of Euthymius (d. A.D. 473), by Cyrillus Scythopolitanus. The monasteries, as we have seen, generally had their nucleus in the cells and hermitages of distinguished anchorets. This was the case with those of Elias and Martyrius (Vit. Euthym. c. 95), and still more remarkably with the vast monastic establishment, called from its venerated founder, Euthymius, which was gradually developed from the little dwelling-place erected by his noble Saracen convert, Ashebethos, or Peter (afterwards first bishop of the Parembolae), as a token of his gratitude. Ashebethos began by excavating a huge cistern, near which he constructed a bakehouse and three cells, and an oratory, that Euthymius might stand in need of nothing he required. There had been no original intention of erecting either a laura or a coenobium, but such a step was rendered necessary by the large number of Saracen converts who flocked thither desiring to embrace a religious life. For their accommodation more cells were built, and a church erected, consecrated by Juvenal, bishop of Jerusalem (Vita Euthymii, cc. 37, 41, 42). It is evident from other parts of this biography that a laura was distinguished from a coenobium, as being a place of stricter discipline, and therefore less fitted for a young monastic aspirant (cc. 88, 89, 91). A coenobium, with its oratory, refectory, and other monastic offices, and orderly rows of contiguous cells, enclosed within a high protecting wall, not unfrequently formed the central mass of the wide area of the laura, with its straggling groups of cabins. Thither the anchorets from the laura repaired every Saturday and Sunday for worship and instruction, bringing with them the mats and baskets, and other articles they had finished, and taking back materials for the work of the next week, together with a supply of bread and water, after having partaken of a little cooked food and wine in the general refectory (ibid. cc. 89, 90). On the elevation of Anastasius to the see of Jerusalem, A.D. 458, he ordained his early friend and fellow anchoret, Fidus, deacon, who, in obedience to a supposed vision of St. Euthymius, destroyed the cells of the laura, and converted the whole establishment into a coenobium. Anastasius supplied them with a large body of masons, and builders, and engineers, by whose labour the work of rebuilding was completed in the space of three years. The whole area was fortified with a palisade and wall, and further protected by a strong tower, forming the citadel or stronghold of the whole desert, rising in the middle of the cemetery, on the very brink of the steep precipice on which the monastery was built, with the gate just below. A new church was built, the old one being converted into the refectory of the brethren (ibid. cc. 114–119). The tower, just described, was a very usual feature in the monasteries of the East, which, from their liability to attack from the predatory tribes, assumed the character of strong fortresses, surrounded by lofty blank stone walls, sometimes crenellated and strengthened with bastions, within which lay the monastic buildings, in some cases with the additional security of a moat and drawbridge. The whole establishment was dominated by a lofty tower, near the entrance, like the keep of a Norman castle, placed under the patronage of the Virgin Mary, St. Michael the archangel, apostles, or saints, to which the inmates might flee for protection when the rest of the buildings had fallen into the hands of the assailants. As examples of these fortified monasteries we may mention the White Monastery in Egypt, which Denon says, with a few pieces of artillery on the walls, could be defended against an enemy—the monasteries around the Natron

Lakes, and those on Mount Athos, and at Meteora in Thessaly. In some cases protection was still further secured by the single entrance being made many feet above the ground, only accessible by long ladders, or by a basket raised by a windlass, e.g., at the monastery of St. Catherine on Mount Sinai, the White Convent in Egypt, the monasteries of Nitria, and those of Mount Athos.

The ground plan of the Eastern monasteries, where the locality permitted, was always rectangular, with the church or Catholicon as the chief object in the midst of the area, and the cells round. These were at first scattered, then in groups, and ultimately ranged side by side and connected by a covered cloistered walk. The monastery of Santa Laura on Mount Athos is a typical example of an Oriental monastery. Its fortified enceinte encloses between three and four acres, comprising two courts, in the centre of which stands the Catholicon, surrounded by an open cloister, from which on three sides the cells open. The refectory, which opens from the west cloister facing the church, and projects into the large outer covert, is a cruciform hall, about 100 feet each way, with an apsidal termination. The Eastern refectories were usually built on the plan of a triclinium, with an apsidal recess on each of their sides. It is so with the existing refectory at Parenzo in Istria (see woodcut, vol. i. p. 377), and the plan of the now demolished dining-hall at the Lateran was of a similar form, but much longer.

A very remarkable monastery of early date, which preserves in the main the plan of the 7th or 8th century, though frequently subjected to hostile attacks, exists at Etchmiadzin, the ecclesiastical capital of the Armenian nation. This was founded A.D. 302 by Gregory the Illuminator, in the reign of Tiridates, who, with his people, embraced Christianity twelve years before the conversion of Constantine. Within a lofty battlemented wall, a mile in circuit, lies a confused mass of buildings of different descriptions, besides some gardens and open areas, comprising almost a little town, with workshops for almost every description of trade—as at the coenobium of Panopolis described above—and a kind of bazaar or market for the sale of the monastic produce. Besides the cells of the monks on the west side of the great court there are apartments for the Armenian patriarch, as well as for the archbishops, bishops, and archimandrites from other monasteries. A separate quadrangle to the south, with a fountain in the centre, is devoted to the reception of guests. There are two refectories, one for summer and the other for winter use. The former is described as a long, low-vaulted room, with one long, narrow table running down the middle between two stone benches. There is a canopied throne for the patriarch, and a pulpit for the reader. The church is cruciform, with exceedingly short transepts, and a small apse, resembling in plan a square with four shallow recesses (Bryce, Transcaucasia and Ararat, p. 303 ff.).

The Coptic monasteries in Upper Egypt are among the earliest and the least altered now in existence. Lenoir gives a plan of one of the smaller monasteries, shewing a quadrangular mass of building, of which a three-aisled church, terminating in three cellular apses, and preceded by a narthex, forms the leading feature. Along the north wall of the church runs a range of cells, opening on either side of a long corridor, approached by a staircase.

The "White Monastery," or Day'r Abon Sherood, on the edge of the Libyan Desert, attributed to the empress Helena, corresponds to this type (Curzon, Monasteries in the Levant, p. 122). It is described as a building of an oblong shape, about 200 feet in length by 90 feet wide, very well built of fine stone. It has no windows outside larger than loopholes, and these are at a great height from the ground; twenty on the south side and nine at the east end. The walls slope inwards, and are crowned with a deep overhanging cornice. There is one doorway on the south side, entered from a narthex. The church was a noble basilica, with fifteen columns on each side of the nave, the apse and transept recesses covered with semi-domes. The monks' cells were contained in a long slip at the side of the church, lit by narrow loopholes. There is no court or open area within the building. The flat roof afforded the place of open-air exercise for its inmates. The desert of the Natron Lakes, which was one of the earliest seats of monasticism, contains some curious early convents. Only four remain entire, but the ruins of many others may still be traced. Those which remain are establishments of the larger type, surrounded by high walls of immense strength, unbroken by window or any other aperture, save the single door of entrance. Even this opening has in later times been not unfrequently built up for protection against hostile attacks, and the only way of admission is through a window furnished with a windlass. The walls enclose a considerable space of ground, including gardens and orchards, and usually contain several detached churches. The monastery Day'r Macarius, called after the celebrated anchoret of the name, contains four churches; the Day'r Syriani, and the Day'r Amba Bishoi, three each; and the Day'r Antonius in the Eastern desert, the largest monastery in Egypt, built over the cave of St. Antony, also contains four churches standing quite detached. The refectories of these monasteries are long, narrow, vaulted rooms, furnished with a stone table down its entire length, and usually with stone benches on either side, and a lectern also of stone. Each of these religious houses is provided with its has'r or tower, commonly dedicated to St. Michael, a chapel to whom occupies the top story. ("Notes on the Coptic Day'rs," by Greville J. Chester, Archaeological Journal, vol. xxx. p. 105 ff.)

The genius of the Western church, more practical and less contemplative, was at first unfavourable to monasticism. The powerful influence of Athanasius prepared the way for its reception in the West, which was secured by the enthusiastic adhesion of Ambrose, Jerome, and Augustine. Little, however, is known of the arrangements of the early Italian monastic institutions. We learn, however, from the rules laid down by St. Augustine for the guidance of his nuns in North Africa, that the buildings included a wardrobe, in which the nuns' habits were kept, over which were one or two wardrobe keepers, whose duty it was to beat and shake the clothes, and keep them free from moth. There was a library for the "codices," and as there was a "cellerarius" there must have been a cellar (St. Augustine, Regulae pro Sanctimonialibus, 10, 13, 14).

The monastic institutions for males, established by Augustine in North Africa, assumed an intermediate form, corresponding to a considerable extent to the colleges of secular canons of later times. The foundations of such an institution, probably coeval with Augustine, were discovered by Leon Renier, at Tebessa, the ancient Theveste, of which a drawing and description are given by Le Noir (Architect. Monast. ii. p. 483, pl. 553). The plan gives an outer and inner court at different levels, the inner being the higher. The outer court is surrounded by a cloister, and has the domestic offices to the north, and a long narrow vestibule to the south. The inner court forms an atrium before the church, a basilica of ten bays with an apse. The whole church and atrium are surrounded by a succession of rectangular cells, opening on the lower level of the outer court, surrounded by a terrace walk. To the south opening from the church is a large triclinium refectory, a baptistery, and other offices. The whole is surrounded by a wall and towers. Lenoir also gives the ground plan of Strassburg cathedral (ii. 480) as built by Clovis, c. A.D. 496. The church is rectangular and two-aisled, ending square, not apsidally. To the east of the church is an open court, surrounded on three sides by the apartments for the bishop and his clergy, partially embracing the church.

Monasticism in the West, after having been almost crushed out during the migration and settlement of the nations, was revived by St. Benedict of Nursia, c. A.D. 529 [illegible] the system was reorganised and reduced to order. "The Benedictine rule was universally received, even in the older monasteries of Gaul, Britain, Spain, and throughout the West—not as that of a rival order, but as a more full and perfect rule of the monastic life" (Milman, Lat. Christ. vol. i. p. 425, note x.). Not only were new monasteries founded, but those already existing were frequently demolished and rebuilt in accordance with the requirements of the new rule. One leading principle of the Benedictine arrangement was that the walls of the monastery should include within them everything that was necessary for the material wants of the establishment, as well as the buildings connected with their religious, literary, and social life, to do away with the necessity of the inmates going beyond its bounds. It should contain water, a mill, bakehouses, stables, and cow-houses, etc., together with workshops for all necessary mechanical arts (Regulae Sancti Benedicti, 57, 66). The precinct was to be surrounded with a wall with one gate, at which a cell should be built for the gatekeeper, who was to be always on the spot to give an answer to all comers (ibid.). The buildings were to comprise an oratory (52), a refectory (38), a kitchen in which the monks were to serve week and week about (35), a cellar, superintended by a "cellerarius" (31), a dormitory large enough if possible to contain all the monks (22), a wardrobe (55), an infirmary (36), and a guest-house (50).

These rules are illustrated by the very remarkable plan of the monastery of St. Gall, c. A.D. 820, the larger portion of which has been engraved to illustrate the article CHURCH (I. p. 383). Its general appearance is that of a town of detached houses, with streets running between them, forming thirty-three detached blocks of building, all of which, except the church, were probably built of wood, and were generally of one story. The buildings form distinct groups. In the centre is the church and cloister, and the group belonging to the distinctly monastic life; to the east and north the group appropriated to the education of the young, and the care of the sick, with the abbat's house watching over the whole. To the west and north-west lies the group appropriated to hospitality; while the group connected with the grosser material wants of the establishment is placed at the furthest distance from the church to the west and south. By a reference to the plan it will be seen that the quadrangular cloister-court forms the nucleus of the establishment, round which the principal buildings are ranged. The two-apsed church stands to the north, that the cloister might be sunny and warm; the refectory to the south, the side furthest removed from the church that the worshippers might not be annoyed with noise or smell, with the kitchen annexed. From the kitchen a passage leads to the bakehouse and brewhouse, and the sleeping-rooms of the domestics. To the west, closely adjacent to the kitchen and refectory, is a two-storied building, cellar below, and larder and storeroom above. The absence of the chapter-house is perplexing. In all Benedictine houses the chapter-house opens from the east walk of the cloister, and the entire absence of so essential an element of monastic life throws a little doubt on the perfect accuracy of the plan. The east side is entirely occupied by the "pisalis," or "calefactory," the common day-room of the monks, warmed by flues under the floor. The dormitory occupies the upper story of this building, communicating by a staircase with the south transept of the church to enable the brethren to attend the nocturnal services without going into the open air. A passage leads from the dormitory to the "necessarium"—a portion of the monastic building always planned with the most delicate attention to health and cleanliness. Above the refectory is the "vestiarium," where the habits of the monks were kept. The "parlatorium," where the monks might have intercourse with members of the outer world, lies between the church and the cellar, with one door opening into the cloister, and another into the outer court. On the eastern side of the north transept is the "scriptorium" with the library above.

To the east of the church stands a group of buildings comprising two miniature monastic establishments, each complete in itself, the infirmary devoted to the sick monks, and the house of the "oblati" or novices. Each has a covered cloister, surrounded by the usual buildings, refectory, dormitory, etc., and an apsidal chapel, placed back to back. Contiguous to the infirmary stands the physician's residence, with the physic garden, the drug store, the house for blood-letting and purging, and a chamber for the dangerously sick, closely adjacent.

The "outer school," standing to the north of the church, contains a large schoolroom, divided across the middle by a screen or partition, and surrounded by fourteen little rooms termed "the dwellings of the scholars." The head master's house stands opposite, under the north wall of the church. Close to the school to the east stands the abbat's house opposite the north transept of the church, conveniently placed for the supervision of both branches of the educational department, the outer school, and the house of the novices, as well as of the infirmary.

The two "hospitia" or guest-houses for strangers of different degrees comprise a large common chamber or refectory in the centre, surrounded by bedrooms. Each has its own brewhouse and bakehouse, and that for travellers of a higher class is also provided with a kitchen and storeroom, sleeping accommodation for the servants, and stables for horses. There is also an hospitium for strange monks under the north wall of the church.

Beyond the church at the eastern boundary of the convent area to the south is the "factory," containing workshops for shoemakers, saddlers, cutlers, and grinders, trencher-makers, tanners, curriers, fullers, smiths, and goldsmiths, with their dwellings behind. On this side also is the agricultural establishment, comprising the granary and threshing floor, mills, malthouse, ox-sheds, goat-stables, piggeries, sheep-cotes, together with the servants' and labourers' quarters. At the south-east corner is the poultry-yard with the duck and hen-house, and the keeper's dwelling. Close by is the kitchen-garden, and the cemetery, planted with fruit trees. This plan exhibits a Benedictine monastery as a well-organised religious, educational, and industrial establishment, in which every department had its most suitable position, and nothing was neglected which could conduce to the well-being of the institution, and the adequate fulfilment of the purposes of its foundation.

The Irish and early Scotch monasteries of the 6th and 7th centuries, such as that of Armagh and Iona, followed the Eastern model. The monastery proper was enclosed by a rampart and fosse, which, however, was usually circular, not quadrilateral, intended rather for restraint than for the security of its inmates. This "vallum" included the church or oratory, the refectory, with its kitchen and offices, and the lodgings, hospitia, of the community, placed round a court, platea. The hospitia appear to have been originally, as in the East, detached huts, formed of wattles or of wood. The monks slept on lectuli, each provided with a straw pallet and a bolster. The abbat's house in Columba's time, hospitium, stood on an eminence at some little distance from the other dwellings, and was built of beams and joists. Here was the founder's lectulus, here also he sat, and wrote or read, attended on by one brother, who occasionally read to him, or by two, who stood at the door awaiting his orders. The codices belonging to the foundation hung in leathern wallets round the walls of a special apartment, which also contained the waxed tablets and the styles, the pens and inkhorns. On the arrival of a stranger, if there was no guest-house, which, however, was found in not a few Irish monasteries, one of the huts was specially prepared for him. Outside the vallum were the various agricultural dependencies, the cowhouse, the barn, the kiln needed for drying the corn in that damp climate (canaba), the mill with its pond and stream, the stables, and cart sheds. There was also a smithy and a carpenter's shop, and other appendages of a like kind. Those who desired to follow a stricter life than the ordinary members, had permission granted by the abbat to withdraw to some solitary place in the neighbourhood of the monastery, where they might devote themselves to undisturbed meditation without breaking the bond of brotherhood. Such a place of retirement was called a disert, from the Latin desertum, a word which is of very frequent occurrence in early Irish and Scotch ecclesiastical lit[illegible] (Reeves, Life of St. Columba, pp. 357–36[illegible]

IV. List of Monasteries founded before A.D. 814.—All kinds of monastic communities (often not to be precisely distinguished in the meagre notices of the earliest monasteries) are included in the following list; which, in the absence of any existing work upon these ancient monasteries of a full and general character, has been carefully compiled chiefly from the works of Dugdale, Archdall, Spottiswood, Kuen, Bulteau, and Migne's Patrology. Still the monasteries here given are a very small proportion of the numbers actually existing, especially in the East, in these early times. An asterisk has been prefixed to houses for nuns. Monasteries of the Benedictine and Augustinian orders are marked respectively O. Ben. and O. Aug.; and where the exact date of their foundation is uncertain, the abbreviations c. for circa, and cent. for century, are used; while a. for ante is prefixed to the date given in many instances as the earliest known time of the monastery's existence. For convenience of reference there has been added a Supplementary Index of the names and places of the monasteries, where these differ materially from the alphabetically arranged order of the Latin name in the list itself.

[E. B. W.]

MONASTIC BISHOP, though not entirely unknown in the Eastern church (Sozomen, Hist. Eccl. l. vi. c. 34) came into greatest prominence in the Western, in the development of the church's life. According to the Catholic idea of the church, the bishop is supreme in all spiritual things in his own diocese, the visible source of orders, mission, and all sacramental graces (C. Antioch. c. 9). But in different ages this has received various limitations, specially from the principle of patriarchates on the one side and from that of monasticism on the other. The relation of the monastery to the episcopate was at first that of entire subjection (C. Chalc. c. 4; Baronius, Ann. Eccl. A.D. 451, § 25; Bingham Orig. Eccl. ii. c. 4, § 2), even to the appointment of the abbat (Justinian, Novell. v. c. 9). But in course of time this was altered, (1) by papal exemptions, on account, apparently at the outset, of episcopal officiousness (Baronius, ib. A.D. 598, § 3, 601, § 2; Anglo-Sax. Chron. A.D. 675, 963), or by regal, as by King Ina's charter to Glastonbury A.D. 725 (Wilkins, Conc. i. 80), or by conciliar, as by the synod at Herutford, A.D. 673 (Bede, Hist. Eccl. iv. c. 5), and perhaps the third council of Arles, A.D. 455 (Bingham, Orig. Eccl. i. c. vii. § 14), and (2) by the spread of Christianity through monastic agencies beyond the limits of the old Roman empire and hence outside the ordinary means of diocesan organisation. [ORDERS.] So long as the monastery continued under the entire jurisdiction of the bishop as head and centre of spiritual life in his diocese, he supplied the needs of its members with all episcopal offices. But when the monastery was either withdrawn from his jurisdiction, or was established prior to and practically outside the direct agency of the bishop, the natural relations became inverted, and while the grace of orders remained of necessity with the bishop, the jurisdiction and mission passed for the time to the monastery, and the monastic bishop was under the jurisdiction of the monastic head, the abbat, whether ordained or lay. This is most frequently met with in the Celtic church of Ireland and her offshoots in Scotland and Northumbria, where it presented itself to the venerable Bede as an "ordo inusitatus" (Hist. Eccl. iii. c. 4). It is also met with on the continent. According to ecclesiastical principle the monastery required a bishop for the discharge of episcopal functions to the inmates, and if the chief official was the abbat, the bishop was at least one of the "family," honoured indeed for his sacred office (Adamn. Vit. S. Col. i. c. 44), though under the abbat in jurisdiction and monastic precedence; he was higher in spiritual power (Ib. i. c. 36), though lower in local dignity and official, that is, monastic rank.

Monasticism spread rapidly from the Thebaid into the Western church, its great patron in Gaul being St. Martin, the celebrated bishop of Tours (A.D. 371–397), who built monasteries at Poitiers and Tours, and by his authority and exhortation established the monastic system. When and by whom the Gospel was carried across the Channel to Britain and Ireland is unknown to authentic history, but Pelagius introducing monasticism seems a fable (Cave, Hist. Lit. i. 291). When the Gospel is met with in Britain it is radiating from monastic centres (Bede, Hist. Eccl. i. c. 27, ii. c. 2), and it was not till the 12th century that the monastic church of Ireland had become merged in the diocesan. Accepting the "Catalogus Sanctorum Hiberniae, secundum diversa tempora," supposed to have been written by Tirechan in the 8th century, and first published by Ussher (Brit. Eccl. Ant. vi. 477–479), as embodying a certain amount of truth regarding the condition of the early Irish church, as at one time purely episcopal, then monastic, and finally eremitic, we find monasticism firmly established in Ireland at an early date. St. Patrick, himself a bishop, founded churches and monasteries, ordained bishops and presbyters, and spread the faith as a zealous missionary; yet in his own church at Armagh, while bishops are recorded in an uninterrupted line from A.D. 447 to 535 inclusive, bishops and abbats are mingled from that date to the twelfth century (Four Mast.; Ann. Ulst.; Ann. Tig.; Ann Clonm.; Ann. Inisf.), the obits of eleven bishops and fourteen abbats being given between the years 547 and 811 inclusive (Four Mast.); but in the common lists of prelates these are all alike treated as bishops (Ware, Irish Bishops). So at Kildare from A.D. 519 to 800 inclusive, there are recorded eight abbesses, seven abbats and five bishops, but at Bangor from A.D. 552 to 812 inclusive there is a single line of twenty-nine abbats and no bishops (Four Mast.). From this we may infer either that the obits of abbats and bishops alike, when contemporaneous, were entered in the annals, or more probably that the leading idea was to give the abbatial succession, and that a bishop at times held the abbacy, as at other times he was scribe and anchoret (Reeves, S. Adamn. 365), yet "Affiath, bishop of Ard-Macha, and Aireachtach Ua Faelain, abbat of Ard-Macha, died on the same night" (Four Mast. A.D. 793), and Ware has to count them both as one bishop (Todd, St. Patrick, 20 sq.; Prim. Hist. Ch. Ir. 448, Dubl. 1851).

The first clear instance of an Irish monastic bishop is in St. Brigida's monastery at Kildare, in the end of the 5th and beginning of the 6th centuries. Cogitosus (Vita S. Brigidae) says in the language of probably the 7th century, "Haec ergo egregiis crescens virtutibus, ubi per famam bonarum rerum ad eam ab omnibus provinciis Hiberniae innumerabiles populi de utroque sexu confluebant vota sibi volentes voluntariè, suum monasterium caput penè omnium Hiberniensium ecclesiarum, et culmen praecellens omnia monasteria Scotorum (cujus Parrochia per totam Hiberniensem terram diffusa a mari usque ad mare extensa est), in campestribus campi Liffei supra fundamentum fidei firmum construxit: et prudenti dispensatione de animabus eorum regulariter in omnibus procurans, et de ecclesiis multarum provinciarum sibi adhaerentibus sollicitans, et secum revolvens, quod sine summo sacerdote, qui ecclesias consecraret, et ecclesiasticos in eis gradus subrogaret esse non posset, illustrem virum et solitarium omnibus moribus ornatum, per quem Deus virtutes operatus est plurimas, convocans eum de eremo . . . ut ecclesiam in episcopali dignitate cum ea gubernaret, atque ut nihil de ordine sacerdotali in suis deesset ecclesiis, accersivit" (Colgan, Tr. Thaum. 518; Todd, S. Patr. 13 sq.; Smith and Wace, Dict. Christ. Biog. "Conlaedh.") Though not so explicitly yet with sufficient precision we find the same practice to have prevailed in the Columban monastery of Hy. "Habere autem solet ipsa insula rectorem semper abbatem presbyterum, cujus juri et omnis provincia, et ipsi etiam episcopi, ordine inusitato, debeant esse subjecti, juxta exemplum primi doctoris illius, qui non episcopus, sed presbyter extitit et monachus" (Bede, Eccl. Hist. iii. c. 4), and the fourth abbat there, Fergna Brit, is called a bishop (Four Mast. A.D. 622; Mart. Doneg. March 2; Reeves, S. Adamn. 340–341, 372). To Lindisfarne bishop Aidan was sent by the monastery of Hy (Bede, ib. iii. c. 3), and there also the abbat governed and the clergy, with the bishop himself, observed the monastic rule (Bede, Vit. S. Cuth. c. 16). When Fergil or Virgilius, abbat of Aghaboe, became abbat of Salzburg, in the 8th century, "dissimulata ordinatione fermè annorum duorum spatiis, habuit secum laboris et coronae participem episcopum comitantem de patria, nomine Dobda, ad persolvendum episcopale officium" (Vit. S. Virg. ap. Messingham, Flor. Ins. Sanct. 331). In S. Columbanus's Irish foundation at Bobio, a slightly different practice prevailed, which points to the jealousy already arising between the monastery and episcopate and ending in the frequent monastic exemptions by the popes; the bishop was invited into the monastery as required, and was specially excluded from all power in monastic affairs (Messingham, ib. 248). At other times a bishop-abbat directed the affairs of the monastery [ABBAT], not in Ireland only but elsewhere (Reeves, Eccl. Ant. 129), and thus was the monastic bishop exercising, pro hâc vice, the monastic jurisdiction (Du Cange, Gloss. iii. 108–9).

On the continent, mostly in exempt abbeys and monasteries, the monastic bishop was a recognized official in the 8th century, as in the abbey of St. Denis near Paris, the abbey of St. Martin at Tours, the monastery of Lobes or Laubes in Belgium, and the monastery at Salzburg in Bavaria as above mentioned (Todd, S. Patrick, 48 sq. treating the question fully with authorities; Lanigan, Eccl. Hist. Ir. ii. 254–5). Under the Benedictine Rule there was special provision made for him; "igitur ut junioribus praesertim fratribus omnis discurrendi occasio tolleretur ad sacros suscipiendos ordines, ad requirendum chrisma, neve adventu episcoporum in monasteria ad sacras ordinationes explendas, quies monachorum turbaretur, plerique episcopum ad manum semper in monasteriis sive abbatem sive simplicem monachum habere voluerunt" (Martene et Durand, Thes. Nov. Anecd. t. i. Praef. ap. Todd, S. Patrick, 69). In the monastery of Mount Sinai, in the 11th century, the abbat and 500 monks had their own bishop (Todd, ib. 67–8).

But regarding the monastic bishop a further distinction is necessary. Bishops sometimes, in the first zeal of monasticism, lived with their clergy in a quasi-monastic state (Bingham, Orig. Eccl. vii. c. 2, § 8) to assimilate the life in cities to that in the desert: thus St. Augustine of Hippo "factus presbyter monasterium intra ecclesiam mox instituit, et cum Dei servis vivere coepit secundum modum et regulam sub sanctis Apostolis constitutam" (Possidius, Vita S. Aug. c. 6; Opp. S. Aug. t. x. App. col. 260, Venet. 1729). And when he became bishop he had "in ista domo Episcopi meum monasterium clericorum" (Serm. 49 de Diversis, t. x. 519), or bishops demitted their episcopal charges and retired to monasteries for contemplation and prayer. But neither of these were properly monastic bishops. Again, according to Catholic rule, ordination and consecration could only be to definite charges, and not ἀπολελυμένως "at large" (Bingham, Orig. Eccl. iv. c. 6), yet in the Celtic church this rule (Conc. Chalc. c. 6) seems never to have been closely followed, but the episcopate was frequently conferred on persons who were eminent for learning, piety, or other personal qualification, as it was also in the East (Sozomen, Hist. Eccl. l. vi. c. 33–4). Hence, in the Irish annals, we find bishops without local designation, or named only in connexion with the place where they chanced to live at the time without being either diocesan or monastic. Again there were groups of bishops, seven being a favourite number (Mart. Doneg.), and also in single monasteries a large company of bishops under the abbat, as at Louth a hundred bishops under Mochta (Colgan, Acta SS. 729, c. 7). The evident effect of this system was to multiply indefinitely the number of bishops both without and within the monasteries, and to foster that restless spirit which was attempted to be checked by the synod at Herutford (c. 4 in its disputed reading, "Ut episcopi monachi non migrent de loco ad locum," Bede, Hist. Eccl. iv. c. 5), which carried so many Irish bishops across to the continent, especially after the monasteries began to be plundered by the Northmen, and which called for the frequent conciliar enactments against the see-less bishops, the episcopi vagi, vacantes, and vagantes, and the "Scoti qui se dicunt episcopos esse" (C. Cabill. c. 43) [BISHOP V.] both in England and on the Continent. Having been trained under a different system, they came into frequent collision with the diocesan bishops, and even in the 11th and 12th centuries St. Anselm of Canterbury and St. Bernard of Clairvaux could regard the want of diocesan organisation in Ireland as a serious blot on the whole Irish church (Ussher, Brit. Eccl. Ant. iv. 523), a "dissolutio ecclesiasticae disciplinae, censurae enervatio, religionis evacuatio" (S. Bern. De Vit. Mal. c. 10).

MONEY. Introduction.—The appearance of any positive indication of Christian influence on the coins of the Roman emperors has been generally considered to commence under Constantine I. the Great, since during his reign most of the public money bears official marks of the new religion which he embraced. There are, however, a few isolated examples previous to his time, which are of sufficient interest to need special illustration; (1) the representation of the deluge; (2) a symbol like the monogram of Christ: and (3) the legend IN PACE.[a]

1. Obv. AVT. K. Λ. CЄΠT. CЄOVHPOC ΠЄPTI. Bust of Septimius Severus to the right, laureated with paludamentum and cuirass.

Rev. ЄΠI AΓΩNOΘЄTOV ΑΡΤЄΜΑ. Γ. In the exergue ΑΠΑΜЄΩN. [Under Artemas, Agonothetes (or judge at the games) for the third time (money) of the Apameans.] Two figures, a male and a female within an ark, on which is inscribed ΝΩЄ, and which is floating on some water. Outside the ark two figures, a male and a female, standing as if in adoration. On the top of the ark a bird perched; in the field above a bird flying toward the ark, holding an olive branch in its claws. Æ. (Fig. 1; Cabinet des Médailles, Paris.)

The remarkable coins giving the representation of the deluge were issued during the reigns of three emperors, (1) Sept. Severus, 193–211, who was at first favourable to the Christians, and whose son Caracalla had a Christian nurse (Tertull. ad Scap. iv.; cf. Spart. in Carac. 1), but who at a later period of his reign, 202, allowed a persecution to prevail (Spart. in Sev. 17; Euseb. H. E. vi. c. 2); (2) Macrinus, 217, under whom the church enjoyed peace, and (3) Philip I. 244–249, whose Christian tendencies have been the source of much discussion (Moniglia, de Relig. utriusque Phil. Aug. Diss. duae, Rom. 4to, 1741; Greppo, Notes hist. biog. etc. concern. les prem. siècles chrét. Lyons, 1841; Milman, Hist. of Christianity, vol. ii.; Lardner, Cred. vol. vii. etc.), and who by many ecclesiastical authors has been considered the first Roman Emperor who was a Christian (Oros. Hist. vii. 20; Hieron. de Vir. Ill. 52; Chron. ed. Mai, vol. viii. p. 646), an honour that more properly belongs to Constantine I. the Great (Lactant. De fals. Relig. c. 1; Sulp. Sev. Sacr. Hist. ii. 33; Euseb. Vit. Const. iv. c. 75; Theod. H. E. v. c. 39).

The type of these coins was by early numismatists and scholars (Falconeri, Froelich, Hardouin, Bryant, Barrington, Milles, etc.) considered to refer to the Greek legend of the flood of Deucalion, in which it is stated that Zeus had resolved to destroy all mankind, with the exception of Deucalion and Pyrrha, whilst the letters on the ark were supposed to have been either added by a forger or altered from ΝЄΩΚ [ορών]. Numismatists, however, of the present century have not failed to recognise that the letters on the ark are certainly ΝΩЄ and that the type refers to the Noachian deluge, the figures both inside and outside the ark representing Noah and his wife, in the latter case holding up their hands in thanksgiving for their safety. It has been suggested (Eckhel, Doct. Num. Vet. vol. iii. p. 137), and with much probability, that the word ΝΩЄ was placed on these coins so that there might be no confusion with the flood of Deucalion, in a similar manner as on the coins of Magnesia in Ionia the word ΑΡΓΩ is put to show that the vessel thereon represented is the ship 'Argo,' in which history makes Jason and his colleagues sail in search of the golden fleece.

It is not difficult to distinguish on these coins the form of the raven from that of the dove, and the Bible gives an account of the presence of only these two birds. In the short description of the flood of Deucalion, by Plutarch (De Solert. Animal. xiii. ed. Didot) there is allusion to a dove, but there is no mention of an olive branch or of another bird. In the Chaldaean accounts of the deluge, as preserved in the fragments of Berosus and Abydenus (Cory, Anc. Frag. 2nd ed. pp. 28–34), some birds were twice sent out to discover if the waters had receded, and the second time they returned with, instead of an olive branch, some mud on their feet; whilst in the Assyrian accounts (G. Smith, Chald. Acct. of Genesis, 1876) it is stated that "a dove, a swallow, and a raven" were sent forth, the two former of which returned to the ship, but the raven did not come back. These statements are quite contrary to that in Genesis, as also to the subject shown on the coins. A very important feature of this type (Lenormant, Mél. d'Arch. vol. iii. p. 199, 1853) is the exactness with which, as regards the raven, it agrees with the Hebrew text, which is quite at variance with the LXX and Vulg. In these latter (Gen. viii. 7) the raven is stated as "not returning until the water had dried from off the earth" (καὶ ἐξελθὼν, οὐκ ἀνέστρεψεν ἕως τοῦ ξηρανθῆναι τὸ ὕδωρ ἀπὸ τῆς γῆς.—Qui egrediebatur et non revertebatur, donec siccarentur aquae super terram), whereas in the Heb. text we read that the raven "went forth to and fro until the waters were dried up from off the earth" (וַיֵּצֵא יָצוֹא וָשׁוֹב עַד־יְבֹשֶׁת הַמַּיִם מֵעַל הָאָרֶץ "Et exiit egrediendo et redeundo, donec arescerent aquae desuper terram," Walton, Polygott; Kalisch, Crit. Com.; Patrick, Com. etc.). The expression "to and fro" leaves no doubt that the raven—a bad messenger and Noah chose another, the dove—must have returned at intervals to the ark, and in all probability rested on its top, as indeed it is represented on these coins.

[a] Professor Churchill Babington has kindly called my attention to the coins of the kings of Edessa, and has sent me the following note respecting them:—"Among the kings of Edessa, Abgar Bar Manu, or Abgar VIII. (who reigned 153–188, according to Langlois) is said to have been 'a holy man,' (ἱερὸς ἀνὴρ Jul. Afric. in Euseb. Chron. Olymp. 149, 1); and as he patronised the Christian Bardesanes, and forbade the worship of Cybele, it has been inferred that he was a Christian, and this inference is thought 'to be strengthened by the fact that on the coins of this prince the usual symbols of the old national worship are for the first time wanting and the sign of the cross appears in their place' (Neander, Ch. Hist. vol. i. p. 111 [Bohn], following Bayer, Hist. Osr. et Edess. ex Num. illustr. lib. iii. p. 171, who figures two coins of an Abgarus, contemporary with Severus, and bearing his head on which a cross appears on the tiara). The cross is formed in one case of five dots (pearls), in the other the central dot becomes oval. The chronology of these kings is doubtful. Neander places Abgar Bar Manu between 160–170, but it seems impossible in any case that these coins belong to him. The cross, however (apparently of five united dots), is found on a coin of Abgarus, having the head of Commodus on the reverse (Langlois, Num. de l'Arménie, pl. iv. No. 7), who may be Abgar VIII. That which is certain about these coins is that on some coins of an Abgar contemporary with Severus a cross occurs on the diadem, while on others we have the crescent surmounted by a star, taken by Bayer and Neander to be the symbols of the old national worship." On a coin of Abgarus and Commodus in the British Museum, there appears to be on the diadem of Abgar a + or ×, but I am inclined to think with Professor Babington, that the supposed cross on these coins of Edessa is only a cruciform star or ornament without any Christian significance.

On a coin of barbarous fabric of the Roman emperor Tetricus (267–273), with legend ORIENS AVG (Cohen, Suppl. No. 26), or of Tacitus (275–276), published by Rasche (Lex. vol. i. pt. ii. p. 1098), there is said to be in the field a cross, but in both cases it is probably a star, though it may be that these pieces were issued long after at the epoch of Christianity. A cross is also given by Cohen (Méd. Imp. vol. vi. pl. xv.) in the field of a coin of Constantius Chlorus and Galerius Maximian, but this coin has been incorrectly engraved and described and the object is really a star (Madden, Handb. of Rom. Num. p. 163, 1861, pl. iv. No. 3).

It is also interesting to compare the type of these coins with the representations on early Christian monuments. A painting of the 3rd century, in the catacombs at Rome (Savinien Petit, Mél. d'Arch. vol. iii. pl. xxix. Paris, 1853), shows Noah in the ark and a dove holding an olive branch in its mouth flying towards him; Noah's wife is not represented, nor the raven, but one cannot fail to observe the striking similarity of the shape of the ark, its cover, the figure of Noah and the dove. Though the raven is not found on any of the paintings of the catacombs, it may be seen on a bas-relief found at D'Jemila, in Algeria (De la Mare, Revue Arch. 1849, vol. vi. p. 196), and is here occupied in devouring the carcases.

It now remains to assign a reason, if possible, for this type occurring upon the coins of Apameia. In the first place there was a Phrygian legend of a great flood relating to Annacus or Nannacus, a king who resided at Iconium, and who lived to the age of 300 years. When he died the tradition was that all mankind would be destroyed (Steph. Byz. s.v. Ἰκόνιον; Suidas, s.v. Νάννακος). There is not much doubt that the Old Testament influenced this tradition, and it is perhaps not unreasonable to suppose that there is here a reference to Enoch, the father of Methuselah, who after his son's birth "walked with God 300 years" (Gen. v. 22). Prof. Ewald indeed has supposed (Gesch. d. Volkes Israel, vol. i. p. 356) that the city Enoch, which was built by the eldest son of Cain, and called after his name (Gen. iv. 17, 18), refers to the Phrygian city of Iconium, at which Annacus is supposed to have resided. In the second place the curious lines in the "Sibylline Books" (Orac. Sibyll. vv. 247–256, 261–267) may have actually suggested to the Apameans the types for these coins. They are as follows: "But Noah resting some days sent again the dove that he might know whether the Deluge had ceased, but she flying up and down fled away, and descending to earth rested a little her body on the wet earth and returned bringing a branch of an olive tree, a great sign of good news . . . . and then presently he sent forth another bird black-winged, and she flew away and remained on the earth. . . . . There is on the continent of black Phrygia a high and great mountain called Ararat. . . . . Here arise the springs of the great river Marsyas. On its lofty top the ark rested when the waters receded." The term κιβωτός, "an ark," which occurs in these verses is of special interest, for not only was it employed by the LXX (Gen. vi. 14), by the Evangelists (Matt. xxiv. 38; Luke xvii. 27), and by the Apostles (Heb. xi. 7; 1 Pet. iii. 20), for the "ark of Noah;" but Apameia itself was called Cibôtos (Strab. xii. 6; Ptol. v. 2), probably on account of the great wealth collected there, it being a great emporium next in dignity to Ephesus (Strabo, xii. 8), and κιβωτός signifies "a chest" or "coffer." Moreover that the ark was supposed to rest at Apameia is testified by the line ἔνθα φλίβες μεγάλου ποταμοῦ Μαρσύαο πέφυκαν, for the river Marsyas ran by Apameia, and was also itself called Cibôtos, as testified by coins struck at the time of Hadrian (Madden, Num. Chron. N. S. 1866, vol. vi. p. 211, pl. vi. No. 4).

Among the various suppositions which may be brought forward to explain the appearance of this type, whether it be suggested that it may have been produced owing to the semi-generous treatment that the Christians received during the reign of the emperors under which they were issued, it is certain that the type did not emanate from a Christian sect. The deep root which an ancient tradition of the Deluge—shown by the Phrygian legend, probably greatly influenced by the Biblical account and the minute description in the Sibylline books—had taken at Apameia is far more likely to have originated these pieces. At the same time it would be presumptuous to suppose that they might not have been designed by a Christian artist, for the worship of God had long circulated throughout Asia Minor. (For a full account of these coins see Madden, Num. Chron. N. S. 1866, vol. vi. p. 173.)

This medallion was issued during the reign of Trajan Decius (249–251) at Maeonia in Lydia.

It will be observed that the engraver has taken care to place the monogram between two A's (A✠A) in the middle of the legend at the top of the coin, as if to call special attention to it.

Suggestions have been made (Lenormant, Mél. d'Arch. vol. iii. p. 196) that a Christian moneyer intended to introduce on this coin the mysterious sign of the new Faith, and that though symbols of a similar character to the Christian monogram occur upon other monuments anterior to Christianity (see § xv.), yet in this case the sign is more probably the work of a Christian. Moreover, that the Bacchic emblems, appropriate to the institution of the Eucharist, may also be found on the sarcophagus of St. Constance and on the mosaics which decorate the mausoleum of this princess (Ciampini, de sacr. Aedif. a Const. mag. constr. pl. xxxii. Rome, 1693). This opinion is further sustained by another scholar (De Witte, Mél. d'Arch. vol. iii. p. 172), who adds that the title ἄρχων chosen by the artist in which to introduce the monogram of Christ seems to offer a direct allusion to the domination and the reign of the Saviour.

The form of the Φ (⊹) in the words Ἀφφιάνου and Στεφανηφόρου have been also considered to allude to the form of the cross (†), but it would be hazardous to affirm this, as a similar manner of engraving this letter occurs on the coins of the Seleucidae, of Philadelphia in Lydia, and of Sardes, in the latter case on a coin of Salonina, who is supposed to have been a Christian (see par. 3; Madden, Num. Chron. N. S. 1866, vol. vi. p. 218); at the same time such a form may be seen on the top of the labarum of certain coins of Constantine the Great to which I shall presently allude (§ vi.).

It must, however, be remembered that under Trajan Decius the Christians were grossly persecuted ("Exstitit post annos plurimos execrabile animal Decius, qui vexaret Ecclesiam," Lactant. de Mort. Pers. c. 4). Fabian, bishop of Rome, the first authentic martyr pope, was one of the early victims (Milman, Hist. of Christ. vol. ii. p. 188; vol. iii. p. 329), and many persons were killed throughout the empire. Yet the quiet that the Christians enjoyed during the mild reign of his predecessor Philip, and its effects, cannot have been suddenly stopped even by this attempt to extirpate Christianity, and it is not therefore improbable that a Christian artist here sought surreptitious means of protest against the tyranny of the persecutors of the church.

I may add that Tryphonia or Cephinia, the wife of Herennius Etruscus, son of Trajan Decius and Etruscilla, was probably converted to Christianity with her daughter Cyrilla after her husband's death (De Witte, op. cit.). Of this empress no coins are extant.

3. Obv. CORN. SALONINA AVG. Bust of Salonina to the right on a crescent.

Rev. AVG. [or AVGVSTA] IN PACE. Salonina seated to the left holding an olive-branch and sceptre. In the exergue sometimes the letters M S, sometimes P or S, sometimes S I. Billon. (Fig. 3; British Museum.)

The explanation of the remarkable legend on this coin of Salonina (circ. 260–268) was first given by M. de Witte, who in a most interesting memoir published in 1852 (Mém. de l'Acad. Roy. de Belgique, vol. xxvi.; cf. Rev. Num. Belge, vol. ii. 1853; Mél. d'Arch. vol. iii. Paris, 1853) traced the origin and names of Salonina the wife of Gallienus — carefully distinguishing her from Pipa or Pipara the concubine;—the character of this empress, and finally attempted to show, and not without success, that she was a Christian.

It has been amply proved, in spite of many objections, that the formula EN EIPHNH or IN PACE was exclusively Christian (Cavedoni, Ragg. del Mon. delle Art. Crist. Modena, 1849), that is to say, not in vogue among the pagans, though it was used previously by the Jews (Greppo, Not. sur des Inscript. ant. tirées de quelq. tombeaux juifs à Rome, Lyons, 1835). It was moreover a formula of Christian apotheosis, and as such has been treated by M. de Witte, who in the papers above referred to has supposed that these coins are commemorative, and were struck by order of Gallienus, after his wife's death. A few years after, two finds, one in 1855, consisting of some 4000 coins, the other in 1857, consisting of some 25 or 30,000 coins of silver and billon, among which were some of the pieces of Salonina, with the legend AVG. or AVGVSTA IN PACE, proved to M. de Witte (Rev. Num. 1857, p. 71) that these coins must have been issued before 265 and consequently during the lifetime of Salonina, an opinion that was shared by the late M. C. Lenormant (Rev. Num. 1857, pp. 243–245), but which has not commended itself to Mr. C. W. King (Early Christ. Num. p. 49, 1873), who whilst suppressing all mention of the authority of the two finds speaks of M. de Witte's conclusion as an "unlucky after-thought."

As regards the letters M S in the exergue, Mr. King (op. cit. p. xiv.) is of opinion that they must stand for some title, and that Memoriae Sanctae not merely gives a most appropriate sense, but is supported by the Venerandae Memoriae on the coins of Constantine (§ xiii.). The fact, however, is that other letters occur in the exergue, and the same may also be found on pagan types of the coins of Salonina, and on the coins of Gallienus, so that this hypothesis is out of the question. I am inclined to think that the letters bear some reference to the mintage or place of minting, but I am unable to offer any satisfactory solution.

It must be added that the late Abbé Cavedoni considered (Album. Giornale Lett. vol. xix. Rome, 1852) M. de Witte's suggestion a paradox, and did not admit his interpretation of the legend.

§ i. Chronological and Historical Sketch of the Reign of Constantine.—Previous to commencing the actual description of the coins of Constantine I. with Christian emblems, and for the better understanding of their arrangement and classification, it is necessary to give a brief chronological and historical sketch of the reign of this emperor.

311. In the year 311, Constantine I., being determined to stop the tyranny of Maxentius, reviewed in his own mind all considerations, and felt it incumbent on him to honour no other than the God of his father Constantius I. Chlorus (Euseb. Vit. Const. i. c. 27). He is consequently said to have prayed earnestly to God, and whilst thus praying with fervent entreaty, a most marvellous sign appeared to him from heaven. About midday, when the sun was beginning to decline, he saw with his own eyes in the heavens the trophy of a cross of light placed above the sun, and bearing the inscription BY THIS CONQUER (ΤΟΥΤΩ ΝΙΚΑ), a miracle witnessed by his whole army (Euseb. Vit. Const. i. c. 28).

But doubting in his own mind what the import of this apparition might be, he continued to meditate till night. During his sleep the Christ of God appeared to him with the sign that he had seen in the heavens, and commanded him to make a standard resembling the sign and to use it as a safeguard against his enemies (Euseb. Vit. Const. i. c. 29). So soon as it was day he arose, and calling together those that worked in jewels and precious stones, he sat in the midst and described to them the figure of the sign he had seen, and commanded them to make one like it in gold and precious stones, to which Eusebius adds, "and I also have seen this representation" (Vit. Const. i. c. 30).

The description of the standard of the cross, called by the Romans labarum, is minutely given by Eusebius (Vit. Const. i. c. 31. See art. LABARUM), who says that two letters indicating the name of Christ by means of the first letters were placed on the crown, "the letter P being marked diagonally with X exactly in its centre" (χιαζομένου τοῦ ρ κατὰ τὸ μεσαίτατον), which would perhaps rather give the form ☧ than ☧, and these letters the emperor at a later period used to wear on his helmet. The form of the cross, as employed by the soldiers on their shields, is given by Lactantius (De Mort. Pers. c. 44)—transversa ✕ litera, summo capite circumflexo, i.e. ☧.

312. Encouraged by these signs, Constantine advanced against Maxentius, whom he defeated on Oct. 27, 312, Maxentius himself being drowned in the Tiber while endeavouring to escape over the Milvian bridge. Constantine thus became sole master of the Western empire.

Shortly after Constantine's entry into Rome, he, in conjunction with Licinius I. his colleague, "having first praised God as the author of all their successes," drew up a full and comprehensive edict in favour of the Christians, and then sent it to Maximin, ruler in the east, who fearful of refusing, addressed a decree [b] commencing IOVIVS MAXIMINVS AVGVSTVS, etc. (a title assumed by him after the death of Galerius) to the governors under him, respecting the Christians, as if of his own free will (Euseb. H. E. ix. c. 9).

[b] The original edict is not now extant, but the copy issued by Maximin is given by Eusebius in Greek (H. E. ix. c. 9).

The whole Roman people received Constantine as their benefactor. The senate who paid adoration to the labarum (Prudent. in Symm. 494–496) decreed him the first rank among the Augusti (Lactant. de Mort. Pers. c. 44), and perhaps offered him the title of Maximus, "quem sibi Maximinus vindicabat," to the great grief and indignation of Maximin. "Cognito deinde senatus decreto, sic exarsit dolore, ut inimicitias aperte profiteretur, convicia jocis mixta adversus Imperatorem Maximum diceret" (Lactant. op. cit.). [See under 315.] Constantine erected a statue of himself in the most frequented part of Rome, and ordered a long spear in the form of a cross to be placed in the hands of the statue, and the following inscription to be engraved on it in the Latin language;—BY THIS SALUTARY SIGN, THE TRUE SYMBOL OF VALOUR, I HAVE SAVED YOUR CITY, LIBERATED FROM THE YOKE OF THE TYRANT. I HAVE ALSO RESTORED THE SENATE AND ROMAN PEOPLE TO THEIR ANCIENT DIGNITY AND SPLENDOUR. (Euseb. Vit. Const. i. c. 40; H. E. ix. c. 9.)

312–313. In 312–313, Constantine and Licinius were at Milan, where the latter was married to Constantia, the half-sister of Constantine (Lactant. de Mort. Pers. c. 45; Vict. Epit.; Zosim. ii. 17); and here the two emperors issued a second edict giving liberty to the Christians in particular, and to all men in general, to follow the worship of that deity which each might approve, so that thus the Divine Being (Divinitas) might be propitious to them and to all their subjects (Lactant. de Mort. Pers. c. 48; Euseb. H. E. x. c. 5).

In the meantime the impious Maximin Daza, taking advantage of the marriage festivities which were going on at Milan, marched from Syria into Bithynia, and from thence into Thrace. Licinius pursued him, and in a pitched battle at Adrianople defeated him. Maximin fled to Mount Taurus, and thence to Tarsus, where he is said to have given glory to the God of the Christians, and enacted a full and complete law for their liberty (Euseb. H. E. ix. c. 10), but too late, for being seized with a violent disease, he perished miserably (313). Licinius thus became sole master of the East, and on arriving at Nicomedia, he gave thanks to God for his victory (gratiam Deo, cujus auxilio vicerat, Lactant. de Mort. Pers. c. 48), and repeated the edict in favour of the Christians as issued by Constantine and himself at Milan (Lactant. op. cit.).

314 In 314 Constantine and Licinius

quarrelled, but the latter, being defeated, sued for peace, which was accepted.

315. In 315 the title of Maximus and the diadem were officially decreed to Constantine.

The title of Maximus is given to Constantine by Eumenius in his panegyric pronounced at Treves in 310 (Paneg. Const. Aug. Dict.), but the statement cannot be accepted as true (Heyne, Cens. xii. Paneg. Vet. in his Opusc. Acad. vol. vi. p. 80). Pagius (Crit. Baron. ann. 311) gives the date as 311 on the authority of a coin having on the obverse MAX. and on the reverse VOTIS V MVLT. X, but Mediobarbus, from whom the description of the coin is taken, is an authority of no value (Eckhel, Doct. Num. Vet. vol. viii. p. 94). Some modern numismatists, on the other hand (Feuardent, Rev. Num. 1856, p. 249; Cohen, Méd. Imp. vol. vi. p. 89), think that coins with this title were not struck till the end of his reign. The title was probably offered to him in 312 by the senate, as I have previously stated, but it is more likely that it was officially granted to him in 315, when the triumphal arch, to commemorate the victory over Maxentius in 312, was dedicated to him. — IMP. CAES. FL. CONSTANTINO MAXIMO P. F. AVGVSTO S. P. Q. R. etc. (Orelli, Inscr. No. 1075; see § xviii. "False or uncertain coins of Constantine I.") on which it was proclaimed that by the greatness of his own mind and the inspiration of the Divinity (instinctu Divinitatis)[c] he defeated the tyrant Maxentius, and this view is confirmed by a genuine brass coin preserved in the "Musée de Vienne," having on the obverse CONSTANTINVS MAX. AVG. COS. IIII and on the reverse the legend SOLI INVICTO COMITI (Eckhel, Cat. du Musée de Vienne; Cohen, Méd. Imp. Nos. 467, 468).

It is extremely probable that the senate decreed to Constantine at the same time the diadem (see § xvi. "Coins of Constantine with the diadem"), and it was perhaps on the occasion of these honours that Constantine distributed money to the people as attested by his coins (CONSTANTINVS MAX. AVG. Bust with diadem, Cohen, Méd. Imp. No. 160, from Welzl).

317. In 317 Crispus and Constantine II., the sons of Constantine I., and Licinius II. the son of Licinius I., were made Caesars.

321. In 321 Constantine enjoined all the subjects of the Roman empire to observe the "Lord's Day," and passed an edict for the solemn observance of Sunday (Clinton, F. R. vol. ii. p. 91), which he called dies Solis (Euseb. Vit. Const. iv. c. 18; Sozomen, H. E. i. c. 8).

323. For nine years there had been peace, but at last, in 323, a second war broke out between Constantine and Licinius. Two battles were fought, and in the second Licinius was utterly defeated and obliged to sue for pardon. His life was spared at the request of his wife Constantia, but only for a brief period, as he was put to death in the next year, 324, at Thessalonica, where he had been placed in confinement (Eutrop. x. 6; Hieron. Chron.; Zosimus, ii. 28; Euseb. Vit. Const. ii. c. 18; H. E. x. c. 9).

By this victory Constantine became sole master of the Roman world (RECTOR TOTIVS ORBIS on a gold coin struck at Thessalonica, Madden, Num. Chron. N. S. 1862, vol. ii. p. 48).

On Nov. 8 of this year Constantius II. was made Caesar.

325. About 325 the combats of Gladiators were abolished, but they appear still to have continued till as late as 455 (Gibbon, Rom. Emp. ed. Smith vol. iv. p. 41, note), and perhaps also the punishment of the cross (Aur. Vict. Caes. c. 41; Sozomen, H. E. i. c. 8).

330. 330. Dedication of Constantinople where Constantine abolished idolatry and built churches (Euseb. Vit. Const. iii. c. 48), placing in his palace a representation of the cross composed of precious stones richly wrought in gold (Vit. Const. iii. c. 49).

333. 333. Constans made Caesar.

337. 337. Constantine now began to feel signs of failing health, and visited Helenopolis, the birthplace of his mother Helena, where he is said to have for the first time received the imposition of hands with prayer, in fact became a catechumen, after which he proceeded to Nicomedia, where he was baptized by Eusebius, bishop of Nicomedia, though he had intended to defer this rite till he could have been baptized in the river Jordan. He soon after died, at noon on the feast of Pentecost (Euseb. Vit. Const. iv. c. 61–64;

[c] The words instinctu divinitatis have been supposed by some (Guattini, Mon. Ant. di Roma, p. xciv. 1789; Rom. descr. p. 42, 1805; Henzen, Suppl. ad Orell. vol. iii. p. 113) to have been written over the effaced words nutu Jovis o. m. or perhaps Diis faventibus, but Garrucci quite sets the question at rest by assuring us (Num. Cost. 2nd ed. p. 245; Rev. Num. 1866, p. 96) from personal inspection that the marble was not lower in the portion where these words occur than in other parts, nor are the letters themselves confused, nor are there any traces of letters to be seen that could have been previously engraved. It may be added that Constantine himself in his oration to the assembly of the saints (ap. Euseb. c. 26) speaks of his services as owing their origin to the inspiration of God (ἐξ ἐπινοίας Θεοῦ).

Socrates, H. E. i. 39; Sozomen, H. E. ii. c. 34; Theodoret, H. E. i. c. 32). Delmatius and Hannibalianus, and other members of the Imperial family, excepting Julian and Gallus, were put to death, and the three sons of Constantine I.—Constantine II. Constantius II. and Constans were declared Augusti.

From these statements it would appear that Constantine the Great was converted to Christianity about the year 312, and that his colleague Licinius I. pretended to embrace the same faith at or about the same period. Still many acts of his reign after this date show that he acted in anything but a Christian spirit. There may be specially mentioned: (1) the murder of Licinius I. in 324 contra jus sacramenti; (2) the murder of his son Crispus, and the young Licinius, a boy of eleven years of age, in 326; and (3) the murder of his wife Fausta in 327.[4] For these and other reasons, especially because he had on his coins the inscription Sol Invictus, some have considered (Niebuhr, Hist. of Rom. vol. v. p. 359) that he must have been "a repulsive phenomenon and was certainly not a Christian." Be this as it may, it is during the reign of Constantine that Christian emblems appear in a marked manner on the coins and on the Roman dated tituli.

In the numismatic studies now about to follow, it will be seen whether Constantine the Great ordered to be placed on the imperial coinage, either openly or latently, any Christian emblems from the time when he first professed Christianity in 312, or whether he deferred so doing till 323, after the defeat of Licinius, when as "ruler of the whole world" he could dare, without opposition, to inscribe upon his coins the symbols of the true religion of Christ.

Other specimens exist, issued at another mint, P. T. S. T. or T. T. (Prima, Secunda or Tertia Turracone), the first and last of which are in the British Museum, on which the monogram ☧ occurs. On another example in the British Museum, with reverse legend VICT. LAETAE PRINC. Havercamp). But the Abbé Cavedoni asserts (Ricerche Crit. etc. p. 4, note) that the supposed Monodia on the death of Constantine junior has been proved by Wesseling to have been written on the death of Theodorus Palaeologus, about the middle of the fifteenth century (Anonymi Orat. Fun. ed. Frotschero), whilst Manso (Leben Constantins, p. 65) treats the suggestion with contempt. There is, however, a great want of positive proof on this question.

Rev. Same legend and type: on the pedestal an equilateral cross ⊏╬⊐ within a wreath. In the exergue P. LN. (Prima Londinio.) Æ.

(Fig. 6; British Museum. Another example, published by Garrucci from Tanini, has on the obverse the additional letters PL. CL.)

Cavedoni considered (Ricerche, p. 20) the monograms on coins Nos. 1 and 2 to be more like stars, or monograms composed of the letters I and X, the initials of 'Ιησοῦς Χριστός, but they seem to have really the form of ✳.

As to the date of issue of the coins above described it is supposed that some may have existed previous to 323, as there are specimens of the coins of Constantine II. among them, and none of Constantius II. made Caesar in that same year (Cavedoni, Appendice, p. 6; Garrucci, op. cit.). The coin No. 4, bearing as it does the title of MAX. (Maximus), might have been issued in 315, in which year the Senate, as we have seen, granted him that title, whilst the coins of Constantine I. (Nos. 1 and 2) might even be as early as 312, and those of Crispus and Constantine II. (Nos. 5 and 6) as early as 317. They are all probably anterior to 319, and certainly precede the year 323.

The first two coins are interesting as confirming the words of Eusebius (Vit. Const. i. c. 31; cf. Sozomen, H. E. i. c. 8) that Constantine, besides having the monogram placed upon the labarum, was in the habit of wearing it upon his helmet. The helmet is sometimes ornamented with pellets or stars, and the former are no doubt intended to represent gems, according to the account of his panegyrist Nazarius (xxix. 5)—"fulget galea et corusca luce gemmarum divinum verticem monstrat," whilst according to Philostorgius (H. E. i. c. 6) the holy sign seen in the sky by Constantine was surrounded by stars that encircled it as a rainbow—καὶ ἀστέρων αὐτῶν κύκλῳ περιθεόντων τριδος τρόπῳ.

The words VICTORIAE LAETAE may be compared (cf. Cavedoni, Ricerche, p. 16; Dissertazione, p. 212) to the scriptural expressions "Laetabor ego super eloquia tua: sicut qui invenit spolia multa" (Ps. cxviii. 162), or "Laetabuntur . . . . sicut exultant victores capta praeda, quando dividunt spolia" (Is. ix. 3), and to the line of Horace (1 Sat. i. 8)—"Momento cita mors venit, aut victoria laeta."

Cavedoni would never believe that the supposed monogram was anything more than a star of six rays, or at the utmost the monogram composed of I and X, the initials of 'Ιησοῦς Χριστός. From the coins of this series which I have been able to examine (Nos. 8, 9, 10 and 12) it seems perfectly clear that the form is ✳, the vertical line terminating in a globule or a circle. Cohen (Méd. Imp. vol. vi. p. 83, note; Suppl. p. 375, note) agrees with Cavedoni that the sign is a star, which view he considers confirmed by the coin of Licinius II. (No. 11), which has a star of eight rays; but as he allows that the monogram ✳ (?) sometimes appears on the coins of Crispus (No. 9), there is no reason why it or ✳ or ✳ should not occur upon the coins above described. The piece with eight rays proves nothing, and we have seen that on the helmet of Constantine there was sometimes placed a star of eight rays — ✳ — instead of the Christian monogram. (See under No. 2; Fig. 5.)

I do not myself see any reason to doubt that these signs were intended for the Christian monogram, though at this period of the reign of Constantine expressed on the coinage in somewhat a latent manner.

This series was probably introduced about the year 319. It is anterior to 323, coins of both the Licinii being common to it, whilst those of Constantius II. Caesar, are wanting.

§ v. Coins of Constantine I. with the "Mars Conservator" and "Sol Invictus" types.—? 312—? 323.

It was at one time considered that the coins of Constantine I. with pagan symbols were not entirely excluded till 323, after the defeat of Licinius, but on no safe grounds, as the coins bearing the names and types of Jupiter, Hercules, and Mars never bear the title of Maximus, bestowed upon him in 315, from which it may reasonably be inferred that all these coins were struck previous to 312, when Constantine openly professed Christianity. One coin, however, of the Mars type and the title MAX. has been described from Tanini (Cohen, Méd. Imp. No. 361), whilst there is a series of coins of Crispus and Constantine II. with the type of Jupiter (Cohen, Méd. Imp. vol. vi. pp. 197, 198, Nos. 83–85; p. 234, Nos. 143, 144), which were certainly issued posterior to 317, in which year they were created Caesars, but the type was not struck in any mint in the dominions of Constantine, but in those subject to Licinius.

Some coins of Constantine I. with the legend MARTI [or MARTI PATRI] CONSERVATORI, having for type the bust of Constantine (?) with the helmet adorned with the monogram, or Mars standing, and in the field an equilateral cross or on his shield ✱, and others with the legend SOLI INVICTO COMITI, the sun standing, and in the field ✱, are supposed to be in existence (Garrucci, Num. Cost. 2nd ed. p. 241 seq.; Rev. Num. 1866, p. 86 seq.), but it is not clearly established that the "monogram" is not a star of six equal rays; or "the equilateral cross" the Latin letter or numerical mark X drawn sideways. On available specimens, from one of which a drawing is given (Fig. 9), there is a symbol which appears to be a cross, but it differs considerably from that on the coins previously described, and may indeed be only a numeral or a letter.

According to Zonaras (Ann. xiii. 3) Constantine placed in the forum of Constantinople the circular porphyry column brought from Rome, and on it he put the brazen statue of Apollo which he set up in his own name, substituting some of the nails of the passion for the rays of the sun, thus assuming with "singular shamelessness" (cf. Von Hammer, Const. und Bosp. vol. i. p. 162) the attributes of Apollo and Christ, from which circumstance Garrucci has found no difficulty in supposing that Constantine "changed the head of the statue," and fully intended to represent himself as Sol upon his coins.

Though Eusebius (Vit. Const. i. c. 43: cf. Lactant. de Mort. Pers. c. i.) in the rhetorical language of the time, compares Constantine to the sun rising upon the earth and imparting its rays of light to all, and though in the legend SOLI INVICTO COMITI there may be the idea of the ancient Sun-god and the new Sun of Righteousness [see art. CHRISTMAS], it is doubtful whether Constantine would have placed the monogram of Christ beside the image of the Sol Invictus, or have caused himself to be represented under the semblance of the sun together with signs of Christianity.

Should the coins of the Mars and Sol Invictus types be considered subsequent to 312, in any case they must be placed before 323, since coins of Constantius Caesar are wanting in this series, and as to the type of Sol Invictus, as no specimens of the coins of Licinius II. have been discovered, it would seem that it was first struck by the two Augusti, Constantine I. and Licinius I., and secondly by Constantine I. and his sons, after the year 319, when the quarrels between Constantine I. and Licinius I. had probably commenced.

There appears, indeed, to be little doubt that Constantine I., after he had conquered Maxentius in 312, found himself compelled to tolerate for some years on his coins, and on those of Crispus and Constantine II., some of the heathen types, such as the Mars and the Sol Invictus, one specimen of which, with the title MAX. and COS IIII gives the date 315 (see § i.), whilst the coins of Crispus and Constantine II. with these types cannot be anterior to 317, when they were made Caesars. Soon after, the coins with the Sun-type, but with the legend CLARITAS REIPVBLICAE on the coinage of Crispus and Constantine II. must have been introduced and continued in circulation till about ? 317 or 319, when the new coins of Constantine I., Crispus and Constantine II. with the legend VICTORIAE LAETAE PRINC. PERP. (§ iii.) and the coins of Constantine I. and Licinius I. and their sons, with the legend VIRTVS EXERCIT. (§ iv.) became universal.

[a] About the year 323, after the defeat of Licinius I. there was issued at the mints of Lyons, London and Treves, a series of coins of Constantine I., Crispus, Licinius II. and Constantine II. Caesares with the legend BEATA TRANQVILLITAS and the type a globe on an altar on which VOTIS XX, and above the globe three stars. On the globe may be seen ∴|∴ ⁜ and ✱, which according to Cavedoni (Ricerche. p. 20) the holy fathers delighted to think was the sign of the cross on the four cardinal points of the globe (S. Maximus Taurin. Homil. L. quae est ii. de cruce; Sedulius Carm. Paschal. l. iii). On some of the coins of the kings of the Bosphorus (Baron de Kühne, Descr. du Mus. du feu le Prince Kotschoubey, St. Pétersbourg, 1857), where Christianity had been early diffused, dating about 324 there has been thought to be a cross (Cavedoni, Appendice, p. 18). In 1853 the Count Ouvaroff discovered, near Sevastopol, the pillars and mosaic pavement of a Christian church built in the 4th century, and near the ruins of a temple of Venus (Kühne, op. cit. pp. 447, 448).

Similar coins exist of Crispus and Constantine II.

Of the series of these coins struck at Thessalonica there is no coin of Constantine I., of that struck at London there is no coin of Licinius I. That a coin of Constantine I. of this series was issued at Thessalonica is more than probable, as Illyricum, in which Thessalonica was situated, was added to the dominions of Constantine in 314, after the war with Licinius. Why no coin of Licinius I. should occur in this particular branch of the London series is not so clear, as coins of this emperor were probably struck there up to 321. It may be that the new quarrel with Licinius had commenced, and determined Constantine not to strike any of his colleague's coins at London.

The coins having the top of the staff of the labarum ending in a cross, were admitted in the first instance by Cavedoni (Ricerche, p. 9), who published from the Trésor de Numismatique (P. 131, Pl. lxii. No. 8) a gold medallion of Constantine II. with the legend PRINCIPI IVVENTVTIS and having in the exergue the letters CONS. (Constantinopoli), and alluded to brass coins with the legend VIRTVS EXERCIT. This example is not specially published by Cohen (cf. Méd. Imp. No. 5), and Cavedoni, apparently forgetting that he had mentioned this medallion, came to the conclusion (Appendice, p. 3) that the supposed cross on the top of the labarum was not in reality a cross, but only had the appearance of one, being nothing more than small pellets indicating the extremity of the cords or holders or other ornaments at the top of the spear.

Garrucci, on the other hand, has stated (Num. Cost. 2nd ed. p. 252; cf. Rev. Num. 1866, p. 107, pl. iii. No. 15) that he has seen a coin of Licinius I. struck at Aquileia, of which the form of the cross is

. I have not, however, myself seen any specimens of coins struck at Aquileia shewing such a decided cross, and it is difficult to say in most cases, whether the head of the spear is meant to express a cross or not. On some coins, as on those struck at Treves, Lyons, and Arles, the form appears to be '|', on others, especially on those issued at Thessalonica, the form becomes more a cross †.

Similar coins exist of Constantine II. and Constantius II. Cæsares. A specimen of a coin of Constantine II. in the possession of Garrucci (Num. Cost. 2nd ed. pl. No. 11; Rev. Num. 1866, pl. iii. No. 11) has a cross with a square top ✠. (See § xv.)

The type of the two soldiers was not introduced till after the death of Crispus. These coins must have been struck before 333, because those of Constans Cæsar are wanting.

B. with monogram ☧ in field. Similar types of Constantine I. (Fig. 12; British Museum), Constantine II., and Constantius II. but in the exergue, P. or S. CONST. (Prima or Secunda Constantinâ [Arles].) Æ.

This series must have been struck before 333, because the coins of Constans Cæsar are wanting.

Feuardent, Cavedoni, and Garrucci would limit the date to 330, supposing that the exergual letters CONST. refer to Constantinople, but it has long been established that these letters should be interpreted Constantina, the name given to Arles by Constantine the Great, probably about 312, after the defeat of Maxentius and Maximin, when he improved the city and made a new town on the opposite side of the river. It is called by Ausonius (Clarae urbes viii.) duplex, and the exergual letters CON. or CONST. (Constantina) are always preceded by a Latin differential letter, or accompanied by OF I, II or III in the field, whilst CON. or CONS. (Constantinopolis) are followed by a Greek numeral in cases where there is a differential letter (cf. F. W. Madden, Handb. to Rom. Num. p. 157; Num. Chron. N. S. 1861, vol. i. pp. 120, 180; J. F. W. de Salis, Arch. Journal, vol. xxiv.; Num. Chron. N. S. 1867, vol. vii. pp. 326, 327).

It has not been hitherto observed by any numismatist that the letter X of the word EXERCITVS is on these coins placed at the top of the coin exactly between the two standards, whilst on the coins with the same legend and two soldiers standing, between them the labarum, struck at a later date (335–337; § xii.) the letter X is placed in the centre at the top of the labarum. I am inclined to think that the arrangement is not accidental, but was specially intended by the artist.

The coin engraved (B. with ☧; Fig. 12) gives the earliest example of the so-called Constantinian monogram on the coins of Constantine.

discovered the cross of our Saviour, and he quotes in proof of his assertion a passage from St. Ambrose (de Obitu Theodosii, 47, 48), but without entering into the question of the "legend of the finding of the cross" [CROSS, FINDING OF], it may be mentioned that Eusebius, who gives an account of Helena's visit to the holy sepulchre, says nothing about the discovery of the cross, a point he was not at all likely to have omitted had such really been the case (Vit. Const. iii. c. 43). But the real fact is that both the coins of Helena and Theodora are "restoration coins," and struck after their death by Constantine the Great, and therefore after 328. It will be noticed that the legend is in the dative case, and that neither of them bear the title of Diva as they were Christians.[f] It has been insinuated that Helena first embraced the Christian faith, and gave her son a Christian education (Theodoret, H. E. i. c. 18; Gibbon, Rom. Emp. ed. Smith, vol. ii. p. 3, note 10), but Eusebius positively asserts (Vit. Const. iii. c. 47) that she owed her knowledge of Christianity to Constantine.

Shortly after Constantine's elevation to the purple he recalled his mother (who had been set aside by his father on his marriage with Theodora), and either before Fausta became his wife or upon the occasion of his marriage in 307, he issued some brass coins with the legends and titles FAVSTA N. F. (nobilissima femina) and HELENA N. F. These coins have on the reverse a large star with eight rays within a laurel wreath.[g] Constantine always treated his mother with the highest respect, and after his marriage gave her the title of Augusta, striking gold and brass coins in her honour with that title, the former of which are mentioned by Eusebius—χρυσοῦς τε νομίσμασι καὶ τὴν αὐτῆς εἰκονοῦσθαι εἰκόνα (Vit. Const. iii. c. 47; cf. Sozomen, H. E. ii. c. 2).

Rev. No legend. Wolf suckling twins; above, the monogram ☧ between two stars with eight rays. In the exergue P. CONST. (Prima Constantinâ.) Æ. (Fig. 15; British Museum.)

These types were introduced at the time of the dedication of Constantinople in 330. The pieces above described were not however issued at Constantinople, but at "Arles" (Constantina; § vii.). The stars on either side of the monogram on the coin with VRBS ROMA recall the words of Philostorgius about the "holy sign surrounded by stars," to which I have already alluded (§ iii.).

Some pieces of the VRBS ROMA type have been published (Eckhel, Cat. Mus. Caes. p. 480, No. 288) with the letters M. OST. (Moneta Ostiæ), but I doubt this reading, as after the defeat of Maxentius in 312, Constantine transferred the mint of Ostia to Rome (Madden, Num. Chron. N. S. 1862, vol. ii. p. 47; 1865, vol. v. p. 111).

A specimen of this extremely rare and interesting coin, which has been from time to time published by different writers (Baronius, Gretzer, Ducange, etc.), was seen in the cabinet of the Prince de Waldeck, by Eckhel, and was recognised by him as a genuine coin (Doct. Num. Vet. vol. viii. p. 88). The drawings usually given of it, such as that reproduced after Baronius, by Aringhi (Roma Sott. vol. ii. p. 705), and again engraved by Martigny (Dict. des Antiq. Chrét. s. v. Serpent), are of such a size as to lead most numismatists to suspect it. But there is no doubt that at least two genuine specimens exist, the one engraved, for the cast of which I am indebted to Dr. Friedlaender, and the example in the "Museum of Prince von Waldeck," published by Dr. Friedlaender (Blätter für Münzkunde, vol. i. p. 149, pl. vi. No. 6, Berlin, 1863).

Rev. Same legend and type. Æ. (Fig. 17.)

This rare little piece, of the smallest size, smaller even than the similar coin of his father, which I have introduced here, instead of in its proper chronological place, for better illustration, is in the possession of the Rev. S. S. Lewis, Fellow of Corpus Christi College, Cambridge, who most kindly sent it to me to see. It was formerly in the Wigan collection, and may be the same as that published by Gaillard (Descript. des Mon. de J. Garcia, p. 304, No. 4929, pl. x. No. 5). It has been published, and an engraving given of it twice the actual size, by Mr. C. W. King (Early Christ. Num. pp. xvi. xxiii. and 25 note, engraved on title-page; cf. art. LABARUM), who has allowed himself to be led away, as he says, by the "practised (and what is greatly to the present purpose), the unprejudiced eye of his draughtsman," who reads the word DEO on the labarum, which on examination turns out to be nothing more than three pellets, as on the coins of his father, and which probably represent gems or other ornaments of the labarum, or may be intended for the [f] This remark must not however be taken as absolute, for the sons of Constantine struck coins after his death giving him the epithet of Divus (§ xiii.).

[g] This attribution is objected to by Mr. C. W. King (Early Christian Numismatics, pp. 36–39, 304), who would wish to assign these coins of Helena to the wife of Julian, and those of Fausta to some lady who might have been the wife of one of the cousins of Julian, or to the sister (?) of Gallus and Julian, said to be mentioned by the latter in his epistles to the Athenians. I am not, however, prepared to accept Mr. King's conclusions. See my paper in the Num. Chron. N. S. 1877, vol. xvii. p. 361.

three stars as represented on the coins with the BEATA TRANQVILLITAS type (see § vi. note).

Both coins bear the mint mark CONS. which can only be interpreted Constantinopoli. This being the case, I may observe that they are the only coins of Constantine I. and his son bearing positive Christian emblems issued at the mint of Constantinople.[h]

The coin of Constantine I. was most likely struck in 330 on the dedication of the new capital; that of the son was probably issued after his father's death in 337 or 338, as it is recorded (Gibbon, Rom. Emp. ed. Smith, vol. ii. p. 366, and note 53) that "at the personal interview of the three brothers, Constantine II. the eldest of the Caesars obtained, with a certain pre-eminence of rank, the possession of the new capital, which bore his own name and that of his father." M. Feuardent (quoted by Mr. King) would assign its date to the period of the elevation of Constantine II. to the rank of Augustus, in the last days of his father's lifetime, but I do not know of any authority for such a supposition (cf. Socrat. H. E. i. c. 39; Sozomen, H. E. ii. c. 34; Euseb. Vit. Const. iv. c. 63, 68).

The type of these pieces and the inscription—though the legend is by no means a new one, occurring as it does from the time of Commodus (Cohen, Suppl. p. 484)—indicate how "the public hope" (cf. Euseb. Vit. Const. ii. c. 29; iv. c. 9) was centered in the triumph of the Christian religion over the adversary of mankind—"the great dragon, that old serpent, called the Devil and Satan" (Rev. xii. 9; xx. 2)—and we are told (Euseb. Vit. Const. iii. c. 3) how Constantine had a picture painted of the dragon—the flying serpent—beneath his own and his children's feet pierced through the middle with a dart and cast into the depths of the sea (βέλει πεταμένον κατὰ μέσου τοῦ κήτους; cf. Euseb. Const. orat. ad Sanct. Coetum, c. 20)

The spear-head on these coins ends in the monogram of Christ; on those struck at Thessalonica, Aquileia, London, and other mints, it ends in a cross (§ vi.).

These gold coins were probably issued about the same time. They cannot have been struck before 333, in which year Constans was made Caesar, and perhaps not till 335, when Constantine celebrated his tricennalia, and divided the empire between his sons and nephews. The mint of Antioch was in the dominions of Constantius II., and the form ☧ instead of ℞ is that specially employed in the East (see § xv.). The figures LXXII signify that 72 solidi were coined to the pound, Constantine I. having reduced the aureus about the year 312.

It was at Antioch that the name of Χριστιανός was first used (Acts xi. 26) about the year 44.

This coin was attributed by the late Mr. de Salis to Constantine II., but a comparison with the coins of this Caesar, as also with those struck at Lyons and Siscia when he became Augustus, make this attribution doubtful, an opinion also held by Mr. Grueber of the British Museum (see § xix.).

Similar coins occur of Constantine II. and Delmatius. Those of Constantius II. and of Constans were no doubt issued, but no specimens are in the British Museum.

B. with ℞ on labarum.—Coins of Constantine I., Constantine II., Constantius II., Constans, and Delmatius exist. (British Museum.)

The coin of Constantine I. engraved (Fig. 20; British Museum) was also attributed by the late Mr. de Salis to Constantine II., but with even less reason than in the former case.

These two series were not issued before 335, as the type is found on coins of Delmatius, who was made Caesar in this year, and it continues to the death of Constantine I. in 337. (See § vii.)

[h] On certain coins of Constantine I. struck at Constantinople, his head bears the nimbus (see § xvii.), whilst on the magnificent gold medallion of Constantius II. Caesar, also struck at Constantinople (Cohen. Méd. Imp. No. 21, from Musée de Vienne) weighing 3920 grains or 56 solidi, Constantine I. is represented standing between his two sons Constantine II. and Constans, whilst a hand from heaven crowns him with a wreath (§ xiii.). This piece must have been issued between 323 and 337, as Constantius II. is Caesar, and perhaps in 336 on occasion of his marriage. There is also the gold medallion of Constantine II. with spear-head ending in a cross and exergual letters CONS. (see § vi.).

ing, holding spear and globe; above the globe ☧. Æ. (Fig. 21; British Museum.)

Varieties of this coin occur with either ☧ or ☧ or ✕ struck at Lyons and at Arles. They must have been issued shortly after the death of Constantine in 337, or at latest in 338. Cavedoni has suggested (Disamina, p. 222) that this type represents the statue set up by Constantine in the forum of Constantinople (see § v.).

Other consecration coins were struck having the legends DV [Divus] CONSTANTINVS AVG. [or PT. AVGG. Pater Augustorum], and IVST. VEN. MEM. [Justa venerandæ memoriæ] IVST. VENERAB. or VN. MR. [venerandæ memoriæ], and especially a coin of which the following is a description:—

Mr. King (Early Christ. Num. p. 53; cf. Rev. J. Wordsworth, DICT. OF CHRIST. BIOG. vol. i. p. 649) speaks of these coins as issued at "Alexandria, Antioch and Carthage alone," but no coins were struck at Carthage at so late a date. They are found with the mint marks of Heraclea, Alexandria, Constantinople, Cyzicus, Nicomedia and Antioch. On some specimens there is no star.

With reference to the word Divus, the system of "consecration" seems to have obtained even after the time of Constantine I. among his Christian successors; Constantius II. "meruit inter divos referri" (Eutrop. x. 15); Jovian "inter divos relatus est" (Eutrop. x. 18); Valentinian I. was consecrated by his son Gratian "divinis honoribus" (Auson. ad Grat. act. c. 8), to which may be added the name of Valentinian II., as appears from a marble of Chiusi in Tuscany (Cavedoni, Cimit. Chius. p. 45, Modena, 1853). No coins, however, bearing the title of Divus are known of any of these emperors.

The coin engraved (Fig. 22) is especially mentioned by Eusebius as representing Constantine I. in the act of ascending to heaven (Vit. Const. iv. c. 73). The type was probably suggested by the biblical account of Elijah taken up to heaven in a chariot and horses of fire (2 Kings ii. 11; cf. vi. 17). The star is doubtless the comet alluded to by Eutropius as appearing after his death ("denunciata mors ejus etiam per crinitam stellam," &c. Hist. x. 8), and which reminds one of the stella crinita which blazed for seven days after the death of Julius Cæsar (Suet. Jul. Cæs. 88; cf. Plin. N. H. ii. c. 25; Dion. Cass. xlv. 7; Plut. Cæs. 69), and which is represented on his coins (Cohen, Méd. Imp. Nos. 20, 21). The star was originally a pagan symbol, but pagan symbols for long after the time of Constantine were mixed with Christian ones. There may be specially mentioned the phœnix, occurring first on the gold consecration coins of Trajan as an emblem of Eternity (Madden, Num. Chron. N. S. 1861, vol. i. p. 95), on a gold coin of Hadrian representing Trajan (?) holding a phœnix within the zodiac (Madden, Num. Chron. N. S. 1862, vol. ii. p. 49), on an Alexandrian coin of Antoninus Pius with AIΩN (æternitas, Eckhel, Doct. Num. Vet. vol. iv. p. 89), and again reappearing on the brass medallions of Constantine I., with the legend GLORIA SAECVLI VIRTVS CAES, and probably struck after 315, as they bear the title of MAX. (Cohen, No. 164), and on coins of Constantius II. and Constans when Augusti (Cohen, Méd. Imp.; see § xix.).

The "hand from heaven" occurs on the gold medallions of Constantius II., to which I have already referred (§ x. note); and Eusebius (de Laud. Const. c. 10) speaks of the Almighty King extending his right hand from above and giving Constantine I. victory over all his enemies.

There are certain coins of Constantine I., some gold with legend GLORIA EXERCITVS (Cohen, Méd. Imp. No. 17, from Tanini), some silver with PAX AVGVSTORVM (Cohen, No. 76, from Musée de Vienne), and of Constantine II. Cæsar (brass) with BEATA TRANQVILLITAS (Cohen, No. 86, from Ducange) having a cross either in the field, or on the standard, or on the helmet, but of what form it is impossible to say. The first mentioned may have been struck between 326 and 333; the second, as it does not bear the title of Maximus, perhaps before 315, though this rule cannot be considered as absolute, as coins of Constantine I. were certainly struck after 315 without it (§ iv.); and the third about 323 (§ vi.).

§ xv. Remarks on the Forms of the Crosses adopted by Constantine I.—There is not much doubt that Constantine did not invent the forms of the cross or monogram which appears on his coins. The monogram ☧ may be seen on the coins of Alexander Bala, king of Syria (B.C. 146), and on those of the Bactrian king Hermaeus (B.C. 138–120), and also occurs on the coins of Trajan Decius (A.D. 249–251), forming part of the word A☧ (ἄρχοντος) to which I have already referred (see Introduction), whilst the complete form of the labarum ☧ may be found on the coins of the Indo-Scythian king Azes (B.C. 100), and on those of the Bactrian kings Hippostratus the Great (B.C. 140–135) and of Hermaeus (B.C. 138–120), which monogram has been interpreted Ortospana, another name for Kabul (Gen. Cunningham, Num. Chron. N. S. 1868, vol. viii. p. 203, pl. vii. Mon. No. 4*th*, &c.; E. Thomas, Num. Chron. vol. iv. pl. viii. No. 3). The ☧ may have sometimes signified ΧΡυσιπκός. It was used as an abbreviation for ΧΡηστόν, since a collection of passages so marked might make up a χρηστομάθεια. It also stood for ΧΡυσός and ΧΡόνος (Liddell and Scott, s.v. Χ), but it eventually became the Christian monogram composed of Χ and Ρ, the two first letters of the name of ΧΡιστός.

The form with the vertical line ending in a circle or a pellet (✳ ✳) may be compared with the monogram ✳ supposed to signify Χιλίαρχος, to that occurring on the coins of the Ptolemies— ☧, ☧, ☧, ☧, to the ✳ on some (though rarely) of the coins of the kings of the Bosphorus, and to the star or comet above the heads of Julius Caesar and Augustus (Letronne, Inscript. de l'Egypte, vol. i. p. 433; Mionnet. Suppl. vol. ix. p. 22, No. 122; Koehne, Mus. Kotschoubey, vol. ii. p. 309; Cohen, Méd. de la Répub. Rom. pl. xv. No. 30).

The form ☧ occurs on the coins of Tigranes, king of Armenia (B.C. 96–64); on coins of Arsaces X. XII. and XIV. (B.C. 92–38) forming ΤΙΓΡανοκερτας or Tigranocerta, the capital of Armenia (Mionnet, vol. v. p. 108, No. 939; Cunningham, Num. Chron. N. S. 1868, vol. viii. p. 196); on the coins of the Jewish king Herod I. (B.C. 38), and on the coins of Chios of the time of Augustus (Madden, Jew. Coinage, pp. 83, 85, 87, 244). This form seems to have been that exclusively used in the East, and Letronne states (La Croix ansée in Mém. de l'Acad. vol. xvi.) that he never found the ☧ on any of the Christian monuments of Egypt. Its adoption was doubtless from its affinity to the crux ansata. It is the only monogram in the Vatican Codex (4th cent.), in the Codex Pezae Cantab. (5th or 6th cent.), and in the Codex Sinaiticus (4th cent.), where it occurs in four places, at the end of Jeremiah, twice at the end of Isaiah, and in the middle of the word ESTAVPΩΘH in the 8th ver. of chap. xi. of Revelation (Martigny, Dict. p. 416).

It was on the coins struck at Antioch (§ xi.) that Constantine first introduced the ☧, about the year 335, though the same form occurs on the coins struck after his death at Lyons and (?) Arles (§ xiii.).

The earliest example of the equilateral cross ✠ may be seen on the breast of or suspended from the neck of one of the kings on the slabs brought from Nineveh (Bonomi, Nineveh and its Palaces, pp. 333, 414; cf. p. 303). At a later date its form was ✝ (De Witte, Mon. Céram. vol. i. pl. xciii.), sometimes accompanied by globules ⁘, as on vases, both of which symbols may have had their origin in the sign ⊹, which occurs on the coins of Gaza—frequently called the "monogram of Gaza"—on monuments and vases of Phoenician origin, on Gallo-Celtic coins, on Scandinavian monuments called "Thor's hammer," and on Indian coins called "the Swastika cross" (Rapp, Das labarum, etc., in vol. xxxix. of the Vereins v. Alterthumsfreundem im Rheinlande, 1865; Garrucci, Num. Cost. 2nd ed. p. 242).

The three principal forms of crosses in antiquity are (1) the cross ✕ called decussata. (2) the cross ⊤ called commissa, and (3) the cross ✝ called immissa. [CROSS.]

The form ✕ was doubtless an abbreviated monogram of the name of Christ. Julian the Apostate, in speaking of his hostility against Christianity in his satire against the people of Antioch, writes (Misopōgon, Jul. Op. p. 111, Paris 1583), "You say I wage war with the Chi and you admire the Kappa" (καὶ ὅτι πολεμῶ τῷ Χῖ πόθος δὲ ὑμᾶς εἴσεισι τοῦ Κάππα); and again (op. cit. p. 99), "They say that neither the Chi nor the Kappa ever did the city any harm; it is hard to understand the meaning of this wise riddle of yours, but we happen to have been informed by some interpreters of your city that they are initial letters of names, the one denoting Christ, the other Constantius" (τὸ Χῖ, φησίν, οὐδὲν ἠδίκησε τὴν πόλιν, οὐδὲ τὸ Κάππα . . . . . δῆλοῦν δ' ἐθέλειν τὸ μὲν Χριστὸν τὸ δὲ Κωνστάντιον).

The cross ⊤ is in the form of a Tau and appears to be a variety of the crux ansata, or "cross with a handle" found on Egyptian and Assyrian monuments. It was sometimes used in the same manner as the ☧ in the middle of the name of the deceased, as may be seen on a marble of the 3rd century in the Callixtine cemetery with the legend IRE ⊤ NE.

The cross ✝ has been generally supposed to be the kind on which our Lord was crucified, which seems further corroborated from the fact that the title of Hebrew, Greek, and Latin was placed above his head (Matt. xxvii. 37) or over him (Luke xxiii. 38; cf. Mark xv. 25) or over the cross (John xix. 19) and so would have a form like ⊤.

De Rossi has shown (De Christ. tit. Carth. in vol. iv. of Spicil. Solesmense, ed. Pitra, 1858) that no Christian monument of certain date before the 5th century gives examples of the crux immissa, or of that which has been called the Greek —✝—. On the other hand an epitaph, which from its consular date is earlier than the reign of Constantine, proves that the Christians had a monogram composed of the letters I and X (Ἰησοῦς, Χριστός), thus formed ✳ (De Rossi, Inscript. Christ. vol. i. p. 16, 1855).

The most ancient and most correct form of the monogram of Christ occurs upon a monument of Sivaux in France, which is considered by De Rossi (Bullet. Arch. Christ. p. 47, 1863) earlier than the time of Constantine, having the arms of the cross of great length ☧. [INSCRIPTIONS, I. p. 856, where it is engraved.] This was not long afterwards modified, and it is at the time of Constantine that the ☧ occurs for the first time on the Roman dated tituli. There has been discovered (De Rossi, Bullet. p. 22, 1863) a monument of the year 323, which is precisely the year of the defeat of Licinius, having on it the monogram ☧. De Rossi has also published (Inscr. Christ. vol. i. No. 26) a fragment with the inscription [VI]XIT . . . . ☧ . . . GAL. CONSS. which he thinks might perhaps be of the year 298, when Faustus and Gallus were consuls, adding that if he could only find the missing portion and it bore the name of Faustus, auro contra et gemmis cariorem aestimaret. It is, however, more than probable that the Gallus in this inscription was consul at a much later date; indeed it has been suggested that this inscription refers to the emperor Constantius II. and Constantius Gallus Caesar, who were consuls in 352, 353, and 354 (Edinburgh Review, vol. cxx. 1864, p. 229). Other marbles of the years 331, 339, 341, and 343 are known. In 347 the form ☧ occurs, but not for long, for the ✕ is dropped, and this form together with the old one continues in existence till the end of the 4th century. From the 5th century the P disappears and the Latin cross † or the Greek ✚ take the place of the monograms, so that after 405 the ☧ (at Rome at least) especially on epitaphs is entirely eclipsed, and the plain cross is found on all monuments (Martigny, Dict. des Antiq. Chrét. p. 416) excepting on coins.

The form of the cross on some of the coins of Constantine struck at Aquileia is This has been supposed by Cavedoni (Nuove Ricerche, p. 3) to be not the Latin but the Alexandrian or Egyptian, an opinion not acceded to by Garrucci (Num. Cost. 2nd ed. p. 259), and it may be noticed that Garrucci has published a coin with a square instead of a rounded top (Num. Cost. 2nd ed. pl. No. 11; Rev. Num. 1866, pl. iii. No. 11; see § vii.). It is certainly very doubtful if the cross on the coins of Aquileia is the crux ansata, and even Borghesi did not know what the rounded extremity could have in common with the handle of the Egyptian cross, for the cross called ansata has not a round but an ovoid top, into which the hand might be introduced, as may be seen on existing monuments (Wilkinson, Anc. Egyptians, 1841, Suppl. pl. 20, 21, etc.).

As to the rounded top, Garrucci suggests (Num. Cost. 2nd ed. p. 261) that it may have been meant to allude to the sacred head of the Redeemer, which was thus intended to be represented projecting above the cross, an idea considered by Cavedoni (Rivista, p. 216) a "whimsical fancy," as "everyone," he says, "knows that that most sacred head rested below the beam of the cross itself." But Cavedoni is decidedly wrong, as the following earliest examples of the crucifix show the head above the cross beam; (1) crucifixes on a cornelian and an inedited ivory of the 5th century (Garrucci, Diss. Arch. p. 27); (2) crucifix of the Syrian codex in the Laurentian library at Florence, dated 586 by its writer the monk Rabula (Assemani, Bibl. Laurent. Medic. Cat. pl. xxiii. Florence, 1742); (3) the pastoral cross and reliquary of Theodolinda, Queen of Lombardy, who died in 628 (Martigny, Dict. des Antiq. Chrét. p. 191); (4) crucifix of the cemetery of St. Julius or St. Valentinus (Bottari, Sculture, etc. vol. iii. 192; Rome, 1737–1754); to which may be added the curious graffito, giving a caricatured representation of the crucifixion drawn at the end of the 2nd or the beginning of the 3rd century (see art. CRUCIFIX).

§ xvi. Coins of Constantine I. with the diadem—?315–337.

Without entering into the history of the introduction of the diadem at Rome, by the emperors, it is certain that Constantine I. was the first to unhesitatingly adopt it, as testified by his coins, and indeed he is said to have always worn it. ("Habitum regium gemmis et caput exornans perpetuo diademate." Aurel. Vict. Epit. 141.)

It has been supposed (Eckhel, Doct. Num. Vet. vol. viii. p. 80) that Constantine adopted the diadem, wishing to liken himself to Alexander the Great, on whose coins an effigy of a very similar character may be seen, but according to the authority of St. Ambrose (de Obitu Theod. 47, 48) the empress Helena, at the time when she is supposed to have discovered at Jerusalem, about 326, the fragment of our Saviour's cross, together with two of the nails (one of which was used for the bridle of his horse, the other for his diadem), sent to her son Constantine a diadem studded with gems, which has been identified with the iron crown of Lombardy at Monza cathedral [CROWN]; moreover the senate is said (Anonym. Paneg. viii. 25; Tillemont, Const. note 33)—probably in 315 when he was decreed the title of Maximus (see § i. under 315)—to have specially granted a diadem to Constantine.

The coin engraved (Fig. 23; British Museum) shows Constantine with the diadem, and with his head represented looking upward towards heaven, and Eusebius states (Vit. Const. iv. c. 15) that "he directed his likeness to be stamped on the gold coins of the empire with the eyes uplifted as if praying to God," adding that "this money became current throughout the whole Roman world." It was doubtless to this coinage that his apostate nephew Julian sneeringly alludes in his "Caesars" when he speaks of Constantine being enamoured of the moon, upon whom he kept his eyes constantly fixed, and from the style of his hair and face leading the life of a female hairdresser. Constantine also had his full-length portrait placed over the entrance gates of his palaces with the eyes upraised to heaven and the hands outspread as if in prayer (Euseb. Vit. Const. iv. c. 15),[1] though this form of adoration likewise obtained among the pagans (Virg. Aen. i. 93; Demosth. adv. Macart. 1072).

The diadem also may be found on the coins of all Constantine's sons Caesars, and Eusebius says (Vit. Const. i. c. 18) that it was a special distinction of the Imperial Caesars.

§ xvii. Coins of Constantine I. and his Family, with the Nimbus.

Several coins and medallions of Constantine I., of his wife Fausta, and of his sons Crispus, Constantine II., and Constantius II. with the nimbus, some of which were issued at Constantinople, are given by Cohen, but very few are now in existence. The absurd brass medallion of Crispus, with legend SALVS ET SPES XPPVBLICAE (sic) and Christ seated facing, holding a cross, etc., and in the exergue S. P. Sanctus Petrus! (Cohen, No. 27), is evidently an altered piece, the "XP-PVBLICAE" being substituted for "REIPVBLICAE," "the cross" for "a globe," and "the figure of Christ" for "Constantine with nimbus seated facing," as may be seen on a genuine medallion of Constantine; S. P. should certainly be S. R. (Secunda Româ). After Constantine's death his sons continued striking coins representing their father with the nimbus (Cohen, Constans, No. 3, No. 34), and they very soon frequently adopted it, a custom continued under their successors, and especially on the splendid gold medallions of Valens preserved at Vienna (Cohen, Nos. 1, 6, 8, and 10).

[1] The Rev. J. Wordsworth (Smith, Dict. of Christ. Biog. vol. i. p. 649) speaks of the coins as "having no traces of the hands mentioned by Eusebius," but this author does not mention the hands in connection with the coins on which the face is "stretched out or up towards God (ἀνατεταμένον πρὸς Θεὸν), but in connection with the picture where the hands are said to have been "stretched forth" (τῶν χεῖρα δ' ἐκτεταμένος) in the attitude of prayer.

Some of the coins of the Roman emperors earlier than the time of Constantine, are decorated with this symbol, notably those of Claudius, Trajan, and Antoninus Pius (Madden, Num. Chron. N. S. 1868, vol. viii. p. 34), so that its presence gives no direct proof of the Christianity of Constantine, though it was doubtless adopted in this sense.

§ xviii. False or uncertain coins of Constantine I. and II.

(1) Silver medallion representing Constantine holding standard on which ☧, and in the exergue R. P. (Garrucci, Num. Cost. 2nd ed. p. 248, from Caronni); (2) the brass medallion with legend IN HOC SIN. (sic) VIC. and monogram ☧; above a star; totally remade from a large brass coin of the time between Trajan Decius and Gallienus (Cohen, Méd. Imp. vol. vi. p. 119 note); (3) the brass medallion of the contorniate style, having for legend the entire inscription on the arch of Constantine, placed thereon to commemorate the defeat of Maxentius in 312. Its authenticity was vindicated by the compiler of the Pembroke Sale Catalogue (p. 297), but whether it sold as a genuine piece I am unable to say; see § i. under 315; (4) the gold coin with the legend VICTORIA MAXVMA and type A ☧ Ω published by Garrucci and accepted as genuine by other modern writers (Martigny, Dict. des Antiq. Chrét. p. 458; see Art. A and Ω); it is not published by Cohen; (5) the coin with legend BAP. NAT. supposed to refer to the baptism of Constantine, but which by the alteration of one letter becomes B. R. P. NAT. (Bono Reipublicae NATO); (6) coins with the monogram ☧ on the helmet, and ☧ or ✠, tracé en creux on a pedestal supporting a shield, on which VOT. P. R., originally published by Garrucci (Num. Cost. 1st ed. Nos. 13 and 16), and now considered by him to be false (Num. Cost. 2nd ed. p. 253; Rev. Num. 1866, p. 110). To which may be added the silver piece of Constantine II. Caesar, described incorrectly as a gold coin from Tristan, by Garrucci (Num. Cost. 1st ed. No. 10), with the legend VICTORIA AVGG. and in the field ✠, a piece which has been in all probability confounded with the coins of Constantine III. (407–411) with the legend VICTORIA AAAVGGGG.

§ xix. Coins of Constantine II., Constantius II., and Constans Augusti—Introduction of A and Ω on coins.

After the death of Constantine I. the type of the two soldiers and the legend GLORIA EXERCITVS was continued by his three sons.[j] The cross on the labarum is of three forms:

(1) ✠. (Fig. 24.)

(2) ✕. Of this series I have not seen any coin of Constantine II., but it doubtless exists. That attributed by the late Mr. de Salis I have restored to Constantine I. (see § xii.). The coins of Constantius II. and Constans of this series are in the British Museum.

(3) ☧. (Fig. 25.)

On some coins all three emperors have the title of Maximus. The coin engraved (Fig. 25) was struck at Siscia, but similar pieces with the title MAX. were issued at Lyons. They are erroneously attributed by M. Feuardent (Rev. Num. 1856, p. 253, pl. vii. No. 2) to Constantine I. the Great.

The same type continues for a short time after the death of Constantine II. in 340, but only with the symbols ✕ and ☧ on the labarum,[k] but many other types were introduced, among which may be noticed the FEL. TEMP. REPARATIO (Felix temporis reparatio), bearing on the labarum all the three forms— ✠, ✕, ☧ (Fig. 26). The "happy reparation" did not however extend to the softening of manners, for the types of the coins as a rule represent scenes of the grossest cruelty. At the introduction of Christianity artistic style seems to have perished, and the coinage of this and later periods, to quote M. Cohen's expression (Méd. Imp. vol. vi. p. 264, note), can be summed up in two words—"monotonie dans les types, lorsqu'ils ne sont pas barbares, barbarie lorsqu'ils ne sont pas monotones."

It is during the reign of Constantius II. that the brass coins with the inscription HOC SIGNO VICTOR ERIS are first issued (Fig. 27), a legend which is repeated on the coins of Vetranio (350) and of Constantius Gallus (351–354).

The most important innovation of this period was the introduction of the letters A and Ω. I have already pointed out (§ xviii.) that the coin of Constantine I. with these letters cannot be relied on, and I have now further to state that many numismatists and others (Garrucci, Martigny; see art. A and Ω) have accepted as genuine a gold coin of Constantius with the [j] For the classification in this section of the coins of the sons of Constantine with the legend GLORIA EXERCITVS, which is fully developed in my paper in the Numismatic Chronicle, (N. S. 1878, vol. xviii. p. 23), I am indebted to the labours of the late Mr. de Salis.

[k] On some of the coins of Constans and Constantius II. the letter M occurs on the labarum, which M. de Witte has suggested (Rev. Num. 1857, p. 197) may be the initial letter of the Virgin Mary, and Mr. King (Early Christ. Num. p. 42) of Magnentius, commander-in-chief under Constans, but neither of these theories is worthy of serious thought. Moreover the letters O, C, G, I, S, T, or V, also occur on the labarum, and how are these to be interpreted? I cannot explain the letters.

A ☧ ω which turns out to have been described originally by Banduri (vol. ii. p. 227) as A ☧ Q: but the authenticity of the piece is very doubtful. These letters do however occur upon the second brass coins of Constantius II. (Fig. 28), struck about (?) 350–353, and also on a rare silver medallion of Constans in the 'Musée de Vienne' (Cohen, Méd. Imp. No. 28), on which are represented four military standards, on the second the letter A, on the third ω, and above ☧, and issued at Rome. It has been suggested (Cavedoni, Appendice, p. 15) that Constans in striking this medallion at Rome wished to testify his adherence to the Catholic dogma of the divinity and eternity of the Incarnate Word, in opposition to the Arian heresy favoured by his brother Constantius, and it may have been struck soon after the council of Sardica in 347. Though the letters A and ω were probably employed perhaps even as early as the council of Nice in 325 (art. A and Ω), it was not till about 347 that they commenced to come into general use in any case on coins. As to the form ω instead of Ω, Garrucci asserts (Hagioglypta, p. 168) that the Ω nowhere occurs on any authentic Christian monument, and condemns, as also does De Rossi, a ring published by Costadoni on which is a dolphin between the letters A and Ω.

Nepotian made himself master of Rome in 350, and issued gold coins with the legend VRBS ROMA and the type Rome seated holding a globe surmounted with ☧ (☧), but was killed after a reign of twenty-eight days. Vetranio, on hearing of the death of Constans and the revolt of Magnentius, had himself proclaimed emperor at Sirmium, and produced a new legend SALVATOR REIPVBLICAE with the type of himself holding the labarum, on which ☧. He also repeated the coinage with the legend HOC SIGNO VICTOR ERIS. The usurper Magnentius (350–353) and his son Decentius struck coins with the A ☧ ω at Ambianum (Amiens), a mint that was suppressed soon after his death by Constantius II. On the coins of Constantius Gallus Caesar (351–354) the HOC SIGNO VICTOR ERIS again, and for the last time, occurs. Some coins of this prince with the Isis reverse shew that he to a certain extent must have embraced the pagan opinions of his brother Julian.

Immediately on the accession of Julian the Apostate (355–363) all Christian emblems were abolished, and pagan customs and worship were re-established. In consequence most of the coins of this emperor bear the image of Apollo, Jupiter, the DEVS SANCTVS NILVS, and of many Egyptian deities, Anubis, Serapis, Isis, etc., several of them giving representations of himself as Serapis, and his wife Helena as Isis. It is then hardly to be expected that any coin of this prince would be in existence bearing Christian signs, and yet one has been published —a bronze medallion—representing Julian holding a standard, beneath which is ☧ (Cohen, Méd. Imp. No. 51, from Wiczay). The only point in its favour is that it shews Julian as bearing the title of Caesar, and if really authentic must have been struck immediately on his appointment to that honour in 355. I cannot however say that the medallion is above suspicion.

§ xxi. Coins from the Accession of Jovian (363) to the death of Theodosius the Great (395).

Under Jovian, the successor of Julian the Apostate, although a few coins bearing pagan types with the legend VOTA PVBLICA occur, and which continue to circulate during the reigns of Valentinian I., Valens, and Gratian, Christian emblems again re-appear, and the labarum terminating in a cross together with the monogram ☧ or the simple labarum are of common occurrence (Cohen, Méd. Imp. Nos. 17, 21). The coin of Jovian which has been published by some (Sabatier, Mon. Byz. vol. i. pp. 34, 58; Martigny, Dict. p. 460; King, Early Christ. Num. p. 84), as struck at Ravenna, cannot be genuine, as Ravenna was not established as a mint till the reign of Honorius (Madden, Num. Chron. N. S. 1861, vol. i. p. 181; 1862, vol. ii. pp. 60, 253; Handb. of Rom. Num. p. 159).

Under Valentinian I. the most notable reintroduction is that of the form ✝ which is generally carried at the top of the sceptre held by the emperor (Cohen, Méd. Imp. No. 20), but sometimes occurs in the field of the coin (No. 25). Similar emblems, as also the labarum adorned with the ☧ or ✕ continue on the coins during the reigns of his brother Valens, the usurper Procopius, of his sons, Gratian and Valentinian II. and Theodosius I. the Great.[1] The coins both of gold and brass of Aelia Flaccilla, the wife of Theodosius I., who was much esteemed for her piety, also exhibit interesting Christian emblems, among the most striking of which is the type of victory seated inscribing on a shield the ☧ (Cohen, Méd. Imp. No. 1), a reverse that occurs frequently afterwards on the coins of other empresses; whilst the coins of Magnus Maximus, usurper in Britain and Gaul, and of his son Victor (BONO REIPVBLICAE NATI) and of Eugenius, usurper in Gaul, shew more or less the same symbols.

[1] The form CONOB which may be explained Constantinae[Arles]Moneta 72, or Obryza "pure gold," appears for the first time on the gold coins under Valentinian II. and Theodosius I., and is exclusively a Western mint mark; the form CONOB Constantinopoli 72, occurs only on the coins of Constantinople and for the first time under Gratian, Valentinian II., and Theodosius I. (Madden, Num. Chron. N. S. 1861, vol. i. pp. 123, 124), and they both continue till about the time of Justinian I., when CONOB is used throughout the empire on the Byzantine gold. I am inclined to think with Messrs. Pinder and Friedlaender (Aeltere Münskunde, 1851; cf. De la Sign. des Lettres OB, Berlin, 1873) that the letters OB stand for "72 solidi," coined from one pound of gold (Num. Chron. N. S. 1861, vol. i. p. 177; vol. ii. p. 240), but the late Mr. de Salis considered (Num. Chron. N. S. 1867, vol. vii. p. 327), that M. de Petigny (Rev. Num. 1857, p. 115) gives most convincing arguments for reading Obryza "pure gold."

§ xxii. Division of the Empire (395). A. The West to end of Western empire (476). B. The East to the time of Leontius (488).

A. The West.—After the death of Theodosius I. the empire was divided between his two sons Arcadius and Honorius,[m] the former taking the Eastern, the latter the Western provinces. About this time the type of Victory, holding a globe surmounted by a cross, is introduced (Arcadius, Sabatier, Mon. Byz. vol. i. p. 404; Honorius, Cohen, Méd. Imp. No. 24), and the Greek cross may be seen on the exagia solidi of Arcadius, Honorius, and Theodosius II. (Cohen, No. 6, Sabatier, pl. iii. No. 9). On a gold coin of Honorius struck at Ravenna, in the collection of Dr. John Evans, the emperor is represented holding a spear, surmounted by ☩, on the head of an animal which appears like a lion with a serpent's or dragon's tail.

On certain coins of Aelia Galla Placidia, wife of Constantius III., the colleague of Honorius for a few months, the ☧ or a cross, is represented on her right shoulder, whilst the ☧ is within a wreath on the reverse (Cohen, Nos. 1–16), and the hand from heaven crowning the empress is introduced (Cohen, Nos. 2, 10, 11), as had also been the case on the coins of Eudoxia in the East.

The usurper Priscus Attalus seems to have dropped Christian emblems, and Rome having been sacked by Alaric who placed him on the throne, he dared to strike silver medallions twice the size of a five-shilling piece, and gold and silver coins with the presumptuous legend INVICTA ROMA AETERNA (Cohen, Nos. 1, 3–5). The usual emblems occur on the coins of John, proclaimed emperor in 423.

Valentinian III. appears to have been the first emperor who wore a cross on his diadem, if the gold medallion is genuine (Cohen, No. 1, from Banduri), and on other coins (Cohen, No. 11), holding a cross and a globe on which Victory, he changes the ordinary captive trampled under foot to a human-headed serpent, a custom followed by many of his successors. The type of the emperor holding the mappa or volumen and a long cross was also introduced (Cohen, No. 21). His wife Licinia Eudoxia also bore the cross on her diadem on her coins struck in Italy (Fig. 29; Cohen, No. 1). A very rare gold coin of this empress (De Salis, Num. Chron. N. S. 1867, vol. vii. pl. viii. No. 1) has the ☧ surrounded by a circle and the legend SALVS ORIENTIS FELICITAS OCCIDENTIS. It was struck on the occasion of her marriage in 437, and she was so called because Theodosius II. had no son, and the Eastern empire seemed likely, as well as the Western, to become the inheritance of his eldest daughter's issue (De Salis, op. cit. p. 206). Some coins of his sister Justa Grata Honoria bear the legend BONO REIPVBLICAE (Cohen, No. 1).

The usual types occur on the coins of Petronius Maximus, Avitus, Majorian, Anthemius, and his wife Eufemia, but on one coin of this emperor representing Anthemius and Leo, there is between them a tablet (surmounted by a cross) on which is inscribed the word PAX (Cohen, No. 9). On the accession of Olybrius he dared to introduce the legend SALVS MVNDI, engraving on his coin a large cross, though he only enjoyed a reign of about three months and thirteen days. The coins of Glycerius, Julius Nepos and Romulus Augustus (Fig. 30), the last emperor of the Western empire, offer the usual symbols.

B. The East.—Under Arcadius, as already pointed out, the type of Victory holding a globe surmounted by a cross was introduced. Coins with the legend NOVA SPES REIPVBLICAE and the type of Victory resting on a shield were struck (Sabatier, Mon. Byz. No. 17), matching the coins of his wife Eudoxia, with the legend SALVS RIPVBLICAE, (sic) and the type of Victory inscribing on a shield the ☧ (Fig. 31; Sabatier, No. 3), a type that was already in vogue at the time of her mother-in-law Flaccilla. The question of the attribution of the coins bearing the names of Eudocia and Eudoxia was for a long time involved in great obscurity till set at rest by the late Mr. de Salis (Num. Chron. N. S. 1867, vol. vii. p. 203); and many coins bearing the name of Eudoxia with the ☧, given by Sabatier to the wife of Theodosius II., are now attributed to the wife of Arcadius.

Theodosius II. issued coins with the legend GLORIA ORVIS (sic) TERRAR. representing himself holding the labarum and a globe crucifer, and all the coins with the name EVDOCIA belong to the wife of this emperor (Fig. 32).

In 451 Marcian was proclaimed emperor owing to the influence of Pulcheria, the sister of Theodosius II., whom he married, and who was at this time about fifty years of age. A gold coin was struck by Marcian to commemorate this event, bearing the legend FELICITER SPETIIS (see Madden, Num. Chron. N.S. 1878, vol. xviii. p. 47, and "Addenda," p. 199) representing Marcian and Pulcheria, both with the nimbus, standing joining hands; in the middle, Christ, with the nimbus crucifer, standing and placing his hands on their shoulders (Fig. 33). This piece, which is one of the most interesting examples of Christian Numismatics, is preserved in the Hunter Museum, Glasgow, and I am indebted to Prof. Young, M.D., Curator of the Museum, for sending me an impression of it (cf. Eckhel, Doct. Num. Vet. vol. viii. p. 191; Sabatier, No. 2). The coins of Pulcheria bear similar types to those of the other empresses.

[m] During the reign of Honorius some brass medals were issued representing in most cases the head of Alexander, but sometimes that of Honorius, and on the reverse an ass suckling her young, accompanied by the legends D. N. IHV. (sic) XPS DEI FILIVS OF IOVIS FILIVS OF ASINA, or as on a large medallion of the contorniate class, the monogram ☧. The effigy of Alexander the Great seems to have been considered as a "protection" (Treb. Poll. "XXX TYR." 14). John Chrysostom (Homil. ii. No. 5; cf. Montfaucon, Op. Chrys. vol. ii. p. 243) reproached certain bad Christians of his time for wearing as amulets on their heads or feet medals of bronze with the head of Alexander the Macedonian (νομίσματα χαλκᾶ Ἀλεξάνδρου τοῦ Μακεδόνος ταῖς κεφαλαῖς καὶ τοῖς ποσὶ περιδεσμούντων). These medals were thought by Eckhel (Doct. Num. Vet. vol. viii. p. 173) to be symbolic representations made by the Christians, but Tanini appears to have been of opinion that they were satirical pieces fabricated by the Pagans to turn into derision the name of Christian, whilst Cavedoni (Rev. Num. 1857, p. 314), thinks that "they are the work of certain evil Christians or the Gnostics or Basilidians, who employed these medals as 'pierres astrifères' to circulate among the people their false and detestable doctrines." [See MEDALS, below.]

Some coins of Leo I. shew the ✝ in the field (Sabatier, pl. vi. No. 24), and represent him holding the mappa and long cross (No. 19), as on the coins of Valentinian III. previously alluded to, but the type of the coins of his wife Verina, as well as those of Leo II. and Zeno (with the exception of the brass coins of the latter with INVICTA ROMA and S. C. Senatûsconsulto), his wife Ariadne, of Basiliscus, his wife Zenonis, and son Marcus, and of Leontius, do not exhibit any novelty of type.

§ xxiii. Coins of the Empire of the East from the time of Anastasius (491) to the taking of Constantinople by Mahomet II. (1453).

The true Byzantine type of coinage commences under Anastasius (491–518), who instituted a monetary reform. During his reign, as well as during that of Justin I. (518–527), the types of the gold and silver coins are principally the usual Victory holding a globe, on which is a cross, or else a large cross, or a staff surmounted by the ✝, whilst the ✝, ✝ or ✳ are of frequent occurrence. The A ✝ ω or ✳ ✝ ✳ may be found on the small silver coins of Justin I. (Sabatier, Mon. Byz. pl. ix. Nos. 25, 26), a type likewise appearing on those of Justinian I. (Sab. pl. xii. Nos. 12, 15, cf. A ✝ ω on Æ coins, pl. xvii. Nos. 36–38) and Mauricius Tiberius (Sab. pl. XXIV. No. 14). The copper coinage now under Anastasius for the first time bears an index of its value, which generally occupies the whole of the field, almost always accompanied by crosses. One specimen shews the emperor Justin I. wearing the ✝ on his breast (Sab. pl. x. No. 1), or the ✝ on his head (No. 2).

In 527 Justinian was associated to the empire by his uncle Justin, and coins were struck of gold and copper bearing both their portraits. On a very rare copper piece, formerly in the collection of the late Mr. de Salis, and now in the British Museum, the word VITA appears for the first time (Fig. 34; Sab. pl. xi. No. 22), a form employed afterwards by Justin II. and Sophia (Sab. pl. xxi. Nos. 10, 12, 13), and Mauricius Tiberius (Sab. pl. xxiv. No. 20), signifying, according to the late Baron Marchant and M. de Saulcy, "Sit longa VITA," but which the Abbé Martigny (Dict. des Antiq. Chrét. p. 464) thinks may refer to the sign of the cross as the source of true life. In favour of the first interpretation M. Sabatier mentions (vol. i. p. 170) the words VINCAS or NIKA on the contorniates and the legend Ne Pereat (but probably Noster PE*rpetuus*) on the brass coins (Sab. pl. xxvii. No. 26) of Focas and Leontia (602–610), as also the letters P. A. MVL. or P. A. MVL. on the coins of Theodosius III. (716), Leo the Isaurian (716–741), and Constantine V. and Leo IV. (751–755), these being interpreted Per Annos MVLTos [vivat], but Mr. de Salis, who states that the legend MVLTVS or MVLTVS ANNIS occurs for the first time on the coins of Justinian II. without the letters PA, considered (Rev. Num. 1859, p. 441) that these letters signified PATHR or PATHR AVGVSTI, an opinion that M. Sabatier seems to have adopted in other parts of his work (vol. i. p. 74; vol. ii. p. 46). It may be mentioned that the Abbé Cavedoni preferred to read Perpetuus Augustus MVLtotics or MVLtimodis (Rev. Num. 1859, p. 399); but this interpretation is doubtful.

On the death of his uncle, Justinian I. succeeded to the throne (527–565), and about his twelfth year introduced his portrait full-faced on the copper coinage, adding the word ANNO together with a number marking the year of his reign. The ✝ (reversed) is also fixed on the breast of this emperor (Sab. pl. xii. No. 22), set as it seems on a plate surrounded by gems (Fig. 35), and the form ✳ occupies the whole of the reverse of some of the small copper coins (Sab. pl. xvii. Nos. 2 and 9).

The coins of the Ostrogoths in Italy, commencing at the overthrow of Romulus Augustus (476–553), which generally bear the portraits of Anastasius, Justin I., and Justinian I., and many of which carry on the farcical legend of INVICTA ROMA, as well as the coins of the Vandals in Africa (428–534), do not require any special allusion in connexion with the present subject.

The reign of Justin II. (565–578), with the exception of the pieces of himself and wife Sophia with the inscription VITA, to which I have already alluded, offers no new types.

Under his successor Tiberius II. Constantine (578–582) the cross is placed on four steps (Sab. pl. xxii. No. 13), or on a circle or globe (Sab. pl. xxii. Nos. 17, 18), types that become especially common under Heraclius, whilst on some of his coins he is represented holding the volumen, and a sceptre surmounted by an eagle, above which a cross (Sab. pl. xxii. No. 15; xxiii. Nos. 1, 2, and 13), a type occurring on the coins of Mauricius Tiberius (582–602), who also issued a very rare solidus (of which a woodcut is given by Sabatier, vol. i. p. 238), representing himself holding the volumen and long cross, and on the reverse Victory holding a long sceptre terminating in ✝, and a cross on a globe (see the description of a coin of Leo I. § xxii.). The coins of Focas (602–610) are of the usual type.

Heraclius (610–641), who issued coins of himself and sons Heraclius Constantine, and Heracleonas, with the title of Consul, an office that was not definitely abolished till the reign of Leo VI. (886–912), produced the legend DEVS ADIVTA ROMANIS (Fig. 36; Sab. pl. xxix. No. 23) on his silver coins, a legend which continued on the coins of his successors down to the time of Justinian II. (685). Some of his copper coins present an entirely new feature, in that the legend is completely Greek, instead of the curious mixture of Greek and Latin, and also reverts to the Constantinian legend ЄN TΘTO NIKA (Sab. pl. xxviii. No. 26), which appears in the form ЄN ЄOVЄω hICAЄ or hICAЄЄ on the coins of Basil II. and Constantine XI. (Sab. pl. xlviii. Nos. 15, 16), and ЄN TOVTω NIKATE on those of Michael VII. and Maria (Sab. pl. li. No. 11).

The late Dr. Finlay has suggested (Greece under the Romans, p. 544) that the copper coins of rude fabric with the ЄN TΘTΘ NIKA legend were probably coined by Heraclius for the use of the troops and provincials during his Persian campaigns, to which theory, with the exception of the words "rude fabric," as these coins are no ruder than the rest of the copper currency, the Hon. J. L. Warren assented, adding "that such a type would be peculiarly appropriate in a war against the crescent and the infidels, thus readopting the labarum motto, translated, however, and thereby shewing how essentially Greek the empire had become" (Num. Chron. N. S. 1861, vol. i. p. 229). The same type was copied by Constans (641–668), and an interesting account of some coins of this emperor and his sons, discovered in the island of Cyprus, has been written by Mr. Warren (op. cit. p. 42). During the short reign of Theodosius III. (716) some small silver coins were struck (Sab. pl. xxxix. No. 3) bearing the legend AMЄNITAS DЄI (the loving-kindness, i.e. the grace of God) within a wreath of myrtle.

During the reign of Constantine V. Copronymus, and his son Leo IV. (751–775), the hand "descending from heaven" occurs on the gold coinage (Sab. pl. xl. No. 22), and the form in which the hand is held is supposed to express the sacred letters IC—XC (Dict. of Christ. Antiq. I. p. 199). The hand also occurs on the coins of John I. Zimisces, Michael IV., Michael VI., Alexius I. Comnenus, John II. Comnenus, Manuel I. Comnenus, Isaac II. Angelus, John VIII. Palaeologus, and on those of the emperors of Trebizond. The legend IhSЧS XPISƧЧS NICA, with the type of a large cross on three steps, first appears on his silver coins (Sab. pl. xl. No. 25), though on a copper coin with the effigies of Leo III. (dead), Constantine V., and Leo IV. (Sab. pl. xl. No. 17), the letters X N for Xristus Nica may be found. Sometimes the

X–N

(Sab. pl. xli. no. 13). This legend was continued on the silver coins of Leo IV. (775–780), and of Constantine VI. and Irene (780–797), but Nicephorus I. Logothetes struck it on a gold coin (Sab. pl. xli. No. 14), and it is generally found on the silver till the reign of John I. Zimisces (969–976), on whose coins the face of the emperor is represented within a circle surrounded by the letters I A / Ω N (Sab. pl. xlvii. No. 19). On some of his brass coins (Sab. pl. xlviii. No. 6), as also on those of Alexius I. Comnenus (Sab. pl. lii. Nos. 18, 19), and Andronicus IV. Palaeologus (Sab. pl. lxiii. no. 1), the legend is IC / NI | XC / KA. Alexius I. was the first emperor who was really Greek, and Latin legends are after his time no longer to be found on the Byzantine coinage. It was on the coins of Michael I. Rhangabe (811–813), with the legend IhSЧS XPISƧЧS NICA (Sab. pl. xlii. No. 3), that the words ЬASILIS ROMAIOh were first introduced, "a sad acknowledgment of a rival Romanorum Imperator" (Sat. Review, June 1, 1861); and Theophilus (829–842) on some coins of the same legend and type (Sab. pl. xliii. No. 10), calls himself ΘЄOFILOS ƎЧLOS XPISƧЧS PISTOS Єh AVƧO ЬASILЄЧ ROMAIOh, whilst on some of the same type he inscribes CVRIЄ ЬOHΘH TO SO ƎOVLO✻Є Κύριε βοήθει τῷ σῷ δούλῳ (Lord protect thy servant).

The principal Christian types on the Byzantine coinage may be classified in the following manner:—

A. Christ.—During the reign of Justinian II. (685–695), who had been deposed on account of his cruelties in 695 and banished to the Chersonese by Leontius with his nose cut off, and hence his name of Rhinotmetus (Ῥινότμητος), but who was restored to the throne together with his son Tiberius in 705, many innovations were introduced, the most notable of which is the bust of Christ holding the gospels and giving the benediction, with the legend dN. IhS. ChS. REX REGNAN-TIЧm, and on the reverse the emperor holding a long cross with the title of SЄRЧ. ChRISƧI adopted by himself. On some of the coins the emperor holds a globe (on which is the word PAX), surmounted by a cross (Fig. 37; Sab. pl. xxxvii. No. 2). The former legend is generally found on the gold coins, but it sometimes occurs on the silver and copper, and it is always accompanied by the type of Christ represented in the four following ways:—

(1) Bust of Christ facing on a cross on the coins (Fig. 37) of Justinian II. Rhinotmetus (685–695) and on his coins, with his son Tiberius IV. after his restoration (705–711). From the reign of Leo III. the Isaurian (716–741), the first of the Iconoclasts, to that of Irene (797–802), all images of Christ, the Virgin, and Saints were abolished, though the legend IhSЧS XPISƧЧC NIKA without any image, as I have above shewn, was introduced during the reign of Constantine V. and his son Leo (751–775). The bust of Christ facing on a cross was again produced (Sab. pl. xlii. No. 1) on the coins of Michael I. Rhangabe (811–813), and after another interval of about 30 years, on those of (Sab. pl. xliv. No. 7) Michael III. and his mother Theodora (842–856), and on those of Michael III. (Sab. pl. xliv. No. 12) when reigning alone (856–866), but with the legend IhSЧS XPISƧOC✻. On a brass coin of Michael VII. Ducas (1071–1078; Sab. pl. li. No. 8) the bust of Christ on the cross occurs between two stars but without any legend.

(2) Bust of Christ facing on a cross with nimbus, from the reign of Constantine X. and Romanus II. (948–959) to that of Isaac I. Comnenus (1057–1059). The nimbus is generally adorned with gems. [Sab. pl. xlvi. No. 18; xlvii. Nos. 10–12, 17; xlviii. Nos. 10, 19, 20; xlix. Nos. 3, 5; l. No. 1.]

(3) Christ with nimbus cruciger seated facing, sometimes holding the right hand raised, from the reign of Basil I. and Constantine IX. (869–870) to that of Manuel I. Comnenus (1143–1180). [Sab. pl. xliv. No. 22; xlvi. Nos. 1, 3, 4, 6, 12; xlix. Nos. 2, 4, 16, 17; l. Nos. 2, 6, 10; lvi. No. 3.] It was on the coins of this type (Sab. pl. xlix. No. 17) that Isaac I. Comnenus changed the type of the gold coinage of the empire, and impressed on it his own figure with a drawn sword in his right hand, thereby, as the Byzantine writers pretend, ascribing his elevation to the throne, not to the grace of God, but to his own courage (Finlay, Hist. of Byz. and Greek Empires, vol. ii. p. 12).

(4) Christ with nimbus cruciger standing facing on the coins (Sab. pl. xlix. No. 13) of Theodora (1055–1056). See Types of Virgin (j).

On a gold coin of Romanus I. Constantine X. and Christophorus (920–944), Christ is represented with a cross at the back of his head, standing crowning the emperor Romanus I. (Sab. pl. xlvi. No. 10).

The type of Christ also occurs in the following various types, accompanied by the letters IC—XC (Ἰησοῦς Χριστός):—

(5) Bust of Christ facing on a cross with nimbus.—The letters IC—XC and this type first appear on the brass coins of John I. Zimisces (969–976), but with the addition in some cases of the word EMMANOVHA, and on the reverse + IhSUS XPISTUS bASILEU bASILE (Fig. 38; Sab. pl. xlviii. Nos. 3, 5, 6, 7, 8), and the attribution of these anonymous coins to John I. Zimisces is founded on a passage of Scylitzes and of Cedrenus, where it is said that "this emperor ordered to be placed upon the coins the image of the Saviour, which had not been done before, and on the other side Latin letters forming the sentence, IESVS CHRISTVS REX REGUM" (Sab. vol. ii. p. 143), but this statement can only refer to these copper coins, as the bust of Christ occurs (as I have shewn (1)) on the coins of other metals of earlier dates. The same letters are sometimes connected with the word NIKA (see above) $\frac{IC}{NI}\left|\frac{XC}{KA}\right.$ (Sab. pl. xlviii. No. 6; lii. Nos. 18, 19; lviii. No. 18; lxiii. No. 1), a form of legend also occurring on the copper coins of Romanus IV. Diogenes (1067–1070), but here representing the bust of Christ without the cross or nimbus, and with three globules on either side of His head (Sab. pl. li. No. 3).

The type continues from the time of Theodora (1055–1056) to that of John VIII. Palaeologus (1423–1448). On some of his coins (Sab. pl. lxiii. Nos. 19, 20), as well as on those of his predecessor Manuel II. (Sab. pl. lxiii. Nos. 7, 9, 10), the bust of Christ is surrounded by stars or crosses with the legend ΘV.XAPITI BACIAEC TW PWMEWN "By the grace of God, King of the Romans,"—equivalent to the Dei gratiâ on our own coinage. It is sometimes accompanied by the legend KEROHOEI for Κύριε BOHOEI, as on the coins of Alexius I. Comnenus (Sab. pl. liii. No. 10), and Manuel I. Comnenus (Sab. pl. lv. Nos. 5 and 10; lvi. No. 5).

(6) Christ with nimbus cruciger seated facing, on a brass coin of John I. Zimisces (969–976; Sab. pl. xlviii. No. 4) having on the reverse IS XS bASILE bASILI, and on a very rare brass coin of Constantine XIII. Ducas and Eudocia (1059–1067; Sab. pl. l. No. 9), and from the time of Michael VII. Ducas (1071–1078) to that of Andronicus IV. Palaeologus (1371–1373). [See under C. SAINTS and Fig. 41.]

The words KE. ROHOEI are sometimes added on the coins of Alexius I. and John II., whilst on some of Andronicus II. Palaeologus and Andronicus III. (1325–1328) the legend is in full KVPIE BOHOEI (Sab. pl. lxi. Nos. 14, 15).

On some of the coins of Michael VIII. (1261–1282; Sab. lix. Nos. 3–6), Christ with nimbus cruciger or nimbus is seated blessing the kneeling emperor, who is generally accompanied by the Archangel Michael.

(7) Christ with nimbus standing facing, sometimes crowning or blessing the emperor or emperors, on coins from the time of Michael VII. (1071–1078) to that of Andronicus II. and III. (1325–1328). [Sab. pl. li. Nos. 5, 18; lii. Nos. 16, 17 [with KE. ROHOEI], 20; liii. No. 18; lv. No. 2; lvii. Nos. 4, 5, 11; lx. Nos. 1–5, 13, 14; lxi. Nos. 7–9, 13.]

The letters IC—XC occur on some coins of Alexius I. (Sab. pl. lii. No. 22) and Manuel I. (pl. lvi. No. 8), having for type a six-rayed cross on three steps.

B. THE VIRGIN.—The Virgin Mary is represented on the Byzantine coinage in various postures, generally accompanied by the letters MR—ΘV (Μήτηρ Θεοῦ);—

(a) Bust of Virgin veiled facing and hands raised, on coins of Leo VI. (886–912). In this instance we have the name MARIA in full as well as the letters MR—ΘU (Fig. 39; Sab. pl. xlv. No. 11).

(b) Bust of Virgin with nimbus facing and hands raised, first occurs (Sab. pl. xlvii. No. 9) on the brass coins of Theophano (963) and on those (Sab. pl. xlviii. No. 9) of John I. Zimisces (969–976), and may also be found on the coins of many emperors down to the time of (Sab. pl. lxi. No. 5) Andronicus II. and Michael IX. (1294–1320).

On a coin of Constantine XII. Monomachus (1042–1055; Sab. pl. xlix., No. 12) the Virgin of Blachernae [M. RAAKE6NITICA sic] is represented. Blachernae was a suburb of Constantinople, which was taken into the city under Heraclius, and the empress Pulcheria is said to have erected a temple to the Virgin called Ædes Blachernianæ, which Justin I. restored. On account of the many miracles said to have been performed here, the temple and image were held in high esteem (Chron. Alex. ad ann. Heracl. xv. and xvii.; Ducange, Const. Christ. lib. i. c. xi.; Madden, Num. Chron. N. S. vol. xviii. p. 207; pl. vii. No. 10).

(c) Bust of Virgin with nimbus facing, holding a medallion of Christ on her chest, from the time of (Sab. pl. xlvii No. 18) John I. Zimisces (969–976) to that of (Sab. pl. li. Nos. 7, 9) Michael VII. Ducas (1071–1078), and sometimes accompanied by the legend ΘKE BOHOEI (Θεοτόκε βοήθει, mother of God, help). In some cases the medallion rests on her chest whilst the hands are raised as on the coins of (Sab. pl. li. No. 17) Nicephorus III. (1078–1081), of (Sab. pl. lii. Nos. 9–11, 21) Alexius I. Comnenus (1081–1118), and of (Sab. pl. liv. No. 14) John II. Comnenus (1118–1143). On the coin of John Zimisces there is the legend MHROU–DEDOXASM — OEISSEEL — ΠIZWhOU — CAΠOƧ'K' which appears to be Μῆτερ Θεοῦ δεδοξασμένη ὁ εἰς σε ἐλπίζων οὐκ ἀποτεύξεται Κυρίου, O glorified mother of God, he that trusteth in thee shall not fail of the Lord. (Madden, Num. Chron. N. S. vol. xviii. p. 209; pl. vii. No. 11.)

(d) Bust of Virgin with nimbus within walls, on the coins of (Sab. pl. lix. No. 3) Michael VIII.

Palaeologus (1261–1282), of (Sab. pl. lx. Nos. 1–4) Andronicus II. Palaeologus (1282–1328), and of (Sab. pl. lx. Nos. 13, 14) Andronicus II. and his son Michael IX. (1294–1320).

The walls are those of Constantinople, and the type commemorates the restoration of the Greek emperors at Constantinople after it had been under the sway of the Latins for nearly fifty-eight years. Pachymer of Nicaea, who flourished during the reign of Michael VIII., records that "Michael, after the taking of Constantinople, changed the type of the old coins, engraving instead a representation of the city," but at the same time he debased the standard of the mint, and issued coins containing only 15 parts of gold and 9 of alloy (Pachymer, ii. 343; Finlay, Hist. of Byz. and Greek Empires, vol. ii. p. 436). The obverse type on his coins represents the emperor, presented by the archangel Michael, kneeling to Christ seated, or the emperor in prostration before Christ standing, or the two emperors blessed by Christ. [Types of Christ, (6), (7).]

(e) Virgin with nimbus seated facing, on coins of John II. Comnenus (1118–1143) but with the hands outspread (Sab. pl. liv. No. 13), of (Sab. pl. lv. No. 6; lvi. No. 4) Manuel I. Comnenus (1143–1180), and of (Sab. pl. lix. No. 5) Michael VIII. Palaeologus (1261–1282). (Sab. pl. lxiv.–lxvi.)

(f) Virgin with nimbus seated, holding medallion of Christ, from the time of Michael VII. Ducas (1071–1078) to that of Andronicus II. and Michael IX. (1294–1320). [Sab. pl. li. No. 5; lii. No. 1; liii. No. 18; liv. No. 1; lv. No. 11; lvi. No. 14; lvii. No. 15; lx. No. 16.]

(g) Virgin with nimbus standing, hands raised and medallion of Christ on her chest, on the coins of (Sab. pl. lii. Nos. 8, 12) Alexius I. Comnenus (1081–1118), of (Sab. pl. lvii. No. 4) Andronicus I. Comnenus (1182–1185), all with ΚΕ. ΡΟΗΘΕΙ, and of (Sab. pl. lvii. No. 20; lviii. No. 5) Isaac II. Angelus (1185–1195). On some of the coins of Andronicus II. the Virgin holds the medallion with both hands (Sab. pl. lvii. Nos. 5, 11).

(h) Virgin with nimbus standing on a cushion holding the infant Christ, with nimbus cruciger, in her arms, on the gold and silver coins of (Sab. pl. l. Nos. 14, 15) Romanus IV. Diogenes (1067–1070). On these coins the legend ΠΑΡΘΕΝΕ ΟΟΙ ΠΟΛΥΑΙΝΕ ΟΟ ΗΛΠΙΚΕ ΠΑΝΤΑ ΚΑΤ-ΟΡΘΟΙ (O glorious Virgin, he that trusteth in thee prospers in all things) forms an hexameter line. (Fig. 40.)

(i) Virgin with nimbus standing facing and hands raised or arms folded from the time of (Sab. pl. xlix. No. 11) Constantine XII. Monomachus (1042–1055) to that of Alexius I. Comnenus (1081–1118). [Sab. pl. l. No. 7; li. No. 6; lii. No. 7.] On the coin of Constantine XII. there is the legend ΔΕCΠΟΙΝΑ CωZΟΙC ΕVCΕΒΗ ΜΟΝΟΜΑΚΩΝ (Lady mayest thou preserve the pious Monomachus). On some specimens the words ΘΚΕ. ΡΟΗΘΕΙ occur.

On other coins the Virgin is represented side-faced as on those (Sab. pl. lvi. Nos. 12, 13) of Manuel I. Comnenus (1143–1180).

(j) Virgin with nimbus standing crowning emperor, sometimes half-length, on coins of (Sab. pl. xlvii. No. 17) John I. Zimisces (969–976), on which, in addition to the letters ΜΘ above her head, there is added the legend ΘΕΟΤΟC. ϧΟΗΘ. ΙѠ ƉΕSΡ (mother of God help the Lord John) [A. CHRIST, No. 2], and from the time of Romanus III. Argyrus (1028–1034; Sab. pl. xlix. No. 2) to that of (Sab. pl. lv. Nos. 7, 12; lvi. Nos. 2, 3) Manuel I. Comnenus (1143–1180).

On gold coins of (Sab. pl. xlvii. No. 12) Nicephorus II. Focas (963–969), and of (Sab. pl. lxvii. No. 1) John Angelus Comnenus, emperor of Thessalonica (1232–1234), the Virgin is represented half-length presenting a long cross to the emperor; on some of Michael VIII. Palaeologus (1261–1282; Sab. pl. lix. Nos. 10, 11) she is represented half-length holding the labarum on which ✝; and on a brass coin of (Sab. pl. lxii. No. 17) John V. Palaeologus (1341–1391), the Virgin and Emperor are shaking hands. On another (Sab. pl. xlix. No. 13) of Theodora (1055–1056), to which I have already alluded [A. CHRIST, No. 4], she is standing full-length with Theodora, both holding the labarum.

C. SAINTS.—The figure of a saint (generally standing) was first introduced by Michael VI. (1056–1057). The following are the saints and angels represented—St. Alexander, on a gold coin of Alexander (912–913; Sab. pl. xlvi. No. 3); St. Michael, on coins of Michael VI. (Sab. pl. xlix. No. 16) and of Isaac II. Angelus (Sab. pl. lvii. Nos. 15, 16, 17) and other emperors; St. Constantine, on coins of Alexius I. Comnenus (Sab. pl. lii. Nos. 16, 17); St. George, on coins of John II. Comnenus (Fig. 41; Sab. pl. liii. No. 15, [A. CHRIST, No. 6]), and other emperors; St. Theodore, on coins of Manuel I. Comnenus (Sab. pl. lv. No. 2), &c.; St. Demetrius, on coins of Manuel I. Comnenus (Sab. pl. lv. No. 9), &c.; St. Andronicus, on coins of Andronicus II. and III. (Sab. pl. lxi. No. 17); St. Eugenius, on the coins of the emperors of Trebizond (Sab. pl. lxvii.–lxx.; some on horseback); St. John, on the coins of John I. Axouchos, emperor of Trebizond (Sab. pl. lxvii. No. 9, bust facing; No. 10 standing); and some unknown.

The winged head or body of a seraph occurs on the brass coins of Andronicus I. Comnenus (Sab. pl. lvii. Nos. 9, 10), of Andronicus II. and Michael IX. (Sab. pl. lx. No. 19; lxi. No. 11), and John III. Ducas emperor of Nicaea (Sab. pl. lxiv. No. 15) very similar in form to the seraphim engraved in the article ANGELS AND ARCHANGELS (§ 14).

On some coins of Romanus I. and II., Constantine X., Nicephorus Focas, John Zimisces, Basil II., Manuel I. Comnenus, and Alexius III., the initial letters of the names of these emperors are so placed as to form a cross (Sab. pl. i. Nos. 54–60, 63, 68, 69), in some cases, as on the coins of Romanus I. and II., taking the form of an anchor, whilst on those of Romanus IV., Alexius I. Comnenus, and Baudouin (Nos. 65, 67, 71), the initials are figured around a Maltese cross.

There are yet one or two curious pieces to which I must allude. During the reign of John I. Zimisces (969–976) some brass coins or tokens were issued (1) having on the obverse the bust of Christ with nimbus and the letters IC–XC, and on the reverse the legends ΘѠΔΑΝ – ЄIZЄITOV – CΠЄNHTAC – OTPЄΦѠN, and (2) on the obverse ΔA–NЄIZЄI–ΘЄѠ, and on the reverse OЄΛЄ–ѠNΠTѠ–XON, which may be interpreted Θεῷ δανείζει τοὺς πένητας ὁ τρέφων and Δανείζει Θεῷ ὁ ἐλέων πτωχόν (He that hath pity on the poor lendeth unto the Lord). Both are translations of the same Hebrew verse (Prov. xix. 17), and the latter is the exact translation of the LXX. These pieces have been published by Dr. Friedlaender (Num. Zeitschrift, vol. ii. Vienna, 1870); the first is in the collection of Prince Philip of Saxe-Coburg, the second in the museum of Basle. Dr. Freidlaender remarks that "it is curious that the coins of smallest value are always those which remind the possessor to give them to the poor."

Another brass coin or medal with the legend ANACTACIC has also been attributed to this reign, but the piece is not above suspicion. (Madden, Num. Chron. N. S. 1878, vol. xviii. p. 191.) [See MEDALS below.]

To the time of John II. Comnenus (1118–1143), according to the late Baron Marchant (Mél. de Num.), or to that of John V. Palaeologus (1341–1391), according to the late Mr. de Salis, and with greater probability, a most remarkable piece is attributed, of which the following is a description:—

Obv. The emperor with nimbus standing facing, holding cross and labarum (surmounted by cross) on which X.

Rev. The Magi worshipping and making offerings to the Virgin Mary, who holds a child in her lap. The Virgin wears the nimbus and is seated, raising her right hand. Between the Magi and the Virgin the letters $\frac{\text{EVAO}}{\text{E}}$ Æ. (Fig. 42.)

This piece, which is in the British Museum, is considered by Mr. Grueber to be undoubtedly genuine. The shape of the labarum is uncertain, but appears to be . The inscription is perhaps ΕΥΛΟΓΕΙΤΕ, or rather ΕΥΛΟΓΗΜΕΝΗ, which is not improbable, as the Virgin Mary was hailed by her cousin Elizabeth as "Blessed among women, and blessed the fruit of her womb" (εὐλογημένη σὺ ἐν γυναιξὶ, καὶ εὐλογημένος ὁ καρπὸς τῆς κοιλίας σου, Luke i. 42).

Another specimen of very similar reverse type, but having on the obverse the bust of Christ facing with nimbus and the legend EMMANVHL (sic) was formerly in the Pembroke Collection, and passing into the cabinet of the late Mr. Wigan, is now in the collection of the Rev. S. S. Lewis, who has published and engraved it in the new illustrated edition of Dr. Farrar's Life of Christ (p. 21, ed. Cassell, Petter, and Galpin). Mr Lewis kindly sent me the piece to see, and I must confess that I am not altogether favourably impressed with its appearance. I may observe that Mr. Burgon the author of the Pembroke Sale Catalogue (p. 324) classed it among "early fabrications in copper bearing imaginary types," and stated that "the composition can hardly be regarded as genuine, but as the metal and surface are antique, it must (if false) have been produced by means of a punch and an engraving tool, principally by the former. The workers in Nello in Italy in the 15th century used their tools in a manner which is almost inconceivable." If, however, there is no doubt about the authenticity of the piece in the British Museum, we can hardly reject this one as spurious only on account of its composition. The two birds (doves?) in the exergue of the reverse, Mr. Lewis (op. cit.) suggests may "delicately symbolise the purification." [See MEDALS, below.]

It may be, as Martigny has suggested (Dict. des Antiq. Chrét. p. 383), that medals or medallions of this description were frequently struck for suspending round the neck, as was done with some of the verres dorés with the same subject (Garrucci, Vetri, iv. No. 9).

The representation of the adoration of the Magi on both these pieces, especially on the latter, is somewhat similar to that on a fresco of the cemetery of Callistus engraved by Martigny (op. cit. l. c.), or to that on a fresco in the cemetery of St. Marcellinus, engraved by the Rev. W. H. Withrow (Catacombs of Rome, p. 306. 1877.) (Compare p. 1299.)

In conclusion I must record my thanks to Mr. H. A. Grueber, assistant in the Department of Coins and Medals, British Museum, for the trouble that he has had in superintending the casting of most of the coins here engraved, and for the readiness with which he has answered my numerous queries.

[F. W. M.]

Passing from the Eastern Empire to Western Europe, we find that, from the reign of Honorius downwards, the gradual loss of territory to the Roman empire is marked by the introduction of new coinages issued by the barbarian invaders in place of that which proceeded from the imperial mints. In most cases, however, these new issues begin as mere imitations of the Western or Eastern imperial coins, and it is not till long subsequent to their acquisition of a country that the barbarian nations institute distinctly recognisable series of coins. The fact is, that the imperial coinage had been so long the coinage of the Roman world that it was only gradually that the Teutonic invaders conceived the possibility of substituting a separate coinage of their own. The length of time which often elapsed between the settling of these invaders in Roman territory and their first issue of a coinage on which the name of the emperor is replaced by that of a barbarian king, is exemplified in the case of the Visigoths, who under Astaulf in 410 established a kingdom in Aquitania, but who did not begin a national coinage until the reign of Leovigild (573), the first king of all Spain. Indeed Procopius complains of the audacity of the Frankish king (Theodebert), who for the first time ventured to strike gold coins "bearing his own portrait, not that of the emperor as was [heretofore] the [universal] custom;" and adds with slight exaggeration: "the king of the Persians, indeed, used to strike silver money of his own; but it was not lawful either for him or for any other barbarian king to make his gold coins with a portrait of the ruler." (Bell. Goth. iii. 33.) This was about the year 544.

It is obvious that this long period of imitation must have had a great effect upon the symbols of all kinds which appear upon coinages of the West, and accordingly we find that the Christian symbols upon these coins are generally taken directly from the money of Constantinople. We may divide the barbarian coinages of Western Europe from the accession of Honorius to that of Charlemagne into six distinct classes, struck respectively by:

(1) The Vandals in Africa from Huneric to the defeat of Gelimir at Trikameron, that is from 477 to 533.

(2) The Visigoths in Spain from Leovigild to the defeat of Roderic at the battle of Guadelata, from 573 to 711.

(3) The Ostrogoths in Italy from Theodoric, 493 to the battle of Mons Lactanus, 553. These were followed by:

(4) The Lombards, who include not only the Lombard kings at Pavia, but likewise the dukes of Benevento and Spoleto, who struck coins. The coinage of Pavia and Lucca lasted from the time of Aripert, 653, down to the conquest of the kingdom of Italy by Charles in 774; the coinage of Benevento continued till the death of Radechis in 955.

(5) The Merovingians, who began to strike coins about 544, under Theodebert, king of Austrasia, and continued their issue until a new coinage was introduced by the Karling dynasty.

(6) The English, who may have brought a coinage with them into this country, but who cannot with certainty be credited with a national issue until the time of Peada, a king of Mercia, about 655.

On the first and third of these six classes, the coins of the Vandals and the Ostrogoths, Christian symbols are curiously conspicuous by their absence. On the Vandal money none appears save upon some copper coins of doubtful attribution; on the money of the Ostrogoths the only exception is found in the large cross which appears upon the embroidered robe on the bust of Theodahat as displayed upon his copper coins, and in the crosses upon some nameless copper coins struck at Rome during the time of Ostrogothic rule, but not necessarily by the authority of the barbarians themselves.

Yet if we were inclined to attribute this want of Christian symbols to the Arian proclivities of the Vandals and the Ostrogoths, we should find that our conclusions were defeated by the money of Leovigild, the last Arian king of Spain. He seems to have adopted three types for his money, which, with little change, run through the whole series of the coinage of this dynasty. The first presents on the obverse the rude representation of a head or bust; on the reverse a cross haussée, or raised upon three steps, a type which was first introduced by Tiberius II. (574–582), and was probably adopted by Leovigild about the period of the second date. The engraved coin, which is one of Chintila, struck at Narbonne, will give an adequate idea of this type, for it is the peculiarity of this series that the style and fabric of its coins varies scarcely at all during the whole period of nearly a century and a half during which they continued to be struck. The obverse reads + CHINTILA REX; the reverse, NARBONA PIV[s]: the name of city of minting, Narbonne (Fig. 43).

This type of the cross haussée is the only one which can be distinctly recognised as Christian. But it is curious that the cross is not adopted upon the coins of Leovigild's catholic son San Hermengild. He adopts Leovigild's second type, which is also an imitative one, copied from the Victoria Augusta coins of Rome and Constantinople. The reverse represents a winged figure (Victory) walking to the right, and holding in her right hand a wreath. Around the usual Roman legend VICTORIA AVG is replaced by the name of the king, or an attempt at the legend INCLYTVS REX. (See Heiss, Mon. des Rois Wisigoths d'Espagne, pl. i. Nos. 1–3, and pl. ii. Nos. 1–3.) Now, though this coin is undoubtedly, as far as the origin of its type goes, of a pagan character, it is equally certain that it is impossible in the history of Christian iconography to separate accurately the Angel from the Victory or Nikê of the Romans and Greeks; and there can be little doubt that the figure upon the Visigothic coins would have passed in these days and in popular estimation for an angel. The third characteristic type of the Visigothic coinage represents simply a rude bust on either side, and is devoid of any attempt at symbolism. In addition to the Christian types, we have on one coin of Leovigild the letters A ω, and on one of St. Hermengild the legend Regi a Deo Vita, an almost unique instance of pious instruction upon a Visigothic coin.

The Lombards may lay claim to more originality than the Visigoths, in that, upon their pieces, a most undoubted angel is portrayed, with a legend shewing that he is intended to represent the Archangel Michael. The engraving

The later Lombardic coins abandon the type of St. Michael and adopt for their reverses either a flower pattern, or else the cross potent, having one limb longer than the other three. Those of the dukes of Benevento, who form a lesser branch of the Lombards in Italy, imitate more closely the contemporary coinage of Constantinople, generally displaying on the obverse the bust of the duke facing, and on the reverse the long cross potent and haussée upon three steps, known under this form as the Byzantine cross. (See Fig. 53.) The coins likewise bear not infrequently the legend SAN MICHALIS, although only in one instance do they display the image of the archangel.

We now turn to the coinage of the Franks, which, as has been said, begins with Theodebert, the second king of Austrasia, the son of Thierry, and grandson of Clovis. Dating from an earlier period than the last two series, the imitative character of the Frankish money is much more apparent than that of the Visigothic or Lombardic coinages. All the types of Theodebert are borrowed directly from Constantinople with no change but the substitution of the Merovingian's name upon the obverse. The most common, as also the most Christian, type is that given in the engraving (Fig. 45), and is taken from the contemporary coinage of Justinian. It affords a good example of a Victory which has just passed through the transitional stage and become an angel, while the legend on the reverse VICTORIA AVGGGA still remains to betray its origin. The attitude of the figure upon these coins, or on those of Justinian, may be compared with that of an angel which is carved in ivory upon a beautiful consular diptych of this epoch, now in the British Museum.

As time went on a change takes place in the Merovingian money, which is not paralleled in that of any other country of Europe. Not only does it depart more and more from the imperial type, but a coinage bearing the name of no king, only that of the moneyer who struck it, and of the town where it was minted, is introduced alongside the regal issue. It seems probable that the Frankish kings never asserted the right of exclusive coinage; but, on the contrary, that it was within the faculty of almost any local goldsmith to strike these coins for particular or local purposes. There is no reason to believe, as has been thought by some, that this non-regal money was issued by the authority of a religious see or order. Most of the later Merovingian coins, whether royal or not, are of the kind known as trientes or tremisses, one-third, that is, of the solidus aureus. Their type generally displays a head upon the obverse, and on the reverse a cross of some sort. Two coins of the royal issue with rather peculiar symbols are engraved beneath, Figs. 46 and 47. The first which was struck by Charibert II. (630–631) reads:

Rev. CHARIBERTVS RE. Figure, probably a chalice surmounted by a cross (Conbrouse, Monnaies Nationales de France, pl. 22). The second is a coin of Clovis or Chlodvig II. (638–656).

Obv. CLOTHOVICHVS R. Helmeted bust to right.

Rev. MONETA PALAT I. Cross haussée, and terminating in open chrism. On either side of cross ELI GI (Conbrouse, Mon. Nat. de France, pl. 18). The Eligius, whose name appears upon this rare and interesting piece, is St. Eloi, the treasurer of Dagobert I. and Clovis II., who before his elevation to this post had been a goldsmith and moneyer under Clotaire II. (See Life of St. Eloi, by St. Ouen in D'Achéry's Spicilegium, vol. ii. p. 76.)

A great variety is observable in the symbols displayed upon the Merovingian coins, though they are nearly always of a religious character. The most common device is a short square even-limbed cross, which rests sometimes upon a step or ball. The Christian monogram appears, but is not common. The two unusual and interesting types given here (Figs. 48 and 49) represent a Calvary, on either side of which a man is standing, and a monstrance raised upon three steps. They are taken respectively from a silver coin of Le Mans and a gold triens of Angers (Conbrouse, o. c. Types Mérov. pl. iv. Nos. 16 and 24).

Of the coinages whereof we have been speaking, the Vandalic and Ostrogothic belong to the period which preceded the introduction of the genuine barbaric gold coinage into Europe, and are—with the exception of a few coins which display the monogram of Theodoric—coinages in silver and copper only. The money of the Visigoths, the Lombards, and the Franks, which are more distinctly national and barbarian issues, are almost as exclusively coinages in gold; for when the invaders obtained full possession of a Roman province they seem nearly to have discarded the use of silver coins. In our own country, on the other hand, and probably also in the region of the Lower Rhine, a silver coinage was almost the only currency, and if some of the gold tremisses—or, as they were called here, thryms—found their way across the Channel, their appearance must be regarded as quite exceptional. This fact forms a marked contrast between the coinage of England and that of the greater part of continental Europe. The silver coins which were in use in England before the rise of the Karling dynasty were the sceattas, small and thick pieces, weighing some nineteen or twenty grains: in the north however, that is, in the countries of Bernicia and Deira, a copper coin, the stycа, supplied the place of the sceatt. Some few of the sceattas bear the names of known sovereigns, and in that case their date is of course determinable. The earliest piece of this description bears in runic letters the name of Paeda, a son of Penda, king of Mercia, who reigned about 655. The greater part of these early coins however are without intelligible legend. They bear a few letters of the Roman character, which seem to have been nothing but rude and ignorant copies of the legend upon some imperial coin. Their types are so numerous that a detailed description of them is impossible; but the reader may consult the plates in Ruding's Annals of the Coinage, and in Hawkins's English Silver Coins, 2nd ed. A great majority of these sceattas have one or more crosses upon the field, and this fact has led numismatists to infer that those pieces upon which no such symbol occurs were struck before the conversion of the English to Christianity. M. Dirks (Revue de la Num. Belge, 5th series, vol. ii.), who has devoted special attention to this class of coins, has gone further than this, and signalised some types as bearing a distinctly heathen character, the head of Wodin, the Fenriswulf, the sea monster Jormundgandr, &c. On this point it is difficult to pronounce with certainty. It is extremely probable that most of the sceattas were copies, more or less remote, of Roman coins; Mr. Hawkins in his Cuerdale Find has given an instance of an undoubted copy separated by a distance of nearly five hundred years from its original; therefore neither the presence nor absence of Christian symbols upon these nameless pieces can be taken as conclusive evidence of the time at which they were first issued.

The earliest known coin among the stycas merits particular notice. It was struck by Ecgfrith, king of Northumbria (670–685), and bears upon the reverse a radiate cross, with the legend + LVX or, as we may perhaps read it, LVX X (Lux Christus, Christ is [my] light). (See Silver Coins of England, 2nd ed. No. 99, and Ruding, Annals, vol. iii. pl. 28 ap.) This king, who is called "rex religiosus" by the biographer of St. Wilfred, appears to have been in his earlier days a great friend of religion and of the archbishop of York. The types of the subsequent Northumbrian stycas is a small cross on one or both sides enclosed by the legend, without further ornamentation or symbolism.

Towards the end of the 8th century, and after the rise of the Karling dynasty upon the continent, pennies superseded the sceattas in the central and southern districts of England, while stycas and some sceattas continued to be coined in the north. The penny usually displays a cross upon the reverse, and this cross is treated in curious ornamental devices; but the coin is without any other religious symbolism. Types of the early English penny may be found in the works of Hawkins and Ruding.

Beside the royal money, coins were struck by the archbishops of York and Canterbury, by the former stycas, by the latter pennies. The earliest of these episcopal coins seems to have been struck by Ecgberht, archbishop of York, from 730 to 766, conjointly with his brother Eadberht, king of Northumbria. One side reads ECGBERHT[AR?]. Figure standing between two long processional crosses. The figure seems to wear a sort of three-cornered hat, which may very probably be intended for a mitre. The other side reads EOTHERHTVS, and represents a figure standing (Hawkins (102), p. 67, and Ruding, iii. 3; the engraving in the latter, however, is very faulty).

The other archbishops of York of whom we have coins are, Eanbald, 780 to 796; Vigmund, 831 to 854; and Ulfhere, 854 to 895. These coins, which are stycas, follow in type those of the contemporary Northumbrian kings, as described just now.

The archbishops of Canterbury, whose pennies resemble in type those of the kings of Kent, and subsequently those of the kings of England, are Jaenberht, 763 to 790; Ethilheard, 790 to 803; Wulfheard, 803 to 830; Ceolnoth, 830 to 870; Ethered, 871 to 890; Plegmund, 891 to 923.

We have said that when the Karling dynasty came into power it introduced a new coinage of silver to supersede the old Merovingian gold money; and the latter began from that time rapidly to disappear. Pepin the Short struck denarii or pennies of a new pattern and fabric, bearing no resemblance either to the current gold coinage or to the older denarii of Rome. In 781, we find a decree of Charles the Great ordering that the new denarii shall be current throughout the Frankish kingdom; and from this time it would appear that the coining of gold almost ceases in western Europe. The types of this money of Pepin and Charles are as rude as they are original. All attempt at a face or bust is for the most part abandoned; sometimes nothing but an inscription is given on either side, but generally the name of the king is displayed in a monogram disposed round the four limbs of a cross, somewhat like the monogram of the word Roma in the figure 51. Generally, too, a cross occupies the centre of the reverse, a cross of a somewhat new shape. It is the cross pattée which from this time becomes almost universal upon European coins, a small even-limbed cross slightly broadening towards its extremities. "We must observe the position of the cross. It has its limbs of equal length, and they are slightly pate at the ends; the cross is alaisée and detached, its limbs not touching the circle which surrounds the field and separates the legend. A cross of this description only appears quite accidentally upon the Roman money of the preceding centuries: it appears occasionally on the Merovingian coins; it became common, and at length indispensable on those of the Carlovingians, and no other sort was used" (Lelewel, Num. du Moyen Age, tom. i. p. 87: see Fig. 13). After his conquest of Italy, and for the use of that country, Charles seems to have struck coins bearing his bust, represented like that of the Roman emperors. He also introduced a very important type, which became common upon the coins of many succeeding emperors. It represents, probably, the front of the basilica of St. Peter with the legend XRISTIANA RELIGIO (Fig. 50). Fig. 51 a coin engraved by Combrouse, which is supposed to have been struck either to commemorate the restitution of Adrian I. to his rights and the assumption by Charles of the titles king of Italy and patrician of Rome, or else to commemorate Charles's crowning as emperor on the famous Christmas of 800, is of doubtful authenticity. Both these coins are silver denarii (Combrouse, pl. 162). Fig. 52 also represents a type which is peculiar to Charlemagne (Lelewel, t. 88). The double triangle is of course a Christian type, the triangle being a symbol of the Trinity. But it is also, as Solomon's seal, a type frequently in use among the Arabs, and is to be met with upon coins of the 'Abbásee dynasty as early as 783 (Tiesenhausen, Mon. des Khalifes Or. p. 108, No. 997).

In the time of Charlemagne we have also to notice the beginning of a papal coinage. The rare coins of Adrian I. were probably struck subsequently to the overthrow of the Lombardic kingdom in 774. They are denarii, and represent the bust of the pope, facing, in a style copied from the coinage of Constantinople (Fig. 53). The legend is HADRI ANVS P^{s} P^{s}; on either side of head, I B.

Rev. VICTOR IA DNN ·. Long cross haussé on two steps, and having three limbs potent, called also a Byzantine cross; on either side R (?); in exergue CONOB. (See Lelewel, o. c. tom. I. p. 116.) The above is probably the oldest papal coin. Lelewel attributes one uncertain piece to Deodatus as early as the 6th century; and Fig. 54 has by some numismatists been considered the proof of a coin of Gregory II (715–731). In spite of the GRE II, however, this attribution is extremely doubtful. With the exception of these rare papal coins, and of the coins which continued to be struck by the dukes of Beneventum down to the middle of the 10th century, Charlemagne's denarii formed the coinage of western continental Europe (Fig. 55). In our country the introduction of these denarii was followed by the substitution of the penny for the sceatt, whereby, with a change of form and a slight change of weight, the coinage of England was brought into harmony with that of the continent. The shape of the cross is approached to that on the money of Charlemagne, that is to say it is now generally an even-limbed cross occupying the centre of the coin, and rather a definite part of its structure than a mere symbol. In fact, from this time forward throughout Europe the general tendency of the coinage is to assume an architectural design, and following the same impulse, the cross upon it becomes architectural rather than pictorial.

[C. F. K.]

It is probable that the earliest coins of Venice belong also to this period. In the Numismatica Veneta, o serie di monete e medaglie dei Dogi di Venezia (Venezia, Giuseppe Grimaldo tip. calc. editore), 1856, indeed accounts and figures are given of the coins of ten doges who ruled in Venice from A.D. 697–827; but many of these earlier pieces are admitted by the author to be forgeries, and all labour under grave suspicion. The type of the coins published as genuine is, in nearly every case, a cross sometimes neatly, sometimes rudely formed, the limbs of which are nearly equal, being occasionally of the Maltese type. It occurs either at the head of the legend, or in the centre of the coin, or in both one and the other on the money of Paoluccio Anafesto (697–717), Marcello Tegalliano (717–726), Teodato Ipato (726–737), Galla Gaulo (755–756), Domenico Monegario (756–764), Giovanni Galbajo, false, (787–804), Obeleiro Antenoreo, false, (804–810), Angelo Partecipazio (810–827). Some deniers attributed to the last-named doge are, however, undoubtedly genuine. They are of the temple type of Fig. 50, bearing upon one side a cross with an obscure legend, RSCV SERVA ROMANO IMP, of which no interpretation is proposed by the editor, possibly standing for Perpetuum securum servus Romanorum imperium; and on the other side a temple, as on coins of Charlemagne and Louis le Débonnaire, with legend, XPE (Christe) SALVA VENECIAS. This money (of which there is a specimen in the British Museum) is believed to have been struck at the time when the Venetians concluded a peace with Charlemagne, after the discomfiture which they inflicted on Pepin, A.D. 810.

Coins with the legend CRISTUS IMPER', and of a degraded form of the temple type, though ascribed by Schweitzer (Serie delle monete e medaglie d'Aquileja e di Venezia, Trieste, 1848) to the very beginning of the 9th century are, almost without doubt, of a much later date.

MEDALS.

Medals, as the word is commonly used by English writers,[a] designate objects in metal which resemble coins in general appearance, but which were not made to pass as money. More usually they bear devices on both sides, but occasionally on one side only (plaques). Medals may commemorate events or persons, or may be used for purposes of devotion, or as charms, or be employed for ornamental purposes, being inlaid in Christian ecclesiastical furniture of various kinds. But as they are commonly classed under Numismatics, this article would be incomplete without some notice of the few Christian medals which have come down to us from the period embraced in this work. The following are the principal subjects represented:—

(1) Christ as the Good Shepherd. A bronze medallion (4¼ inches in diameter) of rough work (di rozza maniera) has this most ancient subject of Christian art on both sides. On the obverse the Shepherd (without nimbus) is turned to the left, dressed in a tunic, with buskins on his legs, the feet bare, his right hand placed on his head, his left hand resting on a staff upon the ground; his right heel leans on his left instep. On either side is a tree, considered by Buonarotti to be a palm, by Perret (with perhaps better reason) to be an olive; in the middle a sheep (of small size). The Shepherd is here sad, going in search of the lost sheep, intended to be represented in the distance. The reverse has two trees nearly as before, but the Shepherd (turned to the left as before) now holds no staff, but the sheep (of much larger size) across his shoulders, holding two of its legs by either hand. This medal has been gilt.

Found in the Catacombs of Rome. Described and figured by Buonarotti, Osservazioni sopra alcuni frammenti di vasi antichi di vetro, pp.

[a] Gibbon however often speaks of coins as medals; so also the French writers in general style them médailles. English and French writers alike use medallion for either a coin or medal of large size.

24–28, tav. iv., and after him by Perret, Catacombes de Rome, vol. vi. p. 118, and vol. iv. pl. xvii. nos. 5 and 7. Perhaps of the 3rd or 4th century.

There are other bronze medals exhibiting Christ as the Good Shepherd. One, now in the Vatican Museum, having a design on one side only, gives him (without nimbus) standing to the right beneath a tree (mistico olivo, De Rossi); a dog near his feet looking up: in the landscape at different heights are seen seven sheep, standing, lying down, feeding or playing; another tree halfway up the landscape on the other side. Diameter 1½ inches, with a ring for suspension. Considered by De Rossi to be not later than the 3rd century (Bullett. Arch. Crist. 1869, p. 42, tav. n. 1). He quotes (p. 39) Marini's MS. description of another most interesting medal of this class, formerly in the collection of Cardinal Stefano Borgia, but which he has in vain endeavoured to trace. "Velitris in Museo Borgiano in orbiculo aereo incuso in antica parte capita se invicem respicientia SS. Petri et Pauli et litterae PETRVS PAVLVS, supra ☧, infra duae aviculae bibentes: in postica stat pastor dextra innexus pedo, sinistra ostentans fistulam, ad pedes canis dominum respiciens, hinc inde oves et inscriptio—

SECVNDINE VIV
AS."

A variety of scenes from the Old and New Testament is combined in the following thin bronze plaque, which Buonarotti suspects was intended for a processional cross; it would be suitable enough for insertion into a pastoral staff; but was probably made for neither the one nor the other in the first instance; a casket is at least as likely to have had it thereon. Christ, as the Good Shepherd, in the centre bearing a sheep, two other sheep are at his feet. About him, in four compartments, are the following nine subjects taken from the Old Testament, having (or supposed to have) some connexion with the Saviour (see Buonarotti, u. s. pp. 1–3).

In the first one: (a) Adam and Eve; (b) Noah in the Ark, welcoming the dove; (c) Jonah resting under a gourd.

In the second: (d) The Sacrifice of Abraham; (e) Daniel in the Lions' Den.

In the third: (f) Moses striking the Rock; (g) Samson bearing the gates of Gaza.

In the fourth: (h) Jonah swallowed up by the whale; (i) Jonah vomited up by the whale.

Diameter, 1⅞ inch. Found in the cemetery of St. Pontianus; first published by Ciampini, De duobus Emblem., p. 4, Rom. 1691, then by Buonarotti (u. s. tav. 1), from which an enlarged copy is given in Perret, Catacombes, vol. vi. p. 120 and vol. iv. pl. xx. n. 7. It does not appear where this most interesting monument now is. To judge from the figures it would seem to be very ancient, perhaps even as early as the 3rd century (Fig. 56).

The Good Shepherd appears in fine (as it would seem) on one side of a medal described below.

(2) Portraits of Christ.—These are not found upon coins till the reign of Justinian Rhinotmetus (685–711), and it is by no means clear that all the medals which have them are not later still. The earliest in all likelihood, and certainly the most important, is a massive plaque of gold, on one side of which the face of the Saviour in low relief is represented in the centre, the eyes being formed by garnets or by pastes in imitation of them. Around it in six compartments is the chrisma formed of X and R (not P), and from the transverse bar of the cross are suspended α and ω. "Ces lettres sont découpées à jour." Ornaments in the centre are formed of enamels cloissonés. Reverse plain. Diam. 63 mill.; weight 39 grammes. Acquired in 1855 for the Bibliothèque Nationale at Paris, having been found a few years previously at Linon in the department of Puy-de-Dôme. Referred to the Merovingian period by M. Chabouillet (Catal. des Camées, &c., n. 2711, p. 402). Three holes in the margin shew that it had been used for insertion into some piece of ecclesiastical furniture.° See under n. 3.

(3) Infant Saviour adored by the Magi.—Three medals on which this subject is represented are known, and there has been much controversy about the age of one of them; none of them can be earlier than the 5th century, and all may probably be much later, perhaps even lower than the period embraced in this work.

(a) Obv. Bust of the Saviour, with circular nimbus, between two stars (i. e. seen in heaven), holding a wreath in each hand, crowns two saints (without nimbus) in long drapery, each holding a long cross in one hand, and holding up the other towards another larger long cross between. On one side of this cross is α, and on the other ω. A boy, holding a candle (an oblate) on the left, approaches one of the saints: folds of drapery on each side the coin indicate a ciborium in the apse of a church in which the scene is placed. Rev. The Virgin (without nimbus) seated on high chair to right, a stool before her; on her lap the infant Saviour (with circular nimbus), before them three magi standing in short drapery, each holding a round object in his hand; above the Saviour is a short cross (approaching in form to the Maltese); higher up a dove holds a branch; above the middle magus is a star. Æ 1½ inch; figures in intaglio. Space below exergual line on both sides empty. In the Vatican. (De Rossi, u. s. p. 55, tav. n. 9.) The composition of the Saviour crowning the saints is compared by De Rossi to that in the apse of the church of SS. Primo and Feliciano in Rome (A.D. 645), figured by Ciampini; he inclines to place the medal in the 6th or 7th century.

work. In the Vatican. The composition of the obverse is compared by De Rossi with that of a mosaic of St. Michael in Ravenna, A.D. 545; he thinks it earlier than the 8th century, from which time he finds no medals with figures in intaglio (u. s. pp. 55, 56, tav. n. 10). This and the preceding were referred to the age of the Comneni by Marangoni, who wrongly considered them as money (see De Rossi, u. s.), but he may perhaps not have erred greatly as to their age. A coin, having an emperor on one side, supposed by Mr. Madden to be John Comnenus, or John Palaeologus, is described and figured in the Num. Chron. 1878, p. 194, pl. x. n. 10, which has a similar reverse with the adoration of the (three) magi, but they are here kneeling; the Virgin alone has a circular nimbus [p. 1293].

(4) Portraits of Apostles.—The heads of Peter and Paul occur facing on a famous bronze medal, said to have been found by Boldetti in the Catacombs, which has commonly been thought to be very ancient[s] (see under PETER

[p] Hardouin was inclined to ascribe it to the 14th century, but Mamachi (see below) thought it much older. Burgon suspected it to be the 15th (u. s.).

[q] A description of the piece may not be out of place. Obv. EMMANOVHA around draped bust of the Saviour facing, holding the Gospels, whose head is adorned with cruciform nimbus enclosed in a circle; ICXC in field. Rev. Star or scroll above and below, between them: ✝ IHSVS | XRISTVS | BASILEY | BASILE (in four lines). (See Sabat. Mon. Byzant. s. ii. p. 143, pl. xlviii. n. 5; Numis. Chron. 1878, p. 179, pl. ix. n. 4.)

[r] The example seen by Hardouin was in the possession of Card. Boncompagni; Mamachi does not say where the medal which he saw was preserved.

In connexion with this medal two others of bronze, formerly in the Vettori Museum, may be named, about whose age little can be said with confidence, except that both are late. They may probably be later than the 9th century, and if so, do not concern the present work. Yet a short notice may not be unwelcome under the doubtful circumstances. Both have on the obverse the full face of the Saviour with cruciform nimbus enclosed in a circle, which is of the same general character as that on the coins of John Zimisces. One has on the reverse the legend ANACTACIO and a building with a dome, the door open, on either side of which is a soldier asleep (¾ inch). Figured in Mamachi (Orig. et Ant. Christ. t. i. p. 287; Matranga's edition, after Vettori, Numm. aereus Vet. Christ. p. 47). Tanini, who describes this piece from a specimen in the collection of Card. Borgia, places it after the coins of Constantine (Suppl. ad Band. p. 280), and thinks it may have been struck when Constantine built the basilica of the Anastasis on the site of the Holy Sepulchre. But the style of work renders this supposition impossible; Eckhel (D. N. V. t. viii. p. 251) is disposed to class it to John Zimisces. De Rossi (u. s. p. 58) thinks it is struck for pilgrims as a memorial of their visit to the Holy Sepulchre at Jerusalem. For the controversies to which this medal has given rise, see De Rossi, u. s. and Madden, Num. Chron. 1878, p. 192. The other has on the reverse the baptism of Christ by John in the Jordan, who standing on the bank pours water on His head as He is immersed in the river up to the middle: above is the dove; the legend around is REDEMTIO FILIIS HOMINVM. with IORDA in exergue. 1 inch. Figured after Vettori by Mamachi, u. s. t. i. p. 240, who regards it as a vetus monumentum; "quo tamen tempore elaboratum fuerit, ne suspicari quidem possum." De Rossi, having examined this specimen, now in the Vatican Library, is unable to form "un giudizio sull' età e sull' arte di questa medaglia," and is inclined to suspect its genuineness.

There are two unimportant tokens referred to the reign of Zimisces, one of which has the bust of Christ as before on the obverse, accompanied by IC XC, and on the reverse ΘΩΔΑΝ | ΕΙΖΕΙΤΟΥ | ΣΠΕΝΗΤΑΣ | ΟΤΡΕΦΩΝ (Prov. xix. 17). The other has on obverse ΔΑ | ΝΕΙΖΕΙ | ΘΕΩ, and on the reverse, ΟΕΛΕ | ΩΝΠΤΩ | ΧΟΝ, which is exactly the rendering of the same passage in the LXX. These pieces have been published by Dr. Friedländer (Num. Zeitschrift, vol. ii. Vienna, 1870), and from him by Mr. Madden (Num. Chron. 1878, p. 193).

[s] The beautiful figure given by Brownlow and Northcote led the writer (see vol. i. p. 733, note) perhaps too hastily to suspect that it was of the age of the Renaissance, as it bears little resemblance to any medallion of ancient Roman art which he remembers to and PAUL). Another bronze medal with the same heads inscribed with their names and various accessories is mentioned above under n. 1. A third of the same metal in the Christian Museum of the Vatican, (2¾ inches) engraved by Perret, bears the same heads, but in a different style, having the chrisma between them (Catacombes, vol. ii. on title-page). A small oblong medal or plaque in the Vatican of rude work, having a neck-like loop pierced for suspension, gives the head of St. Paul in intaglio with legend SCS PAVLVS (De Rossi, u. s. p. 44, with figure). Age uncertain, probably late (id. p. 56).

(5) Representations of other Saints.—Among the few of this class which can be recognised is St. Laurence (Fig. 58), who is represented as being broiled on a gridiron, with his feet held by an executioner behind; in front sits a Roman officer bearing a staff, with an officer standing at his feet; above the head of the saint is the chrisma (☧), and above his body is seen his soul rising upward in human form (see Martigny, Dict. s. v.; Ame. ed. 2, 1877). It is crowned by the hand of God appearing above, between Alpha and Omega. The reverse has an oblate (?) bearing a candle, approaching a cancellated structure, arched, but open above, which is probably intended for the tomb of St. Laurence. The legend SVCCESSA VIVAS occurs on both sides, she being the person for whom the medal is made; it has a loop above, shewing that it was intended for suspension. This lead medal, formerly in the Vettori Museum, now in the library of the Vatican, is in intaglio (1½ inches); it is a cast from a bronze, probably of the 5th century, described by Ménétrier (De Rossi, u. s. pp. 33–37, tav. n. 8). Other medals are found with figures of saints either at full length or the bust only, about which little can be said with certainty. One (perforated) has a head seen in front on the obverse, the reverse bearing the ordinary chrisma with α and ω in the angles. Probably of the 4th or 5th century. Bronze, nearly 1 inch (De Rossi, u. s. p. 41, n. 6). Another has the Saviour at length with circular nimbus between two other figures (Peter and Paul?), one of which has a staff on his shoulder terminated by the chrisma with legend ZOSIME VIVAS; the other side has a shepherd between trees, with staff, dog behind. Æ. 1$\frac{1}{10}$ inches (Id. u. s. tav. n. 4). De Rossi is probably right in thinking that the Saviour here commissions the two great apostles to preach the gospel; he holds something (perhaps a volume) in one hand towards one of them (see De Rossi, u. s. pp. 43–45). Probably about the 5th century. Another (p. 45, tav. n. 2) gives two figures (a woman with uplifted hands talking to a man, the chrisma above, and on the other side three men. Æ. 1½ inches. These are suspected by De Rossi to be intended for St. Felicitas and her seven children, martyred along with her; and to have been struck in Rome in their honour. Perhaps about the same age as the preceding.

(6) Chrisma or Monogram of Christ. See above, n. 5. A small piece (described by Marini) with reversed chrisma (☧) in circle on one side and VINA | NTII in two lines on the other. Æ. $\frac{8}{10}$ inch (De Rossi, p. 43, tav. n. 6), the other side blank. Another (perforated) found in a loculus in Aringhi's time, has the ordinary chrisma. Æ. 1 inch (De Rossi, u. s. p. 43, engraved at p. 44, n. 3). Another, a plaque with loop for suspension, has the chrisma between I and N, LEO being in a line below (i. e. in Christo Leo). Æ. 1½ inches. In the Kircherian Museum (De Rossi, u. s. p. 44, n. 6, and p. 39). These pieces may probably be of the 4th century or a little later.

(7) Cross.—A bronze piece (perforated), irregular in form, about 1 inch in diameter; has on one side a Latin cross, at the feet of which are the α and ω in silver, incised and worked in niello (incise e niellate in argento). Museum of the Vatican. Not earlier than the 5th century, perhaps much later (De Rossi, u. s. p. 43, engraved p. 44, n. 4). Crosses of various forms are also figured as accessories on other medals, see under n. 3.

From the Old Testament we have a few scenes, such as the following:—

(8) Sacrifice of Abraham.—A plaque, representing Abraham and Isaac on the top of Mount Moriah, between trees; an angel looks down from heaven. An animal (meant for a ram) behind Abraham. The style is peculiar, apparently very ancient. 1½ inch, bronze. (De Rossi, u. s. p. 40, tav. n. 3.) The same subject is repeated on a badly preserved bronze medal, which has a loop for suspension, where Isaac kneels before Abraham, who holds a knife; a ram is behind him; the legend above (now remaining) is VRBICVS. The other side represents a male figure in long drapery, presenting a chalice before an altar on which are three lights, the slab being supported by spiral columns on a frame; behind him an oblate; the legend is GAVDENTIANVS. De Rossi explains the medal thus: Urbicus devotes his son Gaudentianus to the service of God or one of the saints, possibly to St. Laurence; Abraham would resemble Urbicus in offering his son to God. He thinks the medal was struck about A.D. 400. (De Rossi, u. s. pp. 49, 50, tav. n. 5.)

(9) Daniel in the Lions' Den.—A plaque with this device is figured by Venuti among the medallions of the Albani Museum (Ant. Num. Max. Mod. Mus. Albani, t. ii. p. 119). Now in the Vatican. De Rossi regards it as an ornament for furniture (u. s. p. 37). See also under n. 1, where this and other subjects from the Old Testament are figured as accessories.

Of the preceding medals those which bear the figure of Christ as the Good Shepherd are in all likelihood the oldest; and these (or some of them) may probably be earlier than Constantine; the greater part perhaps of the others may be referred to the 4th and 5th centuries; all those, however, that bear the portrait of Christ with cruciform nimbus are later, perhaps very much later.

M. De Rossi, who above all others has contributed to the knowledge of Christian medals, quotes a passage from the Acts of St. Germanus of Auxerre, in which it is said that after Geneviève had consecrated herself to God in perpetual have seen or read of. A tin-foil impression obtained at his request by the Rev. H. R. Bailey from the original by the courtesy of M. De Rossi, was unfortunately much injured, and does not enable him either to confirm or remove his suspicion. The diameter of the medal is 3 inches.

virginity (circa A.D. 429), the saintly bishop suspended a bronze medal (nummus aereus), bearing a cross, "quasi quoddam pignus religiosi muneris, atque ut perforatus collo ejus inhaereret indixit" (Bolland. Acta SS. 1 Jan. p. 143, in De Rossi, u. s. p. 57; see also Chiflet, Anast. Childer. Regis, pp. 184, 185, 276). No other clear allusion to Christian medals of devotion has hitherto, it is believed, been adduced from ancient authors.

But the fathers, SS. Athanasius, Augustine and Chrysostom, condemn the superstitious use of amulets, which prevailed in their age among some Christians; the last of whom mentions that bronze medals of Alexander of Macedon were attached to the head and feet as charms (Ad illuminand. Catech. ii. 5); now De Rossi (who refers to these authors) mentions a bronze medal, published by Vettori, preserved in the Vatican Library, bearing on the obverse the head of Alexander (reading ALEXANDER) covered with the lion's skin (as on his silver coins), and on the reverse the chrisma (☧) enclosed in a circle. He appears to be right in thinking that this and the following are the kind of charms against which St. John Chrysostom protests. Paciaudi in 1748 first published a medal having the head and name of Alexander as before on the obverse, but bearing on the reverse an ass's colt sucking its mother, accompanied by the astrological scorpion and the legend D.N. IHS XPS DEI FILIVS (De Rossi, u. s. p. 61, MONEY). He mentions in fine (p. 62) a copper plate (lamina di rame), perforated for suspension, in the possession of Signor Lovatti, a dealer in antiques at Rome, reading on one side as follows:—In the centre an owl; about it DOMINVS and seven stars; in a circle near the circumference, BICIT TE LEO DE TRIBVS IVDA RADIS DAVIT. (The Lion of the tribe of Judah, the root of David hath overcome thee.) On the reverse, IESV ☧ STVS | LIGABIT TE BRA | TIVS DEI ET SIGIL | LVS SALAMONIX | ABIS NOTTVRNA | NON BALEAS AD | ANIMA PVRA ET | SVPRA QVIS | VIS SIS. Jesus Christ hath bound thee, the arm of God and the seal of Solomon (have bound thee). Bird of night, mayest thou not prevail to approach the pure soul and to get over her, whoever thou beest. No speculation is made by De Rossi concerning the age of this document. There is a very similar medal of red copper (Fig. 59), meant for an amulet pierced for suspension, which was found at Keff, anciently Sicca Venerea, in Tunis. It is now in the King of Holland's Cabinet at the Hague, and is rendered by Reuvens, at the end of his second letter to Letronne (pp. 29–32), as follows; the doubtful conjectures are also his.

Obv. Invidia invidiosa nihil tibi ad (admat?), anima pura et munda, Quirince (for Cyriace); sata malina (maligna) non tibi praevaleat (sic), Ligabit te Dei brachium Dei et Christi et (sic) signum et sigillum Solomonis ✝ PAXCACA (Abraxas?).

Rev. Owl: legend round it in two circles. Id non praevaleas (sic: praevaleat?) inf. (infaustum or infanti?). Ligabit te brachium Dei. Quirince, in Deo vivas. (Reuvens, Lettres à M. Letronne sur les Papyrus bilingues, &c., Leide, 1830, who gives an enlarged figure; from this and from an impression kindly sent by Dr. Vollgraff the present figure of the size of the original is taken. The original proper name, which can hardly now be read, has evidently been cancelled, and Quirince written in its place.) The learned author regards the medal as late, but without saying how late. In all likelihood it was not struck too late to be embraced in the present work. For the Sigillum Salomonis, see Reuvens, u. s. and Smith's Dict. of Bible, iii. 1534, note: in this case the name of Solomon itself appears to constitute the seal (see SEAL). It is worthy of note that the word Abraxas here seems to occur on a tolerably ancient monument which is undoubtedly Christian. [See GEMS, p. 720, note.] [C. B.]

MONIALIS. [NUN.]

MONICA, mother of St. Augustine; commemorated May 4 (Boll. Acta SS. May, i. 473). [C. H.]

MONICIA, martyr; commemorated in Achaia Ap. 16 (Hieron. Mart.). [C. H.]

MONITIO (1). According to a decree of a council of Orleans, quoted by Ivo (Decret. p. ii. c. 120), the priest after the sermon, which is preached in the Mass, is to admonish the people to pray to the Lord for their several necessities, for the king, for the bishops and rulers of churches, for peace, for the sick, for those who have lately departed, &c.; at each of which petitions the people are silently to say the Lord's Prayer, while the priest says—apparently also silently—the prayers which are to accompany the several admonitions (monitiones).

(2) After sermon the priest also gave notice of such things as the days to be observed specially in the ensuing week. Thus St. Augustine (Serm. 3, s. fin.) begs the people to observe on the next day the anniversary of the ordination of Aurelius at the basilica of Faustus (Martene, de Rit. Eccl. I. iv. 5, § 7). Such notices were called monitiones. [C.]

MONK (μοναχός, monachus). It is obvious that in the first instance the word μοναχός designated a solitary, an anchoret or HERMIT. And it was in fact applied originally to those who passed their lives in solitude (μονάζοντες), in deserts, or in "dens and caves of the earth" [MORTIFICATION], and who were thus distinguished from ascetics, who might carry on their ascetic practices in the midst of a town. But when the rage of persecution passed away which had driven many into the wilderness (Sozom. H. E. i. 12), and the scattered hermits came to dwell in villages of huts or cells [LAURA], and even when they came to live in regularly organised communities [COENOBIUM; MONASTERY], they still retained the title which they derived from their original solitary life. So that in almost all the languages of Europe a word derived from solitude has come to designate one who is emphatically a member of a community; and a word which originally designated the solitary retreat of a hermit has come to designate a house crowded with organised life, though the cell of the individual monk is still a μοναστήριον in the stricter sense of the word. [C.]

MONKS (IN ART). It is as difficult to distinguish the monastic dress from the ecclesiastical, as in many cases to tell the ecclesiastical from the civil. As St. Anthony's first organisation of the monastic life, as distinguished from the eremitical, dates from the latter half of the third century, no representation of monks can be expected much earlier than the fourth. Bottari, however, at the beginning of his 3rd volume, in a picture of the burial of St. Ephrem, represents three coenobites of the East, one in prayer, the other two occupied in basket-making; indicating, of course, the rule of devotion and labour which St. Benedict afterwards adopted for the Western monasteries. (See woodcut.) Martigny (Dict. p. 407) says that he knows no more ancient representation of the monastic habit. It is to be observed that the nun-like habit usually represented as worn by the Blessed Virgin, is later than the mosaics of Sta. Maria Maggiore (circ. 431), where she is represented bareheaded, and richly dressed (Rohault de Fleury, L'Évangile, vol. i. p. 64, pl. 21). Her dress has a decidedly monastic appearance in the Pentecost of the Laurentian MSS. of Rabula (Assemani, Catal. Bibloth. Medica Laurent. tav. xxvi.), and monks are certainly represented at tav. xxv., though the apostles in the former plate wear togae with clavi. See also tab. iii. iv. vii. and indeed passim. This MS. is dated A.D. 583.

Monks. From Martigny.

The dress of saints in the mosaics up to the 11th century is rather ecclesiastical than monastic, though of course many are represented who were under monastic vows. This appears to be the case even in the 9th century Greek Menologium of the Vatican (D'Agincourt, Peinture, pl. xxxii. xxxiii.). The writer can find no distinctively monastic dress in Professor Westwood's Irish and Anglo-Saxon MSS. up to that of St. Dunstan, 11th century, plate l. The dark colours would be objectionable in illuminations; but the black Benedictine robe and tonsure are unmistakeable. A monk, apparently in glory, has a pink habit and the tonsure. [R. St. J. T.]

MONNUS, martyr; commemorated at Rome at the cemetery of Praetextatus May 10 (Hieron. Mart.). [C. H.]

MONOBAMBYLUM (μονδμπουλον), the candlestick holding a single taper, carried before a patriarch of Constantinople on ordinary occasions. On the day when he received the pastoral staff from the emperor he was honoured with a candlestick with two sockets, dibambylum, διδμπουλον (Pachymeres, Hist. ii. 28). [C.]

MONOGAMY. [DIGAMY; MARRIAGE; ORDERS, HOLY.]

MONOGRAM, an abbreviation of the name Jesus Christ. The Christian public or official use of this symbol is involved in nearly the same chronological difficulties as that of the cross. [See CROSS.] The term Chrisma is frequently applied to it. Its original form was certainly that of the ☓, the initial letter of our Lord's name, with the letter ℙ across the intersection of its limbs. It was subsequently altered by enlarging the central ℙ into the form ℛ. A further modification, which turned the ☓ into the Egyptian ☥, brought the monogram into the form of the penal cross thus ✝. It is suggested under CROSS, that though we can produce few or no instances, before Constantine, of the public use of the monogram of the name of the Lord, or the cross which symbolized His person and His death, both the letters and the symbol were then in private use: so as to be fully understood as representing Him. The distinction must be observed that the monogram, as an initial, is only a phonetic or letter-symbol; whereas the Cross is a graphic symbol or hieroglyph, and appeals to memory and a train of associations connected with the Lord's person, and indeed the manner of His death, the nature of His sacrifice, and His whole church as a system and a kingdom.

The modification into the penal, the Egyptian, or Tau-cross surmounted by the ℙ, seems to date from about the time of Constantine, and may have been produced by either or both of two causes. At that period it became safe, and it may have been thought both right and necessary, for Christendom to avow the Lord's death as a malefactor: the reproach of the cross would then be no longer intolerable to fresh converts, and the manner of His death had to be remembered in attestation of His perfect humanity. Hence the penal cross of His death was raised as a standard. But this later ☥-form of the monogram seems to have been especially popular in the East, and in Egypt almost exclusively used (Garrucci, Vetri, p. 104, and Letronne, De la Croix ansée Égyptienne, p. 16). It is quite possible that it may have become more popular under Alexandrian influence, especially after the appearance of Athanasius at the council of Nicaea. Garrucci is decidedly of opinion that the monogram and the cross were both adopted, simultaneously and from the first, by Constantine, and considered in fact as the same symbol. In some cases the upright cross was added to the oblique one so as to form an eight-rayed star ✳, but the ℛ monogram and the Greek cross appear alike on coins of Constantines, published in the "tavola d'Aggiunta" at the end of Garrucci's Vetri. [MONEY.] He says it is certain that the ℛ monogram represented the σταυρός or cross in the Coptic church, and quotes a curious passage from St. Ephrem, which gives the reason for attaching the letters A and ω to the opposite limbs of the upright symbol, and then identifies it with the Rho-monogram ☧. (Opp. v. iii. 477, ed. Assemani.) Διὰ τί ἱστορεῖται ἐν διαφόροις τόποις ἐκ (τῶν πλευρῶν) τοῦ σταυροῦ A καὶ ω*;* The answer follows:—Ὅτι ἀρχὴ καὶ τέλος ὁ σταυρωθεὶς ἐν αὐτῷ ὑπάρχει, τὸ δὲ ἄνωθεν P σημαίνει βοηθόν, ψηφιζόμενον ἑκατόν.[a] Martigny remarks further, that the ☧ is the only form of the monogram found in the Alexandrine Bibles, as in the Vatican MS., that of Mount Sinai published by Tischendorf, and that at Cambridge.

Boldetti (Osservazioni sopra i Cimiteri, etc. pp. 336–347) gives a series of examples of the monogram from the catacombs and cemeteries of SS. Agnes, Praetextatus, Calixtus, Cyriaca, Gordianus, Pontianus, Lucina, Helena, Calepodius, and Hippolytus. All except two in the two last-named cemeteries are of the ☧ or ✠ form. [INSCRIPTIONS, pp. 847 ff.] The latter may have been adopted simply because it is easier to write. But few have the A and ω; and this may be taken as some indication, at least, that they are antecedent to the Nicene council. [A and ω, i. 1.] In the annexed example the Greek P is used as a Roman P for the better arrangement of its inscription on the sigil or stamp. The universal employment of the Greek letters is another illustration of the observations of Dean Milman in his History of Christianity, that the Roman church, for the first two centuries at least, was essentially a Greek body.

The A and ω are sometimes hung by small chains to the branches of the cross, or thus represented. (See Boldetti, pp. 338 and 345, and Bottari, tav. xliv.) The first of these examples is somewhat rare, as representing these letters attached to the ☧ monogram. They are given with another example of the same form in a mosaic on a tablet of terra cotta from the cemetery of St. Cyriaca (see infra). The former of these may be the same as that quoted by Martigny from De Rossi (Inscr. Christ. Rom. t. i. No. 776), which he says is unique according to his experience.

The monogram is sometimes (and almost always in Gallic inscriptions) surrounded by a wreath of palm or other leaves, in sign of the Lord's victory; and there is an analogous use of placing the upright monogram in the letter N thus for XPICTOC NIKA. [CROSS, p. 498.]

In Aringhi, vol. i. p. 605, there is a copy of a sepulchral inscription from the cemetery of Priscilla, by Victorina to her dead husband Heraclius, which ends with the palm-branch, and is headed by the upright monogram with the A and ω, all inscribed in a triangle. This is said to be very uncommon, but Martigny, in his article on 'Triangle,' gives three other forms of its combination with the monogram: the two first from Lupi (Severae Epit[illegible], fol. Palermo, 1734), the other from a letter of M. de St. Antoine, canon of the cathedral of Lyons, which gives account of fifteen inscriptions on various monuments. It is dated 14th April, 1631, and was discovered by De Rossi in the Barberini library, and published by E. Le Blant (Inscr. Chrétiennes de la Gaule, t. i. p. 107). The monogram is often placed on the forehead of the portrait of our Lord. (See Boldetti, p. 60, and Martigny, Dict. 334.) It is found thus on the Good Shepherd and the Lamb (Mamachi, iii. 18; Bottari, tav. xxi.; GEMS, p. 718; and in the NIMBUS [p. 1393]; see also Aliegranza's Sacri Monum. antichi di Milano, tav. i.). It appears on a glass representing the miracle of the Seven Loaves (Garrucci, vii. 16, and Buonarotti, tab. viii. 1), and on an altar, between St. Peter and St. Paul, or other saints (Buonarotti, xiv. 2). These latter are all in the ✠ form, which seems to have kept its hold on Christian use from the fact that the X alone, as an initial, represented the venerated name. Julian speaks of the X and the K in his Misopogon, pp. 94, 5, ed. Par. 1566, as representing Christ and Constantine, Ἐδιδάχθημεν ἀρχὰς ὀνομάτων εἶναι τὰ γράμματα· δηλοῦν δ' ἐθέλειν τὸ μὲν Χριστὸν τὸ δὲ Κωνσταντίνιον; and again (pp. 106–7) of the two reproaches made against him in Antioch, ὡς ἐκ τοῦ πάππου μου πλέκειν δεῖ σχοινία· καὶ ὅτι πολεμῶ τῷ Χῖ.

It seems difficult to imagine, as is sometimes contended, that the monogram was unknown or rarely used before the days of Constantine. The habitual use of the Cross in his time is proved by Tertullian, de Cor. Mil. c. 3, quoted under CROSS. It may have been used privately or unofficially from the first, though perhaps unsatisfactory to Hebrew brethren or Roman catechumens. It is remarkable, however, that the monogram or cross is not mentioned in Clement's list of permitted symbols on rings at Paedagog. iii. 11, p. 246 D. A certain use of symbolism was allowed by the synagogue, though the use of the cherub-forms probably ended with the ancient temple. Still a Christian society in which the Greek element altogether predominated for 300 years cannot have gone on long without the use of emblematic or specially significant forms; especially where secrecy was often an object. The passages in Apoc. vii. 2, xiv. 1, where the sign of the Son of God is spoken of, compared with Ezek. ix. 4, 6, suggest the idea that the monogram is there intended, and though the speculation is not one to be pursued far, it is excusable. Whatever the subjective reality of Constantine's vision may be, it is clear that he saw, or thought he saw, or said he thought he saw, some emblem or sign whose meaning he and his followers well knew. There is no reason for supposing that the form of the Labarum was revealed to Constantine for the first time, never having existed before. In Eusebius (Vit. Const. i. 24–26) his vision is spoken of as a dream; and it is consistent with the mysterious admixture of the natural and the providential, which constitutes what we call divine interference, that a well-known form should be for ever invested, in his mind, with divine meaning, rather than that a new one should have been invented. In fact, had the labarum been believed to be a new revelation of a divine sign of the Son of Man, it would everywhere have taken the place of the cross, on the authority of Constantine, as the man privileged to see it; and might have prevented the use or worship of the crucifix. The change to the upright cross in the labarum may have proceeded naturally from the cruciform vexillum of the Roman cavalry [LABARUM, p. 11]. But the earlier ☧ or ☧ continued in use even on that ensign; and it is certainly found, in most instances without Christian meaning, on ancient coins and medals, as in the Lydian or Mæonian medal quoted by Martigny, s. v. "Numismatique," p. 454, where the letters X and P, which form part of the legend, are united so as to form it thus ☧. See M. Ch. Lenormant, Signes de Christianisme sur les Monum. numismatiques du troisième Siecle, in Mélanges d'Archéologie, t. iii. [MONEY.] In this matter, as in every other which concerns the monuments of Christian Rome, we have to lament the effects of relic-removing, collecting, and devout interpolation. Inscriptions are collected in museums, arranged and re-arranged according to tastes or theories, and crosses and monograms of secondary date are everywhere found inscribed on more ancient tablets after the peace of the church, and thus the monuments will vitiate each other's evidence to the end of time.

Until lately the earliest certain Chi-monogram was supposed to date A.D. 331, omitting the mutilated and doubtful fragment which is thought to present date 298. (De Rossi, Inscr. Christ. t. i. p. 29, and p. 38, No. 39.) But an earlier example than the former—as far back as 323—has been found under the Constantinian basilica of St. Lawrence in Agro Verano. We have already speculated on the greater importance and more frequent use of the symbol after the council of Nice. But this year is also the date of the death of Licinius, from which time the symbol begins to be engraved on coins (De Rossi, Bullett. 1863, p. 22). In 355 it is for the first time joined to the A and ω. Other forms appear about 347, the upright cross being first added to the Chi-rho so as to form a kind of star; then the X is withdrawn and the ☧ remains. To the 5th century the old and new forms go on together, ☧ and ☧; but early in the 6th the ☧ disappears, and the Latin or Greek cross takes the place of the monograms. Martigny gives a very curious and interesting instance of the final transition into the cross as symbolic not only of Christ's name but of His death. The monogram ☧ is used in the Sinaitic Bible four times: once at the end of Jeremiah, twice at the end of Isaiah, and in Apoc. 11, 8, in the middle of the word ΕCΤΑΥΡΩΘΗ. (De Rossi, Bullett. 1863, p. 62.) However in the Western world the use of the ancient letter-symbol continued to the end of the 5th century. It was revived for a time by Charlemagne, and used by councils held under him, and even on sepulchral inscriptions. For the former, see Mabillon, de Re Diplomatica, l. v. tav. liv. lv. lvi., ed. Nap. p. 468 sqq.

On a larger scale the monogram occurs on the exteriors and interiors of ancient churches and basilicas. See Boldetti (Cimet. etc. p. 338), where a rude example of it with the A and ω is given. It continued visible to his day sculptured over the Latin Gate of the walls of Belisarius. He found it more frequently in the tile-mosaic in the cemeteries of Cyriaca and Priscilla, and in the tomb of Faustina, Callixtine cemetery (Boldetti, p. 339) it is enclosed in a wreath, which may represent a crown of palm. This is carved on a marble slab. But the sign occurs frequently in the mosaics which adorn the apses or arches of triumph in the churches of Rome and Ravenna; as in SS. Cosmas and Damian in the former place (Ciampini, Vet. Monum. ii. p. 60), or in Galla Placidia's chapel at Ravenna (ib. vol. i. tab. lxv. lxvi.). So also on the inner walls and veil of the sanctuary (Mabillon. de Re Diplom. bk. ii. c. 10, p. 110). The earliest example on a sacred building is now preserved in the Hôtel de Ville of Sion, and dates from A.D. 377. It was probably often used in baptisteries; Martigny gives a woodcut from Bottari (tav. xxxiv.; Aringhi, vol. i. p. 319) of a round or octagon building of this kind from a sarcophagus in the Vatican, which bears the monogram in the centre of its low roof. An interesting engraving, as recording a very early adoption for Christian purposes of that form; of which the Tower of the Winds, or Horologium, Athens, is one great example, and San Giovanni at Florence the chief one of the first Etrurian renaissance.

On sarcophagi and funereal monuments the monogram may be said to occur passim; often, as of old, standing as signum Domini or signum Christi, representing simply the name and person of our Lord (Boldetti, pp. 273, 345, 399).

"In ☧ Aurelio Marcellino Deposito, in ☧ vii. Idus Martia," the first of these examples, may stand for the others also. At p. 338 (Boldetti) there is a woodcut which is here reproduced (see below) of a tile, or ancient and thin brick, which was once used to close up a loculus in the cemetery of St. Cyriaca. In a painting of the Adoration of the Magi, recently discovered after a fall of earth outside of this place, the monogram takes the place of the star; perhaps with some reflection of the Lord's prophecy of the appearance of the sign of the Son of man in heaven.

For examples on sarcophagi, there is a very rich one in Bottari (tab. xxxvii.), Aringhi, i. p. 325, and at Bottari, tav. xxx., Aringhi, i. p. 311, it is attended (as representing our Lord) by the twelve apostles. On the bases of columns and pilasters see Bottari, tav. cxxxvi.

Some reference has been made above to the works of Buonarotti and Garrucci for the use of the monogram on glasses and cups. It is represented alone, or between St. Peter and St. Paul, or other saints, or on marriage cups with the wedded pair. We add an example of a lamp from Aringhi

(vol. ii. p. 371), which, he says, is of early date, "longe ante Constantini tempora." [Lamps, pp. 921, 923, 924.] There are several examples on rings in Boldetti (p. 502), with or without the palm-branch. On encolpia and amulets [Encolpion, p. 611]. In Hagioglypta, p. 225, there is an instance of the X in the mystic word IXΘYC, which has the loop of the P added to it. Compare the use of the P, both in its Greek and Roman meaning, Boldetti, p. 336.

A small bronze figure of St. Peter bearing the penal cross-monogram, of excellent workmanship, is given by Martigny, p. 539.

Count Melchior de Vogué found the sign of the cross or monogram on many ancient houses in the mountain villages of Syria, which were probably anterior to the Mussulman occupation; and St. Cyril of Alexandria (Contra Julianum, lib. vi.; Migne, vol. lxxvi. p. 796) shews that this was customary (τὸ χρῆναι δὴ πάντως ἐγχαράττειν ἀεὶ καὶ οἰκίαις καὶ μετώποις τὸ σημεῖον τ. τιμίου σταυροῦ).

For the use of the monogram on medals and coins, see Labarum and Money. On furniture and utensils Martigny refers to a wooden "pupitre," or faldstool, now preserved in the monastery of St. Croix at Poitiers, and shewn as originally the property of St. Radegund, wife of Clotaire I., son of Clovis. The monogram is roughly carved on it within a crown, between two crosses or cruciform symbols. (See Cahier and Martin, Mélanges d'Archéologie, t. iii. p. 156.) In Garrucci (Vetri, etc. pp. 104, 5) reference is made to a poem of Publilius O. Porphyrius to Constantine, in which the emperor is addressed as pilot of the ship of the state, and the cross-monogram is his helm. The object of the work is to request permission for the author's return from exile, and he has shewn his ingenuity by disposing the verses in which he compares the emperor to the world's helmsman in the form of a ship thus symbolically directed. For vessels, see Le Blant (Inscr. Chrét. de la Gaule, t. i. pl. 41, No. 244). Bottari (t. i. p. 102) mentions a strigil which Pignorio had seen marked with it in the midst of the name of the owner. So in sepulchral inscriptions. (De Rossi, Inscr. Christ. p. 111, No. 221. A ☧CRIGE.) Again, on the collars worn by fugitive slaves. (See Giorgi, p. 39; Fabretti, iii. 385.) One in particular seems to have belonged to a serf of the ancient basilica of St. Clement at Rome, being inscribed A DOMINICV CLEMENTIS. It appears from Pignori (Epist. xxiv., Spon. Miscell. 301), that the use of these collars dates from Constantine's time. It had been originally the custom to brand runaways on the forehead; and the wearing the collar was a Christian usage of mercy, which probably lasted long into the Middle Ages. (See Walter Scott's Ivanhoe, of Gurth and Wamba.) In any case, in these early times, the monogram was engraved on the plate of the collar, perhaps, as Martigny says, to remind the slave that severe punishment had been spared him in the name of Christ; perhaps with allusion to the text, "One is your Master, even Christ."

Other uses of the monogram seem to have been that it was placed at the head of episcopal letters; was used as a mark by readers for specially important passages; employed as a symbol of initiation and text for exhortation for catechumens before their baptism. In this capacity it was the custom in Milan to paint it on a large cloth and exhibit it in the church. (Muratori, Rerum Italicarum Script. vol. iv. p. 66.) In short till the crucifix took its place, its use seems to have been coextensive with that of the cross, and to have had the function of uniting the symbolical with the individual devotion of personal religion.

Thus much for the true or original monogram in which the initials of the Lord's title of Anointed, and the symbol of His person, life, and death were formally united, at or before the time of Constantine. A later monogram seems to have been constructed on the same principle from the first three letters ΙΗC of the name Jesus. It seems to have been derived from Byzantine usage. The usual Lower Greek abbreviation for the Lord's name is $\overline{\text{IC}}$, and one may give calligraphers and miniaturists credit for developing it by adding the H and perpendicular stroke, so as at length to form the ΙΗS of later times. Martigny says that St. Bernardin of Siena (d. 1444) was one of the first who used it, and this is confirmed by a passage in his Life in Alban Butler (May 20), in which he is said having one of his sermons to have exhibited the name of our Lord beautifully carved on a gilded panel, and incurred some suspicion in consequence. Martigny closes his article on this subject with one or two curious examples, of ancient date, where the ☧ and ΙΗC monograms seem both to have been in the mind of the inscriber or sculptor. One is in Lupi's Epitaphium Severae, p. 137, and bears the anchor-mark, which may indicate great antiquity, with both monograms, thus ΙΗ ☧. The other (p. 420) is from the chapel of St. Satyrus in St. Ambrogio at Milan, where St. Victor bears a cross in one hand and the annexed symbol (see above) in the other. It seems intended to combine the ancient Chrisma or Chi-Rho monogram with the initials ΙΗ, if not ΙΗC, and the cross, so as to join both initials and symbol in the words ΙΗCΟΥC ΧΡΙCΤΟC.

MONTH. The month-reckoning used by the church in the first century, in Palestine, was doubtless that which was followed by the Jews, such as we find it in Josephus, especially in the Wars. Writing for Syrian Greeks, he constantly substitutes for the Jewish (Babylonian) month-names those of the corresponding Macedonian lunar months, which names were introduced into the East in the track of Alexander's conquests.

The corresponding lunar months in the Jewish, Syrian, and Macedonian nomenclature are as follows:—

Jewish.	Syrian.	Macedonian.
Tisri	First Tisri ..	Hyperberetaeus.
Marchesvan	Second Tisri ..	Dius.
Kisleu	First Kanun ..	Apellaeus.
Tebeth	Second Kanun	Audinaeus.
Shebat	Shebat	Peritius.
Adar	Adar	Dystrus.
Nisan	Nisan	Xanthicus.
Ijar	Ijar	Artemisius.
Sivan	Hasiran	Daesius.
Thamuz ..	Thamuz	Panemus.
Ab	Ab	Lous.
Elul	Elul	Gorpiaeus.

The intercalary month is inserted, when necessary, between Adar and Nisan. The months are usually of 29 and 30 days alternately.

Later, throughout Syria, these Macedonian months were absolutely assimilated to the Roman months, in dimensions and epoch. Thus Hyperberetaeus is identical with September, Dius with October, etc. But no month-dates, lunar or other, occur in Christian writings earlier than the middle of the second century.[a] When such do occur, they are constantly Julian-Roman, or in terms of a Julianized calendar, usually in both together. From Galen (Comment. in Hippocr. Epidem.; Opp. Hippocr. et Galen. ix. 2, p. 8) we learn that in his time (circ. A.D. 150), "as the Romans, so the Macedonians, our own Asiani (Asia Procons.), and many other nations, had adopted the solar year," the cardinal points of which (as he goes on to describe) were taken as fixed by Julius Caesar, and, consequently, the Macedonian months, Dius, Peritius, Artemisius, and Lous made to begin at, or near, Sept. 24, Dec. 25, March 25, June 24 respectively. But the names and sequence of these months are not everywhere Macedonian, neither are the epochs the same. The requisite information on these points, laboriously gathered in by Ussher (de Macedonum et Asianorum anno Solari Dissertat., app. to his Annal. V. et N. Test.), and by Noris (de Anno et Epochis Syromacedonum; Opp. t. ii. 1sqq.), confirmed by two Ἡμερολογίαι διαφόρων πόλεων, since brought to light, will be found in Ideler (Handbuch, i. 393 sqq.).

[a] Assemani, indeed (Bibl. Orient. ii. 456), describing a Syriac MS. of "a Gospel" preserved in the Vatican, gives from its epigraph (Syriac) the following startling date—which, however, he receives unquestioned—"Absolutus est iste liber feria quinta die 18 Canun prioris anno Graecorum 389"—which year (Aera Seleuc.) began in the autumn of A.D. 77. Of course there is some error here. At any time to which the epigraph can be referred the Syrian months were identical with the Julian: the "former Canun" was Syro-Macedonian Apellaeus, identical with December. Now as in A.D. 77, Sunday letter E, the 18th December did fall on a Thursday, the simplest explanation is to say that there is an error in the centuries; for 389 read 1089; of A.D. 777 the Sunday letter is of course E, as of A.D. 77, and 18 Dec. Thursday.

The Macedonian names of the months, when a solar year was adopted, run as below in the Ephesian arrangement; the "Asian" names—i.e. those used in proconsular Asia—are different, though, as will be seen, the arrangement of the year is very nearly the same.

Asian.	Ephesian.	Epoch.	Days.
Caesarius ..	Dius	24 Sept. ..	30
Tiberius ..	Apellaeus ..	24 Oct. ..	31
Apaturius ..	Audnaeus ..	24 Nov. ..	31
Poideon ..	Peritius ..	25 Dec. ..	30
Lenneus ..	Dystrus ..	24 Jan. ..	29
Hierosebastus	Xanthicus ..	22 Feb. ..	30
Artemisius	Artemisius	24 Mar. ..	31
Evangelius	Daesius ..	24 Apr. ..	30
Stratonicus ..	Panemus ..	24 May ..	31
Hecatombeon	Lous	24 June ..	31
Antaeus ..	Gorpiaeus ..	25 July	30 [As. 31]
Laodicius ..	Hyperbereteus	24 [Asian 25] Aug.	31 [As. 30]

In bissextile, Lenneus has 30 days in the Asian calendar, Dystrus 30 days in the Ephesian. (Browne, Ordo Saeclorum, § 402, p. 463.)

We give here a few month-dates, some with concurrent week-days. The martyrdom of St. Polycarp (Mart. Polyc. c. 21, in Patr. Apost.; Hefele, p. 220, ed. 1842; comp. Euseb. H. E. iv. 15) gives as the date of the martyrdom 2 Xanthicus = vii. Kal. Mart. (but Vet. Lat. vii. Kal. Mart.), σαββάτῳ μεγάλῳ—a statement beset with difficulties, discussed by Ussher, in l.; Vales, in. l. Eus.; Noris, u. s.; Pagi, a. 167; Ideler, i. 419; Ordo Saeclorum, § 417; Clinton, Fasti Rom. a. 166. The like difficulties attach to the date given in the Mart. S. Pionii, c. 2 (Ruinart, Acta Mart. p. 140), where the Natale of St. Polycarp is also placed on the "Great Sabbath," and this is said to have fallen in the year 251, on iv. id. Mart. the second day of the seventh Asian month (Ordo Saecl. § 478). The latter date belongs to a generalised calendar, in which the months are numbered, not named. In this the first month corresponds to Dius, and therefore the seventh to Artemisius. It continued in use long afterwards—as may be seen in a paschal discourse included among the Spuria Opp. St. Chrysost. t. viii. 284 (A.D. 672–5, explained by Usher). In Eusebius, de Martyr. Palaest. app. to H. E. viii., are nine double dates, some with concurrent week-days; these, also attended with difficulties, are discussed in Ordo Saecl. § 479. Here the calendar is that τῶν Ἑλλήνων, ἤτοι Σύρων, in which the Macedonian months are absolutely identical with the Julian:

1 Thoth	= 29 Aug.	1 Pharmuthi	= 27 Mar.
1 Phaophi	= 28 Sept.	1 Pachon	= 26 Apr.
1 Athyr	= 28 Oct.	1 Payni	= 26 May.
1 Choeak	= 27 Nov.	1 Epiphi	= 25 June.
1 Tybi	= 27 Dec.	1 Mesori	= 25 July.
1 Mechir	= 26 Jan.	1 Epagomenae	= 24 Aug.
1 Phamenoth	= 25 Feb.	(Ordo Saecl. § 401, p. 466.)

Of this form, in earlier times, were variously modified the calendar of the Arabians (Bostra?), Gaza, Ascalon, Cappadocia, Salamis (in Cyprus). For the discussion of these matters it must suffice here to refer to Ideler's Handbuch u. s. and his authorities.

This multiplicity of month-reckonings was felt, the more the Roman world was Christianized, to be incompatible with the requirements of the church; and, before the close of our period, with the exception of Copts, Aethiopians (Abyssinians), and (partially) Armenians, whose year is still of the Alexandrine form, all the churches had accepted the Julian method (with or without the Roman names), according to which January, March, May, July, August, October, December have each 31 days, February 28, in leap year 29, and each of the remaining four months, 30 days. The established Roman notation by calends, nones and ides, inconvenient and absurd as it seems to us, was long retained—so long, in fact, as Latin continued to be the only written language in the West. Attempts, indeed, were made to intro-

24 Dystrus, ix kal. Apr. [= 24 Mar.]
2 Xanthicus, iv. non Apr. [= 2 Apr.] ἡμέρᾳ παρασκευῆς.
20 Dius. xii kal. Dec. [= 20 Nov.] προσαββάτου ἡμέρᾳ.
2 Xanthicus, u. s. ἐν αὐτῇ κυριακῇ ἡμέρᾳ.

This mode of reckoning is of frequent occurrence, especially in connexion with the Era of the Seleucidae. Thus, in the heading of the acts of the Council of Nice stands "year 636 from Alexander [= Ae. Sel.], in the month Daesius, 19th day, the xiii. Kal. Jul." [i. e. 19th June, A.D. 325]. Evagrius, the ecclesiastical historian, uses it, as does John Malala, historian of Antioch, and also the Paschal Chronicle; and, as may be seen in Assemani (Bibl. Orient.), it constantly occurs in dated epigraphs to Syriac MSS. In Epiphanius (Haer. li. 24; p. 446 Petav.), we have an accumulation of correspondences. Christ, he says, was born 6th Jan., which is 6 Maemakterion of Athenians (Ideler, i. 361), 6 Audynaeus "of the Greeks, i.e. Syrians," 11 Tybi of the Egyptians (=Alexandrians), 14 Julus of the Paphians, 5 of the 5th month of the Salaminians, 13 Atarta of Cappadocians. The Lord's baptism he dates 8th November, which is 7 Metageitnion of Athenians (Ideler, u. s.), 8 Dius "of Greeks, i.e. Syrians," 16 Apellaeus of Macedonians, 12 Athyr of Egyptians (Alexandrians), 16 Apogonieus of Paphians, 6 Choeak of Salaminians, 15 Aratata of Cappadocians.

The fixed Alexandrian year—twelve months of thirty days each, with the five epagomenae at the year's end (24–28 Aug.), and a sixth at the end of each fourth year, so arranged that the year always began (1 Thoth) on 29th August—stood its ground against the Julianized Syro-Macedonian year, and is still retained by Copts, Abyssinians, and (some) Armenians. This calendar runs as follows:

duce the regular numerical count of month-days, as by Gregory the Great at the close of the 6th century. Of earlier times, there is a fragment of a Gothic calendar (4th century) in which the month-days are numbered (Mai, Script. Vet. Nov. Collect. v. i. 66). In the Byzantine church, the numerical way of dating began to be used in the 7th century. It appears, together with the old way, in the Paschal Chronicle; but in the same century the emperor Heraclius, in a chronological writing of his, keeps to the old method, which continues to be used in numerous πασχάλια of later times; Georgius Syncellus (end of 8th century) employs only the new reckoning. MOON. The moon does not appear in Aringhi's 'Index of Christian Symbols,' nor does the present writer know of her being used as a Christian emblem until the 6th century, when the crucifixion began to be a common subject of representation, and the sun and moon of course formed a part of it. [See CRUCIFIX.] The latter appears as a crescent or female figure, or as either, holding or containing the other, or as a face. In the crucifixion of the Laurentian MS. she is a crescent within a round disk, and there is a very singular picture in tab. v. of that MS. (Assemani Catalog. Bibl. Medic.) of a partial and total eclipse of the sun, which seems to represent the moon as a white disk and face, and also as a black disk marked with the crescent. See the crosses and ivory plaque, Mozzoni, sec. 8. The associations of Asiatic and Egyptian paganry may easily account for the omission of the moon from Christian art for the first three or four centuries. The Mithraic worships prevalent in Rome in the earlier centuries must have included the moon as well as the sun. See the Abbé Auber's Symbolisme Religieux, vol. i. p. 169. Even in the many arabesques of vaultings in Bosio's plates, the writer can find no use of the disk or the crescent as ornament, though in the earlier basilicas and memorial churches, where roofs were sown with stars (as notably in the chapel of Galla Placidia at Ravenna), the moon may also have occurred. The great Apocalyptic mosaics would allow the presence of the sun and moon in the Lord's hand; as also some Old-Testament subjects, as the 5th-century mosaic of Joshua in Sta. Maria Maggiore at Rome, the Vienna Greek MS. of Genesis (4th or 5th century) in a dream of Joseph (D'Agincourt, pl. xix., and compare Vatican Virgil, pl. xx.). But they seem to have been held in earlier times to be a part of the idolatrous symbolism against which Tertullian protested so decidedly in his treatise 'De Idololatria'; and to have been necessarily banished from the Christian Church wherever there was danger of confounding pagan rites with her own. The moon does not occur in Garrucci's or Buonarotti's Vetri. The classical enthusiasm of the Carlovingian period, both English and Frank, seems to have accepted solar and lunar imagery with equal readiness, both being now fully allowed in the crucifixions and Apocalyptic pictures. The former Saxon worship of sun and moon seems to have haunted the minds of northern Christianity very little, and the symbols of both seem to have been so freely used in crucifixions as to be considered safe anywhere. Sometimes personifications occur, such as those in the Cottonian Aratus (B. Mus. Tiberius, B. 5; Westwood, Anglo-Saxon and Irish MSS. pl. 48). There is a very interesting miniature of chariots of the sun and moon in Count Vivian's Bible, middle 9th century (Bastard, Peintures des Manuscrits, vol. ii; see woodcut), and a Franco-Saxon MS. in the same volume contains a crucifixion with a crescented Diana's head, as moon, on a medallion.

From the Bible of Count Vivian.

It seems impossible to connect Egyptian lunar symbolisms of the Horus and Isis with any Christian emblem. But a two-fold allegory was connected with the idea of the moon from the days of Augustine at least. He speaks of her as representing the church (Enarr. in Ps. x.), "Luna in allegoria significat ecclesiam, quod ex parte spiritali lucet ecclesia, ex parte autem carnali obscura est. Alii dicunt non habere luna am lumen proprium, sed a sole illustrari. Ergo luna intelligitur ecclesia, quod suum lumen non habeat, sed ab Unigenito Dei Filio, qui multis locis in SS. allegoriae sol appellatus est, illustratur." One of the latest and most beautiful repetitions or echoes of this idea is the well-known passage in the 'Christian Year, beginning "The moon above, the church below.

The presence of the sun and moon in crucifixions may be accounted for as representing the darkness which prevailed at the Lord's death; but it seems that it gave occasion in later days to the idea of the moon's representing the synagogue, or Hebrew church. St. Gregory the Great takes her to represent the frailty and decay of the flesh (In Evang. S. Lucae, Hom. 2.)

The Turkish use of the crescent after 1463 was the adoption of the ancient symbol of the city of Byzantium, which was probably more welcome to them as unconnected with any Christian association. It is found on Byzantine coins (Mionnet, Descr. des Médailles, vol. i. p. 378), and dates from a repulse given to Philip of

MOON, SUPERSTITIUOS OBSERVANCE OF. The practice of blowing horns, shouting, and so on, during eclipses of the moon, to defend those doing it from witchcraft, was well-known to the nations of antiquity. Juvenal (Satir. vi. 442) refers to it:

> "Jam nemo tubas, nemo aera fatiget:
> Una laboranti poterit subcurrere lunae."

It was an old custom therefore, which lingered on long after the introduction of Christianity, and was reprehended by more than one of the fathers. A sermon attributed to St. Augustine (Serm. 215, De Tempore) details, in order to denounce and forbid, this among other superstitious practices. Ducange quotes a MS. Poenitential, which says: "Si observasti traditiones paganorum, quas quasi haereditario jure, diabolo subministrante usque in hos dies patres filiis reliquerunt, id est, ut elementa, colores, lunam, solem, aut stellarum cursum, novam lunam, aut defectum lunae, ut tuis clamoribus aut auxilio splendorem ejus restaurare, valeres," etc. And in a Life of St. Eligius (c. 15) we find: "Nullus si quando luna obscuratur, vociferare praesumat, quia Deo jubente certis temporibus obscuratur." The practice seems, indeed, to have been common to all savage nations, and not to have died out in Europe up to the ninth century. [Compare NEW MOON.] [S. J. E.]

MOPSUESTIA, COUNCIL OF (Mopsuestenum Concilium), held by order of the emperor Justinian, A.D. 550, to make enquiry whether the name of Theodore, formerly bishop of Mopsuestia, whose writings were comprised in the celebrated three chapters afterwards condemned by the fifth council, had ever been on the sacred diptychs or not. Its acts are preserved in the fifth session of that council. (Mansi, ix. 150 and 274–17.) [E. S. Ff.]

MORGENGABE (German). A gift by a husband to his wife on the day after marriage. Gregory of Tours (Hist. Franc. ix. 20) says of it, "tam in dote, quam in morgengabe, hoc est, matutinali dono, certum est adaequasse" (Macri Hierolex. s. v.). [C.]

MORLAIX, COUNCIL OF (Marlacense Concilium), held at Morlaix in the diocese of Toul, or Marle, near Paris, A.D. 677, under king Theodoric, whose ordinance relating to it is extant; when Chramlin, bishop of Embrun, was deposed, and at which Mansi thinks St. Leodegar or Leger exhibited his last will and testament (xi. 163 and 171). MORNING PRAYER. [HOURS OF PRAYER; OFFICE, THE DIVINE.]

MORTAL AND VENIAL SINS. The first among the early Christian writers who makes such a distinction is Tertullian. He ranks among capital sins—idolatry, blasphemy, murder, adultery, violation, false witness, fraud, which seven he fancifully connects with the sevenfold dipping in the river Jordan: "Septem maculis capitalium delictorum inhorrerent, idololatria, blasphemia, homicidio, adulterio, stupro, falso testimonio, fraude" (Adv. Marcion. lib. iv. cap. 9). Similarly, in De Idololatriâ, cap. 1. And in De Patientiâ, cap. 5, after a similar list, he adds: "Haec ut principalia penes Dominum delicta." (This word delicta is, apparently, with him, a general term for offences, and dependent on the particular appellative adjoined to it for the degree of gravity to be attached to its meaning. In St. Augustine and later writers, on the contrary, it is used by itself for grave crimes. See Pamelius's comment on this passage, p. 147, n. 40.) In the same manner he ranks among the number of daily or little sins anger, evil speaking, a blow struck, a vain oath, a failure to fulfil a promise, a lie caused by shame or necessity: "Quod sint quaedam delicta quotidianae incursionis quibus omnes simus objecti. Cui enim non accidit, aut irasci inique, e ultra solis occasum, aut et manum immittere, aut facile maledicere, aut temere jurare, aut fidem pacti destruere, aut verecundia aut necessitate mentiri? In negotiis, in officiis, in quaestu, in victu, in visu, in auditu, quanta tentamur, ut si nulla sit venia istorum, nemini salus competat. Sunt autem et contraria istis, ut graviora et exitiosa, quae veniam non capiant, homicidium, idololatria, fraus, negatio, blasphemia, utique et moechia et fornicatio, et si qua alia violatio templi Dei" (De Pudicit. c. 19). And he draws the distinction sharply between the great and the small in cap. 18, "quae aut levioribus delictis veniam ab episcopo consequi poterit, aut majoribus et irremissibilibus a Deo solo." As to penance there was a milder party and a more rigid; the latter maintaining that no "locus poenitentiae" should be allowed to certain classes of offenders; and this difference of opinion was one of the causes of the Novatian and other schisms. [PENITENCE.]

St. Cyprian calls adultery, fraud, murder, mortal crimes ("adulterium, fraus, homicidium, mortale crimen est") (De Bono Patientiae, c. 5). Origen declares that there are mortal sins which are not in the rank of great sins (Hom. xv. in Levit.); but there is a doubt whether the passage should be read culpa mortalis or moralis. In his sixth commentary on St. Matthew, he mentions evil speaking, lying, idle words, intemperance, as slighter sins, and such as murder and adultery as greater.

St. Augustine distinguishes more accurately three classes of sins: "There are some sins so great that they are to be punished with excommunication; there are others for which this remedy is not necessary, but they may be healed by the medicines of chastisements; and, lastly, there are some which are very light, from which no man is free in this life, for which we have left us a daily cure in that prayer, Forgive us our trespasses," etc.—"nisi essent quaedam ita gravia, ut etiam excommunicatione plectenda sint, non diceret apostolus; congregatis vobis et meo spiritu, tradere ejusmodi hominem Satanae, etc. Item nisi essent quaedam non eâ humilitate poenitentiae sananda, quales in ecclesia datur eis qui proprie poenitentes vocantur, sed quibusdam correptionum medicamentis, non diceret ipse Dominus, Corripe inter te et ipsum solum, etc. Postremo, nisi essent quaedam, sine quibus haec vita non agitur, non quotidianam medelam poneret in oratione quam docuit, ut dicamus, Dimitte nobis debita nostra" (De Fide et Operibus, cap. 26). Many other passages might be quoted from this father, and all to the same effect. To the above may be added that St. Gregory (Moral. lib. xii. c. 9) distinguishes between peccatum and crimen, as does St. Augustine, making the first to mean such sins as are forgiven daily, upon repentance and prayer; and the second to mean flagrant crimes, to be punished by public penance. The general conclusions to be drawn from these and other declarations may be stated thus:

That all sins were deadly to the soul: not merely those called great, mortal, capital, or deadly sins, but also those known as small, light, or venial. These St. Augustine, in the treatise last quoted, goes on to say, destroy the soul by reason of their number. They are like the small drops which fill a river, or the grains of sand which, although they are small individually, will oppress and weigh us down; or as the bilge of a ship which, if neglected, will swamp the vessel as surely as the greatest wave, "by long entering and never being drained."

That it was not all mortal or deadly sins, but only sins of a public and heinous nature, which gave public scandal, that were put to public penance for a longer or shorter time. St. Gregory Nyssen, in his Letter to Letoius, gives a list of such publicly punished sins, among which he mentions idolatry, Judaism, Manichaeism and heresy, magic, witchcraft, and divination; adultery and fornication; public and violent robbery, and murder. All these might be put to penance of various degrees, and then the offender might be re-admitted; but it would seem that penance was permitted only once, and that there were a multitude of other sins for which public penance was not imposed, which were, nevertheless, entirely distinguished from venial or less grave offences.

Idolatry was considered, in the early church, the greatest of all sins. A letter found among the works of St. Cyprian, and purporting to be from the clergy of Rome to him, calls it "grande delictum. Ingens et supra omnia peccatum" (Ep. 31); and Cyprian, in a letter to his own clergy, agrees that it is "summum delictum"—the sin against the Holy Ghost, which he who commits "non habebit remissam, sed reus est aeterni peccati" (Ep. 10). But here he is speaking of apostates.

The councils do not, apparently, treat of this distinction specifically. There are many provisions as to the degree of penance for particular offences, but no attempt at a general classification. But yet they recognized this distinction between classes of sins, which, indeed, was one that could not be overlooked. The Council of Agde (A.D. 506) forbade the excommunication of persons for slight causes (can. 3). Similarly, the fifth council of Orleans, c. 2 (A.D. 549), has a provision that no person of right faith should be cut off from communion for slight causes, but only for those offences deemed worthy of excommunication by the fathers [EXCOMMUNICATION; PENITENCE]. Bingham refers to a similar provision made by the Council of Clermont in its second canon, but this is, apparently, an error. [S. J. E.]

MORTIFICATION (mortificatio, νέκρωσις). Under this head it is intended to give some account of the practices adopted at various times by Christians, to "mortify" or deaden "their members which are upon the earth." A general account of the progress of ascetic ideas has already been given under ASCETICISM.

I. MORTIFICATION IN REGARD TO BATHING, CLOTHES, SHELTER, REST, AND FOOD.—To cast ashes upon the head, to abstain from bathing and even from washing, to lie on the bare ground, to wear dirty and ragged clothing—all these were methods of mortification practised by various ascetics. Jerome, for instance (Epist. 77 ad Ocean. c. 4), describes the dishevelled hair, the sallow face, the dirty hands, the unclean neck, of Fabiola performing her penance; of himself he says (Epist. 22 ad Eustoch. c. 7) that his limbs were scarred and rough with the use of sackcloth, while his unwashed skin was black as that of an Ethiopian; and again (Epist. 14 ad Heliod. c. 10) he asks, what need there can be for one who is washed in Christ ever to wash again? Palladius (Lausiaca, cc. 142, 143) relates of the anchoret Sylvania, that for sixty years she never washed, except her hands for the reception of the Eucharist. Even at a much earlier period, Hegesippus relates of St. James the Just (in Euseb. H. E. ii. 23) that he neither anointed himself with oil nor used the bath. Several of the early rules of nuns, as those of Augustine (c. 12), Caesarius (c. 29), Leander (c. 10), discourage the use of the bath, as an indulgence only to be granted to sick persons. Jerome refers (Epist. 77, c. 2) to Fabiola's deliberate preference of the poorest and meanest clothes to robes of silk, and (Epist. 54 ad Furium, c. 7) deliberately lays down the principle, that the fouler a penitent is, the fairer is he—"poenitens quo faedior, eo pulchrior." Some ascetics allowed the hair to grow unkempt and uncared for; on the other hand, the cutting off the hair of the head was practised as an ascetic disfigurement, a very wide-spread custom, as an indication of mourning [HAIR, WEARING OF, p. 755; TONSURE]. It was naturally a special mortification for women; in the 4th century (A.D. 370) the Council of Gangra (c. 17) anathematizes women who cut off their hair from mistaken asceticism. At about the same period Jerome (Epist. 147 ad Sabinianum) testifies that virgins or widows on entering a nunnery offered their hair to be cut off by the superior. Optatus of Mileve (de Schism. Donat. i. 6) and Ambrose (ad Virg. Lapsam, c. 8) blame the custom, which evidently existed in the Western as well as the Eastern churches, of nuns cutting their hair on entrance into a convent. In the capitularies of Charles the Great (vii. c. 310) the cutting off the hair is only prescribed for penitents. Somewhat different from the purely ascetic view is the cutting off her hair by a woman to avoid the love of a particular person (Isidore of Pelusium, Epist. ii. 53; compare Mabillon, Acta SS. Bened. ii. 592).

The early Christian Fathers earnestly protest, as is natural and right, against luxury and ostentation in dress; but the fury of asceticism sometimes went far beyond all moderation. Some fanatics passed their lives in absolute nakedness, like that hermit of the Sketic Desert, the sight of whom convinced Macarius that he had not attained the highest pitch of ascetic austerity; the Βοσκοὶ or "Grazers" were probably not very far removed from this state (Sozom. H. E. vi. 33; Evagrius, i. 21). Sulpicius Severus (Dial. i. 17) mentions a monk of Sinai who for fifty years had no other clothing than his own hair; and the like is reported of Ordanius and Sophronius, and many others. In the West too, similar aberrations are recorded; the famous Spanish monk Fructuosus († 675), for instance, is said to have lived for a long period of penance in a cave, like a wild beast (Vita S. Fructuosi, in Acta SS. April 16; ii. p. 432). A common method of producing discomfort was wearing next the skin the rough HAIRCLOTH, of which sacks were commonly made. [SACKCLOTH.]

Going barefoot was from ancient times an ascetic practice. [SHOES.]

Attempts to confine sleep and necessary rest within the narrowest possible limits have been made so long as ascetic life has been practised at all. Many of the ancient Egyptian hermits attempted to banish sleep for long periods, either by standing in prayer or by various kinds of bodily exertion. Macarius, the younger, is said to have succeeded in remaining without shelter and without sleep for twenty days and nights (Palladii Laus. c. 20, p. 722). Dorotheus the Theban carried stones all day long for the building of cells, and at night employed himself in making ropes of palm-bark, never lying down to rest (Laus. c. 2). The "adamantine" Origen attempted to banish sleep by hard study. The monks of Tabennae, under the rule of Pachomius (art. 59), slept in a kind of coffin, so arranged that they were unable to lie down at full length; others, mentioned by Cassian (Collat. i. 23; xviii. 1; Instit. iv. 13), used for beds only mats (mattae, ψιαθοι) of reeds or straw. The more rigorous ascetics lay on the bare ground; thus Jerome says of himself (Epist. 22, ad Eustoch. c. 7), that when sleep crept over him in spite of himself, he dashed his skeleton frame on the ground; and Paulinus tells us of St. Martin of Tours (Vita, iv. 72) that the bare ground sufficed for his light slumbers. Nor were the feebler sex wanting in such austerities; Gregory of Nazianzus tells us (Orat. 11 [al. 8], c. 13) how his sister Gorgonia laid her tender limbs on the ground; and Jerome glorifies his friend Paula (Epist. 108, c. 15) for refusing the indulgence of a bed even in severe fever, and choosing to sleep on the hard earth, with sackcloth spread under her. Benedict allowed for his monks (Regula, c. 55) a mat, a blanket, a rug, and a pillow (matta, sagum, laena, et capitale); they were to sleep in their clothes and girdles (Reg. c. 22). Benedict's rule furnished the general type of monkish bedding for many generations. In all monasteries sleep was abbreviated by the necessity of rising for the offices of the night or early morning [HOURS OF PRAYER; VIGILS].

custom of living without any habitation began, as was natural, in those regions of where for the greater part of the year it is ible to pass the night in the open air without k. Theodoret (Hist. Rel.) gives many examples hermits of Syria, Palestine, Arabia, and Mesotamia, who spent their lives in the manner of John the Baptist in the wilderness. Even omen endured this rude life, as Marana and Cyra (Theod. H. R. c. 29), and the probably fabulous Mary of Egypt, who is said (Rosweyd's Vitae Patrum, i. 18, p. 388) to have passed forty-seven years in the wilderness to the east of Jordan without the shelter of a roof and without intercourse with mankind. Many ascetics exposed themselves on bare rocks or peaks of mountains, or on pillars built for the purpose, to the heat of the sun and to all the winds of Heaven. Pillar saints were divided into στυλῖται and κιονῖται, the former of whom lived on the bare platform which formed the capital of the pillar, while the latter had a hut constructed for shelter. Some hermits lived on trees (δενδρῖται), as Addas of Mesopotamia (Moschus, Pratum Spirit. c. 70); many lived in caves (σπηλαιῶται), as the Egyptian monks Elias, Pityrion, Solomon, Dorotheus, Capito, and Elpidius (Palladius, Laus. cc. 51, 74, 96–99); some submitted to be walled up in their narrow dwellings (χωστοί, ἐγκλειστοι, reclusi), as Salamanus (Theod. H. R. c. 19) and Macarius Romanus (Vita, c. 21, in Rosweyd Vitae Patrum, p. 230); the latter believed that he continued at least three years in this condition, but the whole narrative shews a disordered mind. In the more rigorous climate of Western Europe the kind of exposure which is possible in Egypt and Palestine was soon discovered to be destructive to life; hence in this region even cave-dwellers are comparatively rare; hermits could not exist without some kind of shelter, however scanty. Recluses were, however, not very uncommon.

Insufficient or distasteful food is a very common form of mortification. For the principal ecclesiastical prescriptions as to time and manner of fasting, see FASTING, LENT, STATIONES. With regard to the fasting of professed ascetics, we may remark that a much greater rigour of abstinence is possible in the milder regions of the East than in our ruder climate. Several Eastern ascetics lived wholly on uncooked food, as (e.g.) Ammonius (Hist. Lausiaca. c. 12, p. 716; Apollo, ib. c. 52, p. 742). The principal founders of Eastern Monachism—Anthony, Hilarion, and Pachomius—were men of excessively mortified life; the latter was taught by his master, Palaemon, to maintain life on bread and salt alone, without oil or wine (Vita, c. 6, in Rosweyd, p. 115); but they did not seek to compel their monks to emulate their own austerity. Pachomius forbade his monks to use wine and "liquamen," but he allowed them daily, at least, one meal of cooked food, with rations of bread, that they might be able to endure their labour (Vita, c. 22). Flesh meat was in no case included in the viands—not an insupportable hardship in the climate of Egypt; the bread was the "paximatium"*—the twice baked bread or biscuit—which Cassian (Collat. ii. 19) informs us was the usual food of the Egyptian hermits of his time. The daily allowance for a monk was (according to Cassian) two cakes of this bread, weighing together about a pound troy. On fast days only half this allowance was issued. In Lent we read of some of the monks of Tabennae fasting for two, three, or even five days without intermission. The younger Macarius is said to have taken no more than four or five ounces of bread daily (Lausiaca,

c. 20, p. 722); Hilarion to have lived from his thirty-first to his thirty-fifth year on a daily allowance of about six ounces of barley bread (Jerome, Vita Hil. c. 6); Marcianus of Cyrus, on the Euphrates, to have taken no other food in a day than his evening meal of three ounces of bread (Theodoret, Hist. Rel. c. 3). In a colder and damper climate such excessive abstinence was, of course, impracticable. "We are Gauls," said the monks of St. Martin (Sulpic. Severus, Dial. i. 4, § 6), "and it is inhuman to compel us to live like angels." Such considerations probably compelled Benedict, in drawing up his statutes for the monastery of Monte Cassino, to content himself with a moderate dietary; the scanty portion of bread on which an exceptional person like Macarius subsisted was not to be the rule for a whole community. He allowed (Reg. c. 39) a pound of bread for each man per day, with two different "made dishes" (cocta duo pulmentaria), that if any man could not eat the one he might take the other. When fruit or fresh pulse was to be had, a third course of these might be added. In case of unusually hard labour, the abbat might order a more generous diet. The flesh of four-footed beasts was altogether forbidden, except for the sick and infirm; fish and fowl were allowed With regard to wine, Benedict believed that one "hemina"—about half an English pint—of wine per day was sufficient for each man; but, though he allowed this, he evidently preferred total abstinence (Reg. c. 40). The rule of St. Benedict became the standard of Western monachism. which, however, constantly tended to fall away from the severity of its first estate, and was from time to time recalled to its old rigour, or even more than its old rigour, by such reformers as Benedict of Aniane.

Abstinence from wine was commonly practised by ascetics. Clement of Alexandria (Strom. vii. c. 6, p. 850) deprecates the use of wine by the Christian sage, and he does also that of flesh; abstinence from wine is one of the practices which Eusebius (H. E. vi. 3, § 12) mentions as having injured the health of the ascetic Origen. Some of the Gnostic sects abstained altogether from wine, and the Encratites, in particular, thought it the "blood of the evil spirit."

II. SPECIAL KINDS OF MORTIFICATION.—1. Use of the Cross. Among the methods of mortification must be included the stamping or impressing crosses on the flesh in a painful manner, the expanding the arms in the attitude of one crucified, and the bearing a heavy cross of wood.

The first of these may perhaps have originated from a literal interpretation of the expression of St. Paul (Gal. vi. 17), "I bear in my body the marks (στίγματα) of the Lord Jesus." St. Rhadegund († 587), to take one instance, to give vividness to her conception of the Passion, used to lay a metal cross, heated in the fire, on various parts of her body (Venant. Fort. Vita, iii. c. 21). To be "crucified with Christ" has sometimes been attempted by rapt enthusiasts in the most literal sense. But a more common kind of self-torture was that of standing with outstretched arms, in the attitude of one crucified. This was practised within our period, both as a form of ordeal (stare vel vadere ad crucem) and as a part of monastic discipline. The way of applying the former, seems to have been that accuser and accused took their stand in the cruciform attitude, and the one who first dropped his arms was adjudged to have failed to prove the charge or to vindicate his innocence, as the case might be. Thus, in a matrimonial case, husband and wife were ordered "exire ad crucem" (Capit. Vermeri. 17; Baluze, Capitularia, i. 184). The remaining for long periods with the arms expanded, as a form of penance, originally a merely monastic practice, was introduced in the 8th century by the rule of Chrodegang into the canonical life. St. Lambert (about A.D. 700) is said to have nearly lost his life in consequence of having been compelled to stand in the attitude of one crucified against a stone cross, in the court of his monastery, during a cold winter's night (Vita S. Lamberti in Canisius, Var. Lectt. II. i. p. 140). St. Austreberta is related (Vita, § 15, in Acta SS. Feb. 10) to have endured a similar penance. More particular precepts as to this matter belong to a later age. Cassian († c. 445) mentions (Collat. viii. 3) certain Egyptian ascetics who carried about with them a heavy cross of wood; a practice which, he says, occasioned more laughter than respect. The practice seems to have become more common in the Middle Ages.

2. The practice of wearing chains or rings of iron, which has existed among Brahmins and Buddhists from a high antiquity, is found also in the Christian Church. Gregory of Nazianzus (Carm. 47) mentions monks who labour under never-ceasing iron fetters, wearing away the evil of their nature as their flesh is worn away. Epiphanius (Expositio Fidei, Opp. i. 1106 d) blames monks who went about in public with neck-rings of iron; and Jerome (Epist. 22 ad Eustochium) bids his friend beware of those who went about barefoot, laden with chains, with long hair and beard and dirty black mantle, to be seen of men. The hermit Apollo in the Thebaid wore chains, as Rufinus (Vitae Patr. i. 7) informs us; Theodoret cannot say too much of those chain-wearers, whose story he tells in the Historia Religiosa. The well-known Symeon of the Pillar was for some time chained to the rock on which he lived by a long chain fixed to his foot; afterwards, on his pillar, he wore for thirty years a heavy chain hanging from his neck; his iron collar, the historian Evagrius (Hist. Eccl. c. 13) says that he had seen with his own eyes. Many other instances of men wearing heavy chains or rings may be seen in Theodoret's Historia Religiosa. See also the accounts of the Abbat Senoch of Tours, in Gregory of Tours (Vitas Patr. c. 15), and of St. Radegund (Vita, iii. c. 21).

From the 6th century onward we find the wearing of chains and the like prescribed as a penance. Homicides of their own kindred were sentenced either to an oppressive weight of chains, or to wear an iron band round the body made from the blade of the sword with which the homicide was committed. This punishment Gregory of Tours (de Gloria Conf. c. 87) tells us was endured by a fratricide, who also bore heavy chains. Charlemagne (Capit. Aquisgran. c. 77, in Baluze, i. 239) in 789 thought it necessary to issue a caution against vagrants who went about in irons (nudi cum ferro) which they pretended to wear for penance sake. Unchaste priests were not uncommonly sentenced to wear rings or hoops of iron round their arms or bodies.

3. Bodily Pain and Disfigurement. The voluntary self-wounding of the Baal priests and other pagan hierophants was not altogether unknown in the Christian Church, though it had a less orgiastic character. Theophilus, bishop of Antioch, in his Epistola Synodica to the bishops of Palestine and Cyprus (Hieron. Opp. i. 543, ed. Vallarsi), reprobates the conduct of some who, he says, mutilated themselves with the knife, thinking that they shewed religion and humility in going about with scarred forehead and cropped ears; one man had even bitten off a part of his tongue, to reprove the timidity with which some served God. Ammonius the monk cut off one of his ears and threatened to bite out his tongue; but this was not from ascetic motives, but to render himself ineligible for the office of bishop. He was, however, in the habit of burning himself with a red-hot iron from pure asceticism (Pallad. Hist Lausiaca, c. 12, p. 716). Another Nitrian monk, the younger Macarius, is said to have exposed his naked body for six months to the stings of venomous flies to atone for the anger and impatience with which he had once crushed a fly that stung him (Laus. c. 20, p. 722); and Symeon, the pillar-saint, to have allowed vermin to eat into his body for a considerable time (Vita, c. 7, in Rosweyd, p. 172). The Greek Menologion (Jan. 4) relates that St. Apollinaris of Egypt used to expose herself to the stings of gnats and gadflies; and Johannes Moschus (Pratum Spirituale, c. 141) voluntarily exposed himself to the stings of the countless insects of the hot Jordan valley, thinking so to escape the never-dying worm and the flame that is not quenched. A sister of the famous nunnery of St. Bridget at Kildare is said to have burned her feet over a fire which she had secretly lighted in her cell (Vita S. Brigitae, c. 11, in Surius, Feb. 1). Martinianus scorched his whole body in the flames of a fire of sticks, with a view of counteracting unlawful passion. And these are but specimens taken from the crowd of records of self-torture which may be found in various hagiologies. The discipline of the scourge will be treated separately [WHIPPING].

4. Cold. Ascetics frequently attempted to cool the burning passion which possessed them by exposure to cold. Thus the English monk Drithelm is said (Bede, H. E. v. 12) to have remained immersed in a stream during the recitation of many psalms and prayers. Of James, the disciple of Maro, it is related (Theodoret, Hist. Rel. c. 21) that during his long devotions in the open air he was sometimes so covered with snow that he had to be dug out. Similar austerities are related of many other ascetics, both male and female. Abraam of Arrhae is said (Theod. H. R. c. 17) to have held fire an altogether superfluous luxury.

5. The SPIRITUAL EXERCISES of ascetics will be noticed under that heading, and the ascetic views of continence under VIRGINITY. See also CELIBACY.

(This article is taken mainly from O. Zöckler's Kritische Geschichte der Askese, Frankfurt a. M. 1863.) [C.]

MORTMAIN. The law of mortmain which, in the English use of the term, is a law restricting the acquisition of property by permanent corporations, especially of a religious character, is based upon two distinct considerations of policy; one that of preventing property being withdrawn for ever from the general market (that is, being grasped by the "dead hand" of an artificial legal personality); the other, that of opposing obstacles to fraudulent or extortionate impositions on the part of religious advisers. There is no doubt that both these lines of policy are distinctly represented in, if not directly copied from, the Roman law at its ripest maturity, and the later legislation of Christian emperors. Ulpian (circ. A.D. 200) says "we are not permitted to appoint the gods as our heirs, with the exception of those in favour of whom either a senatus consultum, or imperial constitutions, have conceded a special privilege, as, for instance, Tarpeian Jove." The policy of this prohibition may have been the same as that by which Justinian, three centuries later, enacted that, where a testator nominated the Lord Jesus Christ as his heir or part heir and added no limiting words, the inheritance should accrue to the church of the testator's domicile; and similarly where an archangel or martyr was nominated an heir; and where there was no such church the sacred edifices of the metropolis should profit from the inheritance (L. 26 (c. I. 3)). Savigny (System, vol. ii. b. ii. c. 2) has adverted to the real meaning of this policy, which was to secure that the benefit and responsibility should be vested in concrete persons distinctly cognisable by law.

The law with respect to collegia, that is, corporate bodies consisting of at least three persons (L. 85. D L. 16), throws, perhaps, the greatest light on some of the aspects of early mortmain law. As early as A.D. 117–138, we see that collegia could not take inheritances unless they were specially privileged for this purpose (L. 8. C. (vi. 24)). A passage of Paulus (A.D. circ. 200) alludes to a senatus consultum of the time of Marcus Antoninus permitting the legacies to be made in favour of collegia, supposing the collegia were lawfully constituted (L. 20. D. xxxiv. 5)), and with respect to the constitution of these bodies it appears that a religious purpose was presumedly a legitimate object ("religionis causâ coire non prohibentur; dum tamen per hoc non fiat contra senatus consultum quo illicita corpora arcentur" (L. 1. D.(xlvii. 22)). Nevertheless, it appears from a constitution of one of the Antonines in Justinian's code that the corporate body of the Jews in Antioch was not reckoned a legal association, and could not sue for a legacy which had been left it.

As respects the claims of the Christian church to inherit, or even to own, property, it must have depended at first upon whether the local religious societies were or were not treated as legitimate collegia. Gibbon (c. xv.), indeed, adduces an interesting story, told in the life of Alexander Severus (A.D. 222–235), of a dispute in respect of land between the society of Christians and the victuallers (popinarii), as a proof that property had already legally vested in the Christian church.

But it was not till Constantine's Edict of Milan (A.D. 313), by which he restored to the Christians the property of which they had been bereft in the late persecutions, that their right of ownership in land was formally recognised. This edict prepared the way for the more celebrated one of the year A.D. 321, by which anyone "was to have full power of leaving by will whatever property he chose to the church and its governing bodies." It was within fifty years of this time that the first unmistakeable mortmain law was enacted by Valentinian the Elder (Cod. Th. xvi. 20). It forbids all sorts of ecclesiastical persons from entering on the property of widows or wards. It prevents them from acquiring any benefit from the donation of the wife of any one who, under pretext of religion, has privately joined himself to them. The whole gift is to be so completely invalid that the offending person cannot take anything from the same quarter either by gift or by testament. Any attempted gifts lapsed to the treasury.

The next law is twenty years later (Cod. Th. xvi. 28). After prescribing the conditions under which a woman may become a deaconess, it enacts that she shall make neither the church, the clergy, nor the poor her heirs. Any attempted act in violation of the law would be invalid. The following language of the law may almost be supposed to have supplied the policy and the terms of an English mortmain act. "Immo si quid ab his morienti fuerit extortum nec tacito fideicommisso aliquid clericis in fraudem venerabilis sanctionis callidâ arte aut probrosâ cujuspiam conhibentiâ deferatur: exhortes sint ab omnibus quibus inhiaverant bonis: et si quid forte per epistolam, codicillum, donationem, testamentum, quolibet denique detegitur ergo eas quas hac sanctione submovimus id nec in judicium devocetur: sed vel ex intestato is qui sibi competere intellegit, statuti hujus definitione succedat." Women offending against the law are forbidden to enter a church or to receive the communion, and any bishop not enforcing these penalties is to be deposed. About two months later this constitution was partially repealed, to the extent that deaconesses were allowed to alienate moveables in their lifetime. A controversy subsequently arose as to the true import of this repealing statute. The emperor Marcianus held that its effect was to sweep away all restrictions on dispositions in favour of the church. The merits of the controversy are lucidly expounded by Gothofred in his note to the passage in the Theodosian Code.

We have the advantage of studying this legislation in a more impressive form than is presented by the bare letter of the law. St. Ambrose writes: "Nobis etiam privatae successionis emolumenta recentibus legibus denegantur. Et nemo conqueritur. Non enim putamus injuriam qui dispendium non dolemus" (Libel. ad Rer. relat. Sym.). St. Jerome, again, writes still more explicitly: "It shames one to confess that idol-priests, mimes, charioteers, and harlots can take inheritances, and only the clergy and monks are disabled from taking them; and it is not by persecutors but by Christian princes that they are disabled. Not that I complain of the law, but I lament that we have deserved the law. Cautery is good; but how has the wound come which calls for the cautery? The cautery of the law is provident and safe; and yet even thus our avarice is not restrained, but by secret trusts we evade the law" (Ep. 2, ad Nepot.). A curious allusion to the current legislation is also contained in a letter of Gregory Nazianzen, in which he beseeches Aërius and Alypius to pay the legacy left by their mother to the church. He says, Τοὺς ἔξω βίβλους νόμους τοῖς ἡμετέροις δουλεύσατε (Ep. lxi.)

By Justinian's time the policy of restricting gifts by legacy or otherwise to religious and charitable institutions seems chiefly to have been based upon the importance of securing due deliberation and publicity. Thus a distinction was drawn by a constitution of Justinian's between gifts to religious and charitable institutions of less and of more than 500 solidi in value; only the latter requiring to be publicly registered (L. 19; C. (I. 2)). It also appears from the sixty-fifth Novel (though this novel is imperfectly preserved) that, in the case of granting immoveable property to a church, the donor or testator is required to use very precise words in order to determine for what distinct object or objects his gift was intended, whether the substance or only the income of the property was to be rendered available for them, and whether a sale was or was not to be made. It may be concluded then that all jealousy of corporate bodies as owners, and all apprehension of frauds perpetrated on weak-minded testators, were, during this period, in abeyance. The progressive triumph of the church and its prominence in civil government may likewise account for the absence of distinct mortmain legislation up to and including Charlemagne's period. The utmost aim of Charlemagne's Capitularies in this respect was to secure that religious gifts were made with sufficient deliberation. Such a precaution is contained in the capitulary of A.D. 803 (Addita ad legem Salicam), "qui res suas pro animâ suâ ad casam Dei tradere voluerit domi traditionem faciat coram testibus legitimis."

MOSAICS IN CHRISTIAN ART. — It is not the purpose of this article to enter into the history of the form of pictorial and architectural decoration known as "mosaic." Any disquisition on the origin of the art, the countries where it was first employed, its introduction into Greece and Rome, its various forms, and the names by which they were known, would be out of place here. All the information required on these and kindred topics will be found elsewhere, especially in the late Sir Digby Wyatt's excellent treatises, The Art of Mosaic, and The Geometrical Mosaics of the Middle Ages. Neither do we propose to enter on the vexed question of the orthography and derivation of the name. After all that has been written upon it the true etymology of the word "mosaic" still remains a matter of speculation, and perhaps can never be determined. Suffice it to say that by the term mosaic we understand the art of arranging small cubes or tesserae of different substances, either naturally hard or artificially hardened, and of various colours, so as to produce an ornamental pattern or a historical or symbolical picture. The materials of these tesserae were at first chiefly different coloured marbles, hard stones, pieces of brick and tile, earthenware, &c., the natural colours being used to form the pattern. Subsequently pastes of glass coloured artificially were almost exclusively employed. These, according to Sir Digby Wyatt, were "what is now generally called lavoro di smalto; i. e. mosaic composed of minute portions of silex and alumina, vitrified by heat and coloured by the addition of one of the metallic oxides."[a]

The gilt tesserae used so profusely for the background of the pictures were formed by applying two thin plates of glass with a film of gold leaf between them to a cube of earthenware, and then vitrifying the whole in a furnace.

The discovery of the mode of making these coloured tesserae of vitreous paste may be said to have created the art of mosaic decoration in the ecclesiastical form in which it is chiefly known to us. It put into the hands of the designers the power of producing all varieties of colour, from the most delicate to the most intense, essential for the truthful representation of the subjects; while its brittleness enabled them to obtain pieces of any size and shape required, at a cost far smaller than that of the precious marbles; and, "in case of deterioration from dirt or other causes, it can," as Mr. Layard has observed, "be restored and cleaned without any loss of character or detriment to the original work." (Paper read before Roy. Inst. of Brit. Arch.)

To these recommendations may be added its durability. From the nature of the substances employed mosaic pictures are practically indestructible, except by direct violence. It may be styled, in the words of Ghirlandajo, "the only painting for eternity." No form of pictorial art therefore can be regarded so suitable for the decoration of ecclesiastical buildings, in which the permanence of every detail should symbolize the perpetuity of the faith. The subdued richness of this mode of decoration, especially when gold grounds are extensively used, and at the same time its grand and solemn character when used in large masses, give mosaic an appropriateness for the ornamentation of sacred edifices which was very early appreciated. No sooner had Christianity emerged from the hiding-places of the catacombs, and been triumphantly installed by Constantine as the religion of the empire, than mosaic began to receive that amazing development which allows us truly to style it essentially a Christian art. Pliny indeed distinctly tells us that mosaic-work, which had been originally employed almost exclusively for the decoration of floors, had in his time recently passed upwards and taken possession of the vaulted ceilings, and that glass pastes had begun to be used, "pulsa . . . . ex humo pavimenta in cameras transiere, e vitro: novitium et hoc inventum." (Plin. Hist. Nat. lib. xxxvi. c. 64.) But as Kugler correctly states (Handbook of Painting: Italian Schools, part i. p. 20, note), the middle links between the small cabinet pieces of wall-mosaic, almost exclusively of a decorative character, exhibited by the fountain recesses at Pompeii and in a few examples at Rome, and the vast Christian wall-pictures, are entirely wanting. We are so entirely destitute of examples of such decoration on a large scale where we should have most looked for it, on the vaults of the Imperial Thermae, the Palace of the Caesars, or other contemporaneous edifices, that we are almost led to recognise mosaic-work as we see it in the basilicas, as a spontaneous development called forth by a newly awakened religious life," and may with him be "almost tempted to believe that historical mosaic-painting of the grander style first started into existence in the course of the 4th century, and suddenly took its wide spread, borne on the advancing tide of the triumphant Christian faith." At the commencement of the art the designers were evidently restricted by no conventional rules, but were left to follow their own genius in the selection of subjects and their arrangement. By degrees, however, a recognised system of symbolic decoration was adopted, which became stereotyped and prevailed from the 5th century onwards through the whole of southern Christendom, displaying its last examples before the final extinction of the art in the 12th century. In the vitreous wall-pictures of St. Mark's, Venice, and the mosaics of the Royal Chapel at Palermo and the cathedrals of Monreale and Cefalù in Sicily.

In the earliest mosaics the position of chief dignity, the centre of the conch of the apse, was always occupied by Christ, either standing or enthroned, supported on either hand by the apostles, St. Peter and St. Paul standing next Him, together with the patron saints and founders of the church. Subsequently the place of our Lord was usurped by the patron saint (as at St. Agnes at Rome), or by the Blessed Virgin holding the Divine Child in her lap (as at Parenzo and St. Mary in Domnica). A hand holding a crown is usually seen issuing from the clouds above the chief figure, a symbol of the Supreme Being. The river Jordan flows at the feet of Christ, separating the church triumphant above from the church militant below. In a zone below we usually find in the centre the Holy Lamb, the head surrounded with a cruciform nimbus, standing on a mount from which gush the four rivers of Paradise, symbolizing the four evangelists. Trees, usually palm trees, laden with fruit, typify the Tree of Life, while the phoenix with its radiant plumage symbolizes the soul of the Christian passing through death to a new and glorified life. On either side six sheep, types of the apostles, and through them of believers in ge ·ral, issue from the gates of the two holy cities, Jerusalem and Bethlehem. [BETHLEHEM, p. 201.] On the western face of the great arch of the apse or the arch of triumph we see at the apex a medallion bust of Christ, or the Holy Lamb, or, which is very frequent, the book with seven seals elevated on a jewelled throne. On either side are ranged angels, the evangelistic symbols, and the seven golden candlesticks in a horizontal band, the spandrels below containing the twenty-four white-robed elders of the Apocalypse offering their crowns with arms outstretched in adoration to the Lamb. In the larger basilicas, where a transept separates the nave from the apse, a second transverse arch is introduced, the face of which is also adorned with subjects taken from the Apocalypse. That at St. Praxedes (see post) represents the heavenly Jerusalem with the redeemed in long line entering the gates, which are guarded by angels.

[a] The Greek word for the tesserae or cubes of which mosaics are formed was ψηφίδες, a diminutive of ψῆφος, a pebble. In the Acts of the Second Council of Nice the destruction of the mosaic pictures by the Iconoclasts is thus described: ὅσα μὲν ἐκ ψηφίδος ὄντα ἐξώρυξαν (Labbe, Concil. vol. vii. col. 580); and again, in the order to set up sacred pictures, we read, τὰς σεπτὰς καὶ ἁγίας εἰκόνας τας ἐκ χρωμάτων καὶ ψηφίδος καὶ ἑτέρας ὕλης ἐπιτηδείως ἐχούσας (Ibid. col. 355). The mosaic wall-picture of Theodoric in the forum at Naples, the gradual disintegration of which was regarded as so ominous a sign, is described by Procopius as ἐκ ψηφίδων τινων ξυγκειμένη μικρῶν μὲν ἐσάγαν, χροιαῖς δὲ βεβαμμένων σχεδὸν τι ἁπασαις (De Bell. Goth. lib. i. c. 24). It would be hardly possible to describe a mosaic picture in more accurate language. The Saracens borrowed the name, together with the art and materials of mosaic work, from Byzantium. The Arabic term for the mosaic tesserae is fetfesis or fesfeya. "When at the commencement of the 8th century peace was concluded between Byzantium and the caliph Walid, this latter potentate stipulated for a certain quantity of fesfeya for the decoration of the new mosque at Damascus. In the middle of the 10th century also Romanus II. sent the caliph Abd-er-rhaman III. the materials for the mosaics of the Kibla in the mosque at Cordova.' (Kugler, i. p. 58, note.)

The detailed description given by Paulinus of the mosaics executed by his direction for the basilica of St. Felix and the "Basilica Fundana" at Nola early in the 5th century (Epist. ad Sever. 32) indicates points of resemblance and difference with the subsequently recognised type. The whole representation was strictly symbolical, and the human figure seems to have been rigidly excluded, so that it would speak only to the initiated. He describes the Lamb standing on the mount from which issue the four rivers typical of the Gospels, the symbol of the Father above, the lofty cross surmounted by the crown occupying the chief place, which are familiar to us in other mosaics. But, what we do not see in any existing mosaics, the Holy Spirit, under the form of a Dove, was represented as descending on the symbolic Lamb; the apostles were also depicted as doves (a symbol reproduced many centuries later in the apse of St. Clement at Rome), and in addition to the customary sheep as many goats appeared on the left of the Saviour, symbolizing the last judgment. We cannot sufficiently regret the loss of these very remarkable early works.[b]

The catacombs present very few examples of mosaic work. There are fragments of a mosaic picture of considerable size on the soffit of the arch of an arcosolium in the catacomb of St. Hermes. From the engravings given by Marchi (Monum. delle Arti Crist. Primit., tav. xlvii., described p. 257) we see that it must have been a very rude performance, the drawing bad, and the execution coarse. The portions remaining exhibit the raising of Lazarus, Daniel in the lions' den, and the paralytic carrying his bed, only differing from the ordinary catacomb frescoes in the material employed. The mosaic cubes, according to Mr. Parker (Archaeology of Rome, Catacombs, p. 110), are entirely of glass paste, not of marble. Marangoni (Cose Gentilesche, p. 461) preserves the record of an arcosolium in the cemetery of St. Callistus decorated in mosaic, with our Lord seated between St. Peter and St. Paul, also seated. Two sepulchral mosaics from the same catacomb are preserved in the sacristy of St. Mary in Trastevere, one representing birds, probably, according to Mr. Parker, of the 2nd century, the other, representing the miraculous draught of fishes, of the 3rd (Parker, u. s.

[b] Paulinus' description is given in article DOVE, vol. i. p. 676.

Mosaics, p. 3). Two mosaic busts in circular medallions, from the cemetery of St. Cyriaca, discovered in 1656, are preserved in the Chigi Library. One represents a young man, Flavius Julius Julianus, with short black hair; the other his deceased wife, Maria Simplicia Rustica. She, as one deceased, is represented in the attitude of prayer, with outstretched hands (De Rossi, Musaici Cristiani delle Chiese di Roma). Perret (vol. iv. pl. vii. No. 3) gives a mosaic fragment, depicting a fighting cock, also from a catacomb. This scanty list comprises nearly, if not quite, all the catacomb mosaics recorded.

The earliest known examples of mosaic art used for the decoration of a sacred building are those of the 4th century, which cover the waggon-roof of the circular aisle of the church of St. Constantia, in the immediate vicinity of the basilica of St. Agnes, outside the walls of Rome. There is sufficient reason to believe that this edifice was erected by Constantine the Great either as a baptistery to the adjacent basilica (BAPTISTERY, vol. i. p. 165), or after his death as a place of sepulture for his two daughters, Constantia, or Constantina, who died A.D. 354, and Helena, the wife of Julian, who died A.D. 360. As in the earliest Christian frescoes, the style of art seen in these mosaics is in no way distinguishable from pagan art of the same period. They belong essentially to the class of decorative paintings, and although those who wish to do so may read a Christian symbolism into the vintage scenes which cover the vaults, it is probable that none such was intended. "They have quite the light and gay character of ancient pagan wall decoration, and if they must be considered of Christian origin—the vine and vintage scenes having been frequently adopted as Christian emblems—they are probably the earliest Christian wall-mosaics that have been preserved" (Dr. Appell, Christian Mosaic Pictures, p. 6). These mosaics form twelve equal compartments, the opposite bays having analogous decorations. The ground of the whole is white, instead of the blue or gold which subsequently universally prevailed. Bays 1, 2, 12 have ordinary geometrical designs with octagons and crosses without flowers or figures. Bays 3, 11 have intertwined arabesque wreaths forming small compartments framing airy dancing figures, winged amorini, and richly plumaged birds. Bays 4, 10 contain vintage scenes. Little genii are actively engaged, some gathering grapes, some carting them home, some treading the wine-press. One holds a writhing snake. Birds are fluttering among the branches or pecking the grapes from the vine which gracefully trails over the vault. In the centre is a female bust, perhaps intended for Constantia. (Woodcut No. 2.) (It may be remarked that scenes very similar to these adorn the magnificent red porphyry sarcophagus of Constantia which stood here, now in the Vatican.) Bays 5, 9 are very similar to bays 3, 11. Bays 6, 8, are far the richest of the whole. The vault is covered with boughs of olive and other fruit-bearing trees, with peacocks, guinea fowls, partridges, and other birds interspersed among them, without any attempt at conventionalism. Bay 7, which was probably the most elaborate of the whole, has been modernised. The two side apses (a) (b) contain coarse, ill-drawn mosaics of a much later time (added by pope Hadrian A.D. 772–798), representing Christ and some of the apostles, the latter crouching in distorted attitudes, in defiance of anatomical possibilities. The contrast between the joyous freedom of the earlier designs and the grim melancholy of the later is so marked that it is difficult to conceive how they can have been so frequently attributed to the same period.

So widespread and complete has been the destruction of the earlier mosaics that the only other work which can be with any probability referred to the time of Constantine is that which decorates the cupola of the church of St. George at Salonika, the ancient Thessalonica. This church is on sufficient grounds assigned by MM. Texier and Pullan to the first sojourn of Constantine at Thessalonica (323). It is a circular building, covered with a dome more than 216 feet in circumference entirely lined with mosaics of the most magnificent character, probably the most extensive work of the kind in superficial area that has come down to us. According to the authorities just quoted this mosaic, which is one of the very few that has survived the fury of the Iconoclasts or of the Mahommedans, covers no less than 9,732 square feet, and it has been calculated to contain more than 36,000,000 tesserae. The light and fanciful architectural designs, vividly recalling the wall frescoes of the Baths of Titus or those at Pompeii, which are so markedly absent from the majority of the Christian mosaics furnish an unmistakeable evidence of its early date. The drawing, though conventional and architectonic, is good, the arrangement exceedingly dignified, the colouring rich and harmonious, and the whole effect of the cupola, with its gold ground, extremely gorgeous. The cupola is divided into eight compartments, alternately repeating each other in general design. They present a series of sacred edifices of fantastic architecture, veiled with purple curtains floating in the wind, with richly plumaged birds,—peacocks, ibises, ducks, partridges, curlews, doves, &c.,—perched on the friezes, which are themselves decorated with dolphins, birds, palm trees, and other naturalistic devices. Each of these buildings presents a splendid colonnade, in the centre of which a semi-circular or octagonal apse protected by cancelli retires, or a veiled baldacchino stands, with a burning lamp hanging from the vault above the curtained altar, the whole displaying invaluable evidence of early ritual arrangement. On either side of the altar stands a holy personage, colossal in stature and severe in aspect, in the variously-coloured dress of solemn ceremonial, with his hands elevated and outstretched in prayer. (Woodcut No. 3.) The personages represented, who all bear names famous in the Greek church but less familiar in the West, are (1) over the west door (a) Romanus, a white-bearded presbyter; (b) Eukarpion, a young dark-haired soldier; 2. (to S.) (a) effaced; (b) Ananias, a presbyter; 3. (a) Basiliscus, a soldier; (b) Priscus, a soldier; 4. (a) Philippus, a bishop; (b) Therinus, a soldier; (c) Basiliscus, a beardless youthful layman; 5. effaced; 6. (to N.) (a) Leon, a soldier; (b) Philemon, a flute-player; 7. Onesiphorus, a young beardless soldier; (b) Porphyrius; 8. (a) Cosmas, old, grey-headed and grey-bearded; (b) Damian, young and beardless. These magnificent and most interesting works deserve to be much more widely known and more carefully studied. (They are found well reproduced in chromo-lithograph in Texier and Pullan's Eglises Byzantines, pl. xxx.–xxxiv.; and Nos. 1, 4, 7, 8, are engraved by Mr. Wharton Marriott in his Vestiarium Christianum, pl. xviii.–xxi.) salonica boasts of another magnificent mosaic in the cupola of St. Sophia, a work of the 6th century, of which we shall speak in its place.

The only other ancient mosaics breathing the spirit of classical art are those of the 5th century, which decorate the quadripartite vaults of the chapels of St. John the Baptist and St. John the Evangelist, which open out of the Lateran baptistery. These are said to have been apartments in the palace of Constantine, converted into chapels by pope Hilary, A.D. 461–467. The Christian character of these mosaics is shewn by the nimbed Holy Lamb, surrounded by a rich garland of fruit and flowers in the centre of each ceiling; but the decoration with its graceful arabesques, vases of fruit and groups of birds, peacocks, ducks, parroquets, red-legged partridges, and doves, and other conventional ornaments, are quite in the classical style of St. Constantia. The ground, however, is gilt, not white, as in that building. On the walls of the chapel of St. John the Baptist are figures of the four Evangelists. (Ciampini, Vet. Mon. vol. i. tab. 74, 75; Parker, Mosaics, p. 16.)

We have purposely described these last mosaics somewhat out of their chronological order on account of their artistic connection with those already described. The very extensive series of mosaics in the church of St. Mary Major, or the Liberian basilica, though somewhat earlier in date, having been executed by the order of Sixtus III., A.D. 432–440, as is expressly stated in the letter of Hadrian I. to the emperor Charlemagne (Labbe, vii. col. 955), and perhaps the most remarkable works of early Christian art, belong to a totally different school. As Lord Lindsay has remarked (History of Christian Art, vol. i. p. 99, Letter ii.), "none stand so isolated; none have had so little influence on the latter ages of its development." The reason of this want of artistic relation with anterior or subsequent works lies probably in the fact that the artists who designed them had formed themselves entirely on the study of classical bas-reliefs, especially those of the columns of Trajan and Antoninus, while their predecessors had taken the frescoes of the baths as their models, and their successors formed their taste in Greece or Byzantium. These very remarkable mosaics consist of two series: viz. (1) those decorating the arch of the tribune, and (2) those ranged along the walls of the nave, occupying what may be called the triforium space. Of these the former series are much the inferior; "straggling in composition," writes Lord Lindsay, "and poorly executed." They have, indeed, little artistic interest except as the earliest known representations of scenes from the early gospel history. As such, it has been remarked that they manifest the difficulty an artist who had only studied in classical schools had in depicting subjects which as yet had no fixed type in Christian art. The pictures accordingly exhibit no distinctly Christian characteristics, or anything that differences them essentially from Pagan subjects. For the first time, it is true, we here see at the apex of the arch, in a medallion, the familiar symbol of the jewelled throne bearing the apocalyptic roll with seven seals, and above the roll a gemmed cross and crown, supported by St. Peter and St. Paul, with the evangelistic symbols on either side, and below it the signature of the builder XYSTVS . EPISCOPVS . PLEBI . DEI. But the scenes of Gospel history depicted below are so entirely unlike the subsequently recognised types that it is not at first sight easy to identify them. These pictures occupy the wall on either side of the arch, and are ranged in five rows. The uppermost row (1) contains to the left (a) the angelic message to Zacharias; (b) the Annunciation; to the right (c) the Presentation in the Temple; (2) the second row contains (d) the Adoration of the Magi [see woodcut, article ANGELS, vol. i. p. 84]; (e) our Lord among the doctors; (3) the third row gives a long subject, (f) the Massacre of the Innocents, extending to both sides of the arch; (4) in the fourth row we see, again for the first time, the two holy cities of Bethlehem and Jerusalem; (5) the fifth, the Faithful figured as sheep. It deserves notice that in these pictures, the only figures besides Christ distinguished by the nimbus are those of the angels and Herod, as if the nimbus were a conventional mark of dignity unconnected with sanctity. The Virgin Mary never has it; at any rate in the original design. (See Ciampini, Vet. Mon. vol. i. p. 203; Valentini, la Patriarc. Basilica Liberiana, pl. 61; Parker, Mosaics, p. 15; South Kensington drawings, No. 7445.) Far superior in drawing and grouping are the scenes from the Old Testament which occupy the walls of the nave. Here we recognise the spirit of the antique still lingering, while the distinctly religious idea is almost entirely wanting. They were originally forty-two in number, but are now only twenty-seven. Six were destroyed to form the arches of entrance to the Borghese and Sistine chapels, and nine, lost through accident or decay, have been replaced by paintings. In these, which we may regard as the first and last effort of any extent in dramatic representation, "the composition is often excellent; the attitudes simple and expressive, though they want relief, and the conception is altogether superior to the performance" (Lord Lindsay, u. s. p. 101). The series, which begins at the upper end to the left with the interview of Abraham and Melchizedek, carries on the Old Testament history through the times of Isaac and Jacob, and beginning again at the same end to the right with the finding of Moses, pursues his history and that of Joshua to the battle of Bethhoron. Some of the historical scenes display real life. In that of the separation of Abraham and Lot, "the figures," writes M. Vitet (Histoire de l'Art)

No. 4. Visit of Angels to Abraham. From St. Maria Maggiore. (South Kensington Museum.)

"express well what they are about. One feels that the two groups are separating. Isaac blessing Jacob has almost the same pose as Raphael has given it in the Loggie; the taking of Jericho, the battle with the Amalekites, also have details which are not without a certain interest." The visit of the angels to Abraham, of which we give a woodcut (No. 4), in which three stages of the story are represented in one picture, has a solemn dignity not unworthy of the subject (Ciampini, Vet. Mon. vol. i. tav. 50–64; Valentini u. s.; Parker, Photogr. 1952–1966; 2038–2058).

There are few ancient works of which the date has been more variously assigned than that of the very remarkable mosaic in the apse of St. Pudentiana on the Esquiline, perhaps the most beautiful in Rome. It has been placed at various epochs from the end of the 4th to the close of the 9th century. The earlier date is with little doubt the correct one. It is true that as we see it now the picture has suffered too much from the hands of restorers to allow us to speak with absolute certainty on the point. But in the remarkable dignity of the composition, the freedom of treatment and correctness of perspective, as well as in the whole drawing group ing and drapery, it has all the essential marks of a living art, and points to a time when the still surviving traditions of the Pagan schools had been quickened with a new spirit. The figures do not, as in the later mosaics, stand in rigid isolation, gazing out into vacancy, but are seated with most calm dignity, "grouped so as to form a picture," and displaying much variety of attitude and individuality of feature. Kugler's verdict is certainly correct, that "even if the building itself be proved to be of more recent date than Siricius, who built the church A.D. 390, still this work at least must have been copied from one much older" (u. s. p. 41). This picture represents Christ enthroned in the centre of a semicircle of Apostles in Roman costumes (two of whom have been lost by modern repairs), each seated in front of an open portal, forming a crescent-shaped cloister with a tiled roof, above which rise the roofs and domes of the heavenly Jerusalem. St. Peter and St. Paul sit on either side of Christ. Behind them stand two female figures of singular dignity and beauty, with martyrs' chaplets in their hands, representing either St. Pudentiana and her sister St. Praxedes, or, according to Garrucci, the church of the circumcision and that of the gentiles. None are nimbed except our Lord. Christ is seated on a richly decorated throne, His right hand is raised in benediction, and in the left He holds a book inscribed Dominus Conservator Ecclesiae Pudentianae. Behind His throne a tall jewelled cross is planted on a mount, and among the clouds which form the background are seen Evangelistic symbols of somewhat large dimensions. We give a woodcut of this very remarkable and beautiful work (No. 5),[a]

No 5. Apse of St. Pudentiana.

(Gally Knight, Eccles. Arch. of Italy, vol. i. pl. 23; Labarte, Histoire des Arts Industriels, album, vol. ii. pl. 121; Fontana, Musaici delle Chiese di Roma, tav. 14; Parker, Photogr. Nos. 280, 1416–1419; South Kensington, No. 7987; Parker, Mosaic Pictures, pp. 23–27, 153.)

Passing over the small remains of the mosaics of St. Sabina, Rome, with the singular "imagines clipeatae," and the noble figures of the churches of the Jews and the Gentiles, entirely Roman in type, character, and costume, c. 424 (Ciampini, u.s. vol. i. c. 21, tab. 48), and the fragments of the once imposing decorations of St. Paul's outside the walls, set up by Leo the Great, A.D. 440–462, mentioned in Hadrian's letter to Charlemagne already referred to, which were almost entirely destroyed in the conflagration of 1823 to the irreparable impoverishment of early Christian art (Kugler, u. s. p. 29; Parker, Mosaics, p. 16; see woodcut, art. CHURCH, vol. i. p. 371), we must now transfer our attention to Ravenna. No city in Italy, Rome hardly excepted, can shew such admirable specimens of this art. They belong chiefly to the earliest and best period, while the principles of classical art were still in living exercise, before the hieratical traditions of the Byzantine school had begun to proscribe all traces of freedom and nature. Nowhere do we find pictorial decoration more intimately allied to architectural arrangements, the two being so closely connected that each appears essential to the completeness of the other. The mosaic works still existing at Ravenna—many, alas! have perished—exhibit four distinct styles of art. The earliest and most classical in style and drawing are those of the lower part of the orthodox baptistery, set up by archbishop Neon, A.D. 430, and those which cover the whole of the interior of the mausoleum of Galla Placidia, now known as the church of St. Nazarius and Celsus, A.D. 440. A century later in date, and decidedly inferior in style and execution, though still entirely free from Byzantine stiffness, are those which decorate the domes of the orthodox baptistery, and of the Arian baptistery, which may be ascribed to the same date, c. A.D. 553. We have examples of a third mode of treatment distinct from the other two, in the mosaics of St. Vital, A.D. 547, of the chapel of the archbishop's palace, completed in the same year, and of the basilica of St. Apollinaris in Classe, built in A.D. 549. "In themselves," writes Mr. Layard (u. s. p. 14), "these mosaics are deserving of the most careful study, as belonging to the best period of early christian mosaic art. They are especially valuable to the architect, as affording some of the finest examples of the treatment of pictorial mosaics, and of the technical qualities of the material." The Ravenna mosaics, though, as we have seen, extending over a period of full a century, and displaying various styles, are evidently productions of one and the same school of art; exhibiting, it is true, a gradual decline from classical dignity and purity of taste, but maintaining on the whole the same high level, both in drawing and design, as well as in harmony of colour: we shall therefore treat them together.[d] To commence with the orthodox baptistery erected by bishop Ursus, A.D. 400–410, and decorated with mosaics by archbishop Neon, A.D. 430. This building is internally an octagon, covered with a cupola, and is brilliant with mosaics, almost from floor to roof. The most remarkable of these are the eight prophets; grand majestic figures, draped in white, which occupy the spandrels of the lower tier of arches, upon an oval background of gold enclosed by acanthus leaves which spread out in lovely arabesque scroll-work. To quote a very appreciative description, "the most remarkable individuality, not merely in face but in figure, is preserved in each; and in each there is a distinct expression, life-like and full of character. Found in a pagan building, one would say they represented Roman senators of the sterner republican type, and were portraits. Their actions are essentially different; their draperies cast with that truthful, excellent variety of fold no study of art-examples only could have taught, and the manipulation of light and shade is perfect."

[a] Labarte considers that the Apostles and female figures are works of the 4th century; but that the figure of Christ and the Evangelistic symbols belong to a later epoch. (Arts Industriels, iv. 172.) This is also the opinion of Vitet. Garrucci also attributes this mosaic to pope Siricius, A.D. 390.

The ornamentation of the cupola is divided into two zones encircling the central picture representing the baptism of our Lord. The lower zone, which may be ascribed to the earlier period, presents a series of throned crosses; altars bearing the open gospels; episcopal chairs beneath shell-roofed niches; and tombs surmounted with garlands, set within an architectural framework of almost Pompeian elegance. This lower zone springs from a profusion of acanthus leaves, on which parrots, doves, and other birds are perched. The upper zone, containing the twelve apostles, together with the central picture of the baptism, shew indications of restoration at a later and inferior period of art (c. A.D. 553), though still preserving much of antique dignity and grace. The apostles, colossal in size, robed in gold and white drapery floating in the wind in graceful folds, advance with rapid step towards the central figure, bearing in their hands jewelled crowns. The life and movement of the advancing figures present a striking contrast to the motionless repose of later mosaics. In the picture of the baptism, which fills the centre of the cupola, Christ is entirely nude, immersed in the river up to the middle. The Baptist, half nude, pours water on the Saviour's head, on which the holy dove is descending. An incongruous relic of paganism appears in the form of the river-god Jordan, rising from his stream and offering a napkin as an act of homage. The mosaics of this building stand in the very highest rank among similar works for the richness of the ornamentation, the harmony and delicacy of the colouring, the excellence of the drawing, and the dignity of the composition. (Ciampini, Vet. Mon. vol. ii. c. 25; von Quast, Ravenna, taf. i. pp. 4, 5; Kugler, p. 25.) Analogous in style, and rivalling the baptistery in the rich harmony of its ornamentation, is the mausoleum of Galla Placidia, A.D. 440. This is a building in the form of a short Latin cross, each arm covered with a barrel vault, with a small cupola rising on a square lantern above the intersection. The whole interior, both walls and roof, from the height of about six feet from the floor, is coated with mosaics, which, as Messrs. Crowe and Cavalcaselle have pointed out, are of special value as a connecting link both in the subjects and their treatment between the Graeco-Roman work of the primitive Christian church, and the strictly new-Greek or Byzantine; between the frescoes of the catacombs and the mosaics of the Roman churches. The chief arches are decorated with rich acanthus scroll-work (see woodcut No. 6), which also covers the lunettes at the ends of the transepts, where the bright green leaves pencilled with red and black and bordered with gold, stand out on a dark blue ground, with stags making their way through the foliage to slake their thirst at a fountain, in evident allusion to Ps. xlii. 1. The subject in the chief lunette facing the entrance has been variously explained. It represents a male figure, advancing with energetic stride, his pallium floating in the air, and bearing a crux hastata over his right shoulder. In his right hand he carries an open book. Before him to his right is an iron grate or gridiron, with burning wood under it. Behind him is an open cupboard, or scrinium, containing rolls of the Gospels. This figure has been identified from the days of Ciampini downwards with our Lord, and the book is supposed to be an heretical work which He is about to throw into the flames. Such a representation of our Lord, however, is quite without a parallel in the whole cycle of sacred art, and it has of late, with more probability, been regarded by Garrucci and Richter (Die Mosaiken von Ravenna, p. 31), as St. Lawrence with the instrument of his martyrdom, as the sword lies at the feet of St. Agnes in the mosaic in the basilica bearing her name at Rome. The book held by him would under this interpretation be one of the Gospels (before the restoration of 1875 the scrinium contained only three rolls, St. Matthew, St. Luke, and St. John), borne as a symbol of his office as a deacon (cf. Const. Apost. lib. ii. c. 57; Hieron. Epist. lvii.; Concil. Vasens. ii. c. 2). Very superior both in design and execution is the celebrated, but somewhat overpraised, mosaic of the Good Shepherd in the lunette above the chief entrance. "For beauty and purity of design," writes Mr. Layard (u. s. p. 14), "which nearly approaches that of classic times, and for exquisite harmony of colour, this is one of the most perfect specimens of the art that can be found." Its resemblance to some of the catacomb frescoes of Orpheus is too strong to be overlooked. [FRESCOES, vol. i. p. 656.] The Saviour, represented as a beardless young man with long flowing hair, clad in a long gold tunic striped with blue, and holding a crux hastata in His left hand, is seated in a grassy, hilly landscape, with His sheep grazing around Him, caressing with His right hand one of the flock that has lovingly approached Him.[e] Each of the walls of the lantern supporting the cupola bears two standing figures—perhaps apostles—by another and inferior hand, but full of action and admirably posed. Below the windows are doves perched on the rim of a vase and drinking from it, reminding one of the celebrated antique mosaic in the Capitol, described by Pliny. The dome itself is spangled with stars shining forth from a red azure ground encircling a Latin cross. (Ciampini, Vet. Mon. vol. i. tab. 65–67; von Quast, taf. 2–6, pp. 10–15; Kugler, p. 28.)

We have to leap over a century to arrive at the period of the execution of the mosaics of what is known as the Arian baptistery, or St. Maria in Cosmedin, said to have been built by Theodoric, and after his death reconciled and decorated by bishop Agnellus, c. 560. Our limits forbid our dwelling upon these works of art, which are almost exactly reproductions of those in the upper part of the dome of the orthodox baptistery. We have, as there, the baptism of Christ in the centre, with the attendant figures of the Baptist and the river-god Jordan, with the lengthy, angular apostles in a lower zone—disproportionate, figures—bearing crowns. (See Ciampini, Vet. Mon. vol. ii. c. 23; von Quast, 18; Kugler, p. 35.)[f]

We pass now to the celebrated church of St. Vital, consecrated in 547. It will be seen from the ground plan and section of this remarkable edifice (CHURCH, vol. i. pp. 375, 376), that in its general plan it is circular, covered by a dome, with what we may call a quadrangular chancel ending in a domed apse. There can be no doubt that the principal dome, together with the whole of the interior, was originally decorated with mosaics, but the whole have perished at the hands of later restorers with the exception of those of the sacrarium and apse. These are so remarkable in their treatment and so splendid in their general effect as to make us regret most keenly the destruction of the others. Although the architecture of the church is what was afterwards known as Byzantine, and it owed its erection to the Emperor of the East, the term "Byzantine" cannot properly be applied to the mosaics. "The style of art," writes Kugler, "is still of that late Roman class already described, and we have no reason to conclude that the artists belonged to a more Eastern school" (Handbook of Painting, u. s. p. 34). It is evident, however, that the direct classical influence was waning, and giving place to realism. They no longer, as in the representations of which "the Good Shepherd" of the mausoleum of Galla Placidia may be taken as a type, "reflect pagan art-tradition glorified by Christian sentiment," but either depict scenes belonging to their own times or sacred subjects into which the spirit of the day has been breathed, with scarcely any trace of antique feelings. The broad soffit of the arch dividing the sacrarium from the central domical area is decorated with 15 medallions containing individual portrait-like heads of our Lord and His apostles and the martyrs Gervasius and Protasius, set in a field of gold-green arabesque foliage on a blue ground. The two walls of the sacrarium exhibit a remarkable series of Old Testament subjects, chiefly symbolical of the Eucharist, together with figures of prophets and evangelists, set in an architectural framework. The principal picture on each side is contained in the blank head of a semicircular arch, above which two angels floating through the air support a circular medallion bearing a Latin cross with the letters A Ω. Each semicircle includes two subjects combined in one picture: that to the north (1) Abraham and Sarah entertaining the three angels, and (2) Abraham raising his hand to slay his son, while a hand from heaven points to a ram. That to the south (1) the offering of Melchizedek, who, draped in royal vestments of white with gold ornaments, advances from a palatial edifice to an altar or draped table, on which stand two loaves of bread and a chalice; (2) Abel, "an excellent and perfectly antique shepherd figure" (Kugler), clad in a kind of goatskin, holding a lamb in his extended arms over the table, with a rude hut behind him. These figures are nearly life size. The spandrels to the south contain on one side (1) Moses keeping the flock of Jethro, and above (2) Moses loosing his shoes from his feet; and on the other side (3) the prophet Isaiah standing by a crowned column. Still higher on this side groove the arch are St. Matthew and St. Mark, with their symbols of the angel and the lion. The corresponding pictures in the southern spandrels are (1) Moses on the Mount receiving the law, (2) a group of Israelites below, and (3) the prophet Jeremiah also standing by a crowned pillar; St. Luke and St. John, with the ox and the eagle, being represented above. Advancing into the apse proper, the walls on either side at the entrance bear the celebrated historical pictures of Justinian and "his strangely chosen empress" Theodora, with their respective suites, making their costly offerings at the consecration of the church. (Woodcuts No. 7, 8.) These, "as almost the sole surviving specimens of the higher style of secular painting, are of great interest, and as examples of costume quite invaluable." They are, however, inferior in knowledge of form and in drawing, and display little skill in grouping; the artists endeavouring to make up for their deficiencies by minute and careful execution and gorgeous colouring. The figures are life-size, and are upon a gold ground. Both the emperor and empress are distinguished by the nimbus, and wear diadems. (See the woodcuts in article CROWN, vol. i. p. 506.) The emperor is preceded by the archbishop Maximianus (A.D. 546–562) who consecrated the church, a very characteristic figure, accompanied by a deacon and subdeacon, the one bearing a jewelled volume of the gospels, the other a censer. On the other side a chamberlain is represented as drawing back the embroidered curtain of the door for the empress, attended by seven ladies of her court. The border of Theodora's robe is embroidered with the Adoration of the Magi. The half-dome of the apse contains the semi-colossal figure of Christ as "a godlike youth with richly-clustered hair" seated on an azure globe, bestowing the crown of life on the martyr-soldier Vitalis, who is being led up to Him by an angel. Christ's left hand holds the seven-sealed book. Another angel stands on the other side of Christ, together with bishop Ecclesius, the founder of the church (d. 541), of which he carries a model. He is the only figure of the group unnimbed. Below, the four rivers of Paradise flow through green meadows. The vault of the sacrarium is richly covered with green-gold arabesques on a blue ground, and green upon a gold ground, amid which four stately angels with outstretched arms uplift a medallion bearing a nimbed lamb on a starry ground. On the wall in front of the apse two angels bear the monogram of Christ, while the cities of Bethlehem and Jerusalem, blazing with jewels, stand below, amid vine-tendrils and birds on an azure ground. No more remarkable series of mosaics than these of St. Vital's are to be found in the whole circle of Christian art. (Ciampini, Vet. Mon. vol. ii. tab. 18–22; Agincourt, Peinture, pl. xvi. fig. 8, 10, 12; Gally Knight, Eccles. Arch. of Italy, vol. i. pl. 10; Du Sommerard, Les Arts du Moyen Age, album, série 10, pl. 32; La Barte, Handbook of Arts of Middle Ages, vol. i. pl. 27; Kugler, u. s.; Parker's Photographs, No. 752, 753; South Kensington, 972, 973, 6808–6810.)

[e] The somewhat exaggerated laudation given to this mosaic by von Quast and others may be estimated by an inspection of the accurate reproduction of the original size by Salviati and Rolo, in the gallery of the south-east court at the South Kensington Museum.

[f] At the cathedral of Naples there is a baptistery ascribed to Constantine, but assigned by some to bishop Vincentius, A.D. 556–570, the cupola of which is enriched with mosaics. The sacred monogram occupies the centre. On the sides of the octagon below, we are told, are ranged the prophets presenting their crowns. The attitudes are said to be varied, the action suitable, and the draperies of classic dignity. (Catalani, Chiese di Napoli, vol. i. p. 46; Crowe and Cavalcaselle, vol. i. p. 12.)

The basilica known as St. Apollinare Nuovo, since the removal thither of the body of St. Apollinaris for safety in the 9th century from the basilica of the same name in "Classe," but originally built by Theodoric, A.D. 500, for Arian worship, and designated "St. Martino in coelo aureo," from the splendour of its golden walls and ceilings, and "Sacellum Arii," presents two grand processional friezes, of colossal figures, extending the whole length of the nave, in what we have called the "triforium spaces," which "belonging to the very last days of ancient art remind us curiously of the Panathenaic procession on the frieze of the Parthenon" (Kugler, u. s.) That to the south consists of twenty-four male saints, nimbed, holding crowns in their hands divided by palm trees, all clothed in white robes, with the exception of the patron saint, St. Martin, the last of the row, who is clad in violet, advancing in stately march from the city of Ravenna towards the throned Saviour seated between four angels (a restoration since Ciampini's time); on the north, or women's side, we have a similar procession of twenty-two virgin saints issuing from the suburb of Classis, clothed in white, with a gold-coloured short-sleeved robe over, the head covered with a white veil, and the left hand which holds a crown also similarly veiled. They are preceded by the three kings (restored) presenting the offerings to the Infant Saviour seated on His throned Virgin Mother's lap, with two stately angels on either side, both mother and child having the nimbus, and with their right hands raised in act of benediction. "Few of man's works," writes Mr. Freeman, "are more magnificent than that long procession of triumphal virgins. . . . not still conventional forms, as in the late Byzantine work; but living and moving human beings." There is great variety in the expression of the faces, and the features are some of the most beautiful in early Christian art. The names are inscribed over each saint. Mrs. Jameson calls attention to the fact that only five of the whole number "are properly Greek saints, all the rest being Latin saints, whose worship originated with the Western, and not with the Eastern church" (Jameson, Sacred and Legendary Art, vol. ii. p. 527). Above the friezes the spaces between the windows exhibit small single figures of prophets and apostles in niches; and over each window, a vase with two doves recalls a familiar feature in classical art. Higher still, just below the roof, is a series of small subjects from the life of Christ. Those on the ritual, north, depict thirteen scenes from the life of our Lord:—(1) The cure of the paralytic; (2) the cure of the demoniac; (3) healing of the man with the palsy; (4) severing the sheep from the goats; (5) the widow's mite; (6) the Pharisee and publican; (7) the raising of Lazarus; (8) Christ and the woman of Samaria; (9) the woman that was a sinner; (10) cure of the two blind men; (11) miraculous draught; (12) the feeding of the five thousand; (13) gathering up the fragments. Those on the south, as many scenes from the Passion, commencing with the Last Supper and ending with the appearances of our Lord after His Resurrection—to the disciples at Emmaus, and to the eleven apostles; and, what is noteworthy, omitting the Crucifixion and all the physical sufferings of Christ. It deserves notice that in the former our Lord is represented as a beardless young man; in the latter as adult and bearded. These mosaics are of high value in Christian art, and deserve to be better known. The best account of them is in Richter, Die Mosaiken von Ravenna, pp. 44 ff. Above the saints we see the conch-shaped vault of an apse, with a pensile crown, and a cross above supported by a dove on either side. (Woodcut, CORONA LUCIS, vol. i. p. 461; Ciampini, Vet. Mon. tom. ii. pp. 126, 127; Agincourt, Peinture, pl. xvi. fig. 13, 15–20; Garrucci, Arti Primitiv. Crist.; von Quast, taf. 7; South Kens. No. 6811, 6812; Kugler, u. s. pp. 38–40.)

To the same period belong the mosaics of the chapel of the archiepiscopal palace.[s] (Woodcut No. 9.) We have here a dome with the monogram of Christ in the centre, supported by four simple and graceful angels, with the evangelistic symbols in the spandrels, all on a gold ground. The soffit of each of the four sustaining arches is decorated with seven medallion heads on an azure ground, that of Christ (a very youthful bust) occupying the place of honour in the centre of the chancel arch, with three of the apostles on either side, the heads of the remaining six with that of St. Paul, ornamenting the western arch. The side arches exhibit six male saints to the north, and as many female saints to the south, with the sacred monogram in the centre. These medallions are conceived in the same spirit as those on the arch of the sacrarium of St. Vital, but are inferior in design and execution.

The mosaics which decorate the basilica of St. Apollinaris in Classe belong to a later period, c. 671–677, but they may be conveniently treated of here, as they are examples of the same school of art, and present many points of close resemblance to the earlier works. These mosaics are pronounced by Kugler to be of the highest importance in the history of ecclesiastical art, as almost the only surviving example, since the conflagration of St. Paul's at Rome, of the manner in which "whole rows of pictures and symbols were employed to ornament the interior of churches" (Kugler, u. s. p. 61). The spandrels of the nave arches offer a series of early Christian symbols, from the simple monogram to the Good Shepherd and the Fisherman, while a line of medallions on the wall above exhibits full-face portraits of the archbishops of Ravenna, on the same plan as the series of popes in St. Paul's, which are continued also along the wall of the aisles. (See the woodcut, article CHURCH, vol. i. p. 377.) These are modern, but apparently correct copies. The mosaics of the apse are original, and very remarkable. The arch of the tribune presents the familiar arrangement. The bust of Christ, in a medallion, occupies the centre between the evangelistic symbols, with twelve sheep on either side issuing from the gates of the two holy cities and advancing up the sides of the arch. Lower down are the two archangels, Michael and Gabriel, with heads of youthful beauty, each holding the labarum. Lower still are figures of St. Matthew and St. Luke. The side walls of the apse present two very remarkable historical compositions, evidently designed in imitation of those at St. Vital. To the south the three sacrifices of the Old Testament, those of Abel, Melchizedek, and Abraham, are combined in one really spirited composition. To the north is represented the Granting the Privileges of the church of Ravenna to the archbishop Reparatus by the emperor, probably Constantine Pogonatus, A.D. 668–685, slighter and inferior in drawing and execution to the opposite picture (Kugler, u. s. p. 63), but deserving to be ranked with the mosaics of St. Vital's as invaluable contemporary records of secular costume of the 7th century. Between the five windows of the apse are sainted bishops of Ravenna in pontifical robes, holding books, and blessing the people. The most noteworthy however of the series of mosaics in this church is that of the Transfiguration, which fills the conch of the apse, considered by Lord Lindsay as "perhaps the most beautifully executed mosaic in Ravenna." With the exception of that at Mount Sinai it is the earliest known representation of the scene, and is given in so emblematical a character that by the uninitiated the subject would not be readily recognised (Mrs. Jameson's History of our Lord, vol. i. p. 341). The traditional type is adhered to in the arrangement. In the chief place the presence of Christ is symbolized by a jewelled cross, set in a blue circle studded with gold stars, in the centre of which His sacred face is inserted with Salus mundi below, and IXΘTΣ above. The divine hand issuing from the clouds, and pointing to the cross, indicates the Father's recognition of the Son. On either side of the cross truncated half figures of Moses and Elias repose on delicately coloured clouds. Below, three sheep in a hilly green meadow looking upward symbolize the apostles. At the base of the composition, in the central position, reserved in the earlier mosaics exclusively for Christ, St. Apollinaris stands in his pontifical robes, with his arms extended in prayer, between six sheep on either side. The freedom from the Byzantine rigidity which characterizes the contemporary works at Rome is very noteworthy. Indeed, notwithstanding its intimate political connection with Constantinople the art-traditions of Ravenna seem to have continued to a late date unaffected by the paralyzing influence of the schools of the Eastern capital, which was destined to destroy the life of ecclesiastical art, and reduce it to the almost mechanical reproduction of conventional forms, depending for their effect on the architectonic regularity of their arrangement and the gorgeousness of the materials employed. The absence of Byzantine influence here has been noticed by Mr. Freeman; the "Ravenna monuments all come together under one head; they are all Christian Roman . . . . Greek inscriptions appear over the heads of the holy personages in the mosaics (at St. Mark's, Venice), but the walls of St. Vitalis and St. Apollinaris in Classe spake no tongue but Latin" (Historical and Architectural Sketches, pp. 46, 47).

Contemporaneous with the earliest mosaics at Ravenna are the very interesting works at Milan, in the churches of St. Lawrence and St. Ambrose. Those at St. Lawrence are in the lateral apses of the ancient chapel of St. Aquilinus, containing the tomb of Ataulphus, the first husband of Galla Placidia (A.D. 415). They may be safely ascribed to the early part of the 5th century, and are entirely free from Byzantine influence. That to the right represents Christ, youthful and beardless, clad in white. (Woodcut No. 10.) His head encircled with a cruciform nimbus, bearing A Ω; His right hand raised in benediction, His left holding the Book of Life. The apostles sit on either side, all robed in white long-sleeved tunics, with a black clavus over the right shoulder. Their feet are sandalled. The heads display much variety in expression, meditative stern or cheerful, and some are characterized by youthful beauty. The tribune to the left represents a pastoral scene, where three youthful shepherds, one asleep, are depicted with three sheep in a rocky landscape, under a cloudy nocturnal sky. Two dignified figures clad in rich gold-coloured robes are directing the attention of the shepherds to something out of the picture. If, as Dr. Appell believes, this represents the angel appearing to the shepherds at the Nativity, it is an interesting proof of the entire absence at that early period of any recognised type of the scene (Allegranza, Spiegazioni, &c., tav. 1; South Kens. Nos. 7782, 7967). The mosaics at St. Ambrose are in the side chapel of St. Satyrus, or of St. Victor, "ad coelum aureum," this being the original place of the latter saint's interment. They are ascribed to the middle of the 5th century, and are of remarkable excellence, characterized by a living freedom and absence of stiffness. On each side wall of the chapel are three standing saints; on the gospel side, St. Ambrose between St. Gervasius and St. Protasius; on the epistle side, St. Maternus between St. Nabor and St. Felix. All wear white togas over tunics, their feet are sandalled, they have no nimbi. The cupola has a gold ground, in the centre of which, within a garland of gay flowers, is the half figure of St. Victor, a bearded and moustached young man, of a high colour and short brown hair. (Woodcut No. 11.) He is clothed in a red tunic, with a light purple pallium over it. He holds in his right hand a cruciform monogram of Christ with an inscription on the horizontal bar of the H, read by Ferrario, Panagriae. In his left hand he bears an open book inscribed Victor, above is a cross with Fau tini on the horizontal bar. The evangelistic symbols as usual occupy the pendentives. They are more unconventional than usual but the lion suffers in drawing from the artist's ignorance of the real animal (Ferrario, Monumenti di Sant' Ambrogio in Milano).

[s] They are pronounced by Von Quast to belong to the 5th century chiefly on account of a monogram, "Petrus," which he considers to refer to Petrus Chrysologus, A.D. 433–434. Kugler would prefer to refer this monogram to archbishop Petrus IV., A.D. 569–574 (u. s. p. 46, note).

Before we return to Rome to trace the gradual stiffening and shrivelling up of ecclesiastical art under increasing Byzantine influence, we must cross the Adriatic, and take a survey of the mosaics of the very remarkable basilica of Parenzo in Istria, erected, according to an inscription on the tabernacle, (strangely misread by Dr. J. M. Neale, and the German authorities)[b] by Euphrasius, the first bishop of the see, between A.D. 535 and A.D. 543. These mosaics have a strong family likeness to those of Ravenna, especially those of St. Apollinare Nuovo, and evidently belong to the same school. The soffit of the arch of the tribune is decorated with a series of medallion heads of female saints, with the sacred monogram on the vertex of the arch. The western face of the arch has only ribbons and arabesque foliage. The side walls of the [b] The inscription is as follows: "Famul(us) . D(e)i . Eufrasius . Antis(tes) . temporib(us) . suis . ae(ae) . an(num) . XI . hunc . hoc(um) . a . fundamen(is) . D(e)o . Jobant(e) . ase . Oeocl . apse present the Annunciation to the north, and the Visitation to the south. Two saints and a gold nimbed angel in white robes holding an orb, occupy the spaces between the windows. The semi-dome of the apse contains a very extensive mosaic picture, somewhat coarse, but very effective, the figures being remarkably free from stiffness, noble in outline, and with well-arranged drapery. The general arrangement is that with which we are familiar in this position. A sacred figure occupies the central place with saints and angels standing in solemn attendance on either side, while from the clouds above the Divine Hand holds out a crown. But it is no longer Christ Himself that is the chief object of veneration, but His Virgin Mother, throned and nimbed, holding her Son on her lap. This mosaic therefore indicates a distinct step onwards in the cultus of the Blessed Virgin, anticipating by three centuries the throned Virgin of Santa Maria in Domnica. On either side of the central group stands a stately angel, and beyond three saintly personages; those to the Virgin's right hand are the patron saint, St. Maurus, holding a crown, bishop Euphrasius the founder, and archdeacon Claudius, the architect of the church, a model of which Euphrasius is presenting; and between them a second Euphrasius, a boy, the child of Claudius. The three saints to the Virgin's left are anonymous. The mosaics at Parenzo are not limited to the interior of the church. The western façade was decorated with a mosaic picture of Christ in a Vesica, between the Evangelistic symbols, with the seven golden candlesticks and two saints below, all in a state of sad decay.

The very remarkable mosaics of this basilica demand careful illustration. (Lohde, Der Dom von Parenzo; Eitelberger, Kunstdenkmale des Oesterreichischen Kaiserstaates, heft 4–5, pl. xiii.–xvi.; Neale, Notes of Journey in Dalmatia, pp. 79, 80.)

Proceeding still farther to the east, Justinian's glorious church of St. Sophia at Constantinople presents an example of mosaic decoration unparalleled in extent and unsurpassed in magnificence, but almost entirely hidden beneath the whitewash of the image-hating Mussulmans, and only known to us by the rhetorical descriptions of Paulus Silentiarius, and from the drawings of Salzenberg, taken during the temporary removal of the plaster, and published in his magnificent work on the ancient Christian architecture of Constantinople (Altchristliche Baudenkmale von Constantinopel). The present state of the mosaics may be seen in Signor Fossati's work Agia Sofia. Salzenberg's plates afford an undeniable proof that even in Byzantium itself the stiffening influence of Byzantine pictorial traditions had hardly begun to operate in the 6th century. It is true that, with some exception, there is little attempt to produce a pictorial composition. The mosaics chiefly consist of majestic single figures rhythmically arranged as accessories to the architecture, looking down calmly on the worshippers below, without any indication of action. But they are well drawn, and display none of the spectral rigidity and attenuated length which renders later Byzantine art so repulsive. The subsidiary ornamentation on the walls, panels, soffits and spandrels of the arches is no less free and joyous. Here we have beautiful arabesque foliage, branches of trees with clusters of fruit and flowers, with stars, lozenges, triangles, and guilloche borders, manifesting the influence of a still living classical tradition. The whole interior of the church was originally invested with inlaid work. The lower portions were covered with "opus sectile," patterns inlaid in various-coloured marbles, while the upper and far larger portion was swathed, as it were, in a continuous gold sheet (we see the same, at a later date, at St. Mark's, Venice), throwing up the stately sacred forms. The general arrangement of the mosaics may be seen in the section of St. Sophia, given in our first volume (GALLERIES, vol. i. p. 707). Four vast seraphs, with faces of youthful majesty, set in the midst of six overshadowing wings, occupy the pendentives of the great cupola. These are still partially visible, their faces only being concealed by silver stars. The dome itself had no figures, and was simply divided by bands of conventional ornament. The soffits of the four main arches supporting the dome were adorned with full length colossal figures of sacred personages within rich mosaic borders. The soffit of the arch of the apse presented on either side a truly magnificent picture of a white-robed angel holding a globe and a wand, with two wings of vast length and breadth, almost reaching to his feet. The face is characterized by a noble youthful beauty; the hair long and curling. The arrangement of the wall spaces within the cupola will be seen in the woodcut already referred to. The six smaller figures between the second tier of windows represent the minor prophets, flanked at either end by taller figures of the major prophets, Isaiah and Jeremiah to the north, Ezekiel and Daniel to the south. There is much variety and individuality of expression in these stately figures. Jeremiah has a very noble head, with long flowing hair and beard. Jonah and Habakkuk are also noticeable. The latter has a very earnest face, without a beard, and with short hair (Salzenberg, pl. 30). A mosaic given by Salzenberg (pl. 31), from the Gynaeceum, representing the Day of Pentecost shews the only attempt at a regularly composed picture. The twelve apostles are ranged in a semicircle (it is noticeable that the Virgin is absent), the descending fiery tongues being depicted on the ribs of the half dome. A fragment from one of the spandrels shews a portion of a group of bystanders, depicted with much graphic power. Half-incredulous wonder is well represented in their faces. One ill-looking fellow with a goat's beard is mocking. The mosaics of St. Sophia are evidently not all of the same date. The figures of Eastern saints, Anthimus, Basil, Dionysius, Gregory Theologus, &c., from the walls of the nave, shew a somewhat soulless uniformity in dress form and feature, with an approach to excess of length, indicating a decline of art (ib. pl. 28, 29). The mosaic of our Lord enthroned, with the prostrate form of the emperor (Constantine Pogonatus) awkwardly poising himself on his knees and elbows at His feet, displays the union of excessive gorgeousness of dress and accessories, with bad drawing and ignorance of anatomy, which characterizes the later Byzantine works. (Woodcut No. 12.)

Another contemporaneous specimen of Greek mosaic, on a scale of which unhappily there are but few examples remaining, is the cupola of St. Sophia, at Thessalonica, representing the Ascension. This vast composition covers an area of 600 square yards, and is executed with a finish rarely exhibited in such works. It may be safely assigned to the middle of the 6th century. The ascending figure of Christ in an aureole supported by angels, in the centre of the dome, has almost entirely perished. The Virgin and twelve apostles, poised insecurely on little conical hills divided by olive trees, stand in a circle round the base, their colossal figures, more than twelve feet high, stretching over the golden concave. The Virgin occupies the chief place opposite the entrance; she is vested in a purple robe, with scarlet sandals, and has a golden nimbus, as have the two angels who, one on either side of her, are addressing the apostles. The apostles are un-nimbed. Their expression is very varied and life-like. Some gaze upwards; some lean their heads on their hands in deep thought; some hold up a hand or a finger in astonishment. There is as yet no trace of the paralyzing effect of Byzantine stiffness and despotic art traditions in this truly magnificent work (Texier et Pullan, Eglises Byzantines, pl. xl, xli, pp. 142–144). There can be no reason to doubt that Greece, Asia Minor, and the Holy Land once possessed many other equally noble specimens of mosaic decoration, "incomparably more splendid, more extensive, and grander in plan" (Gally Knight) than those with which we are most familiar in Italy; but very few have survived the wasting effects of the elements, wars, fires, and earthquakes, and those that remain are mostly hidden by Mahommedan whitewash. The apse of the church of the convent of Mount Sinai has preserved its mosaics of the time of Justinian, representing the Transfiguration, with figures of Christ, Moses, and Elias, and the three apostles below, set in a border of medallions containing busts of prophets, apostles and saints. Portraits of Justinian and Theodora are found on the face of the arch of the apse. Above them are the appropriate historical scenes of Moses and the Burning Bush, and Moses receiving the Tables of the Law. Accurate drawings or photographs of these mosaics are urgently called for. M. Didron also reports that the "vaults and cupola of Vatopedi and St. Laura on Mount Athos, and of Daphne, near Athens, and of St. Luke in Livadia, are covered with mosaics," but he supplies no details.

The devastating inroads which swept over Italy in the 5th century effectually stamped out all native art both in the capital and the provincial cities. The revival of mosaic decoration, as of the other forms of ecclesiastical art, must be attributed to artists from the Eastern Rome, who brought with them their technical processes and pictorial traditions. It was not, however, till a later period, as has been already remarked, that the rapid decline which characterizes the Byzantine school proper set in. The mosaic compositions in Rome belonging to the 6th century still exhibit a life and movement which render them "in point of composition scarcely perceptibly inferior to those of the 5th, and in splendour of material by no means so" (Kugler, u. s. p. 31).

The finest mosaics of this class existing in Rome are those in the church of St. Cosmas and St. Damian (the Eastern physician saints) in the Forum, built by Felix IV. A.D. 526–530. (Woodcut No. 13.) Here we perceive that we have finally said farewell to pictorial composition, and enter upon the system of pictorial architectonic decorations, which continued with ever-increasing formality and stiffness up to the extinction of the art. The effect is made to depend entirely on majestic figures rhythmically placed in motionless repose, striking the eye of the worshipper with their calm and solemn grandeur, and filling his mind with reverence and awe, while "the rich play of antique decoration is lost sight of behind the severe gravity of figurative representation" (Lübke, History of Christian Art). The arrangement of this admirable mosaic, the last work in Christian Rome in which we trace a really living art in contradistinction to the mechanical reproduction of hieratical forms, conforms to the type described at the commencement of this article; conventional in arrangement, gorgeous in colour, severe in form, and stern in expression. A colossal figure of our Lord, His right hand raised in benediction, His left holding a scroll, occupies the centre of the roof of the apse. To the left St. Peter introduces St. Cosmas; St. Paul, to the right, St. Damian, each bearing martyrs' crowns. They are followed by St. Theodore to the right, gorgeously robed, carrying his crown, and pope Felix IV., the founder of the church, of which he carries a model, to the left (an entirely restored figure). The composition is terminated on either side by a palm tree, laden with fruit, sparkling with gold, symbolizing the tree of life. Above that to the left is the phoenix with a star-shaped nimbus, typifying eternal life through death. The river Jordan is indicated below Christ's feet, as it were dividing heaven from earth. A frieze encircling the apse bears twelve sheep, drawn with much truth and individuality of expression, advancing from the two holy cities to the Holy Lamb, who, with nimbed head, stands on a hill, from which issue the four rivers of Paradise, which, as well as the Jordan, have their names inscribed. The arch of the apse presents the usual symbols on its face. In the centre the Lamb, "as it had been slain," on a jewelled altar with a cross behind and the seven sealed book on the step; on either side the golden candlesticks, two angels, and the evangelistic symbols, two of which, as well as the throng of elders below offering their crosses, have been nearly obliterated by repairs. The only nimbed figures are Christ and the angels. "The figure of Christ," writes Kugler (u.s. p. 32), "may be regarded as one of the most marvellous specimens of the art of the middle ages. Countenance, attitude, and drapery combine to give Him an expression of quiet majesty, which for many centuries after is not found again in equal beauty and freedom. The drapery especially is disposed in noble folds, and only in its somewhat too ornate details is a further departure from the antique observable. The saints are not as yet arranged in stiff parallel forms, but are advancing forward, so that their figures appear somewhat distorted, while we already remark something constrained and inanimate in their step. . . . A feeling for colour is here displayed, of which no later mosaics with gold grounds give any idea. The heads are animated and individual. . . . still far removed from any Byzantine stiffness." (Ciampini, Vet. Mon. vol. ii. tab. 15, 16; De Rossi, Musaici Cristiani, fasc. v.; Fontana, Musaici delle Chiese di Roma, tab. 3; Lübke, History of Christian Art, vol. i. p. 319; Parker, Photogr. 1441–1445; South Kens. No. 7805.)

A very decided decline in art, though still preserving some traces of the ancient Roman manner, is manifested by the mosaics of St. Lawrence without the walls built by Pelagius II. (A.D. 577–590). The apse was destroyed when Honorius III. (A.D. 1216–1227) reversed the orientation, and erected a long nave where the apse had stood, and the only mosaics remaining are on the back-side of the arch of triumph. They are too much restored and altered to be of much value in the history of art. Christ is here seated on the globe of the world, holding a long cross; to his right stand St. Peter and St. Lawrence bearing similar crosses, and St. Pelagius, a diminutive figure, presenting his church. On Christ's left stand St. Paul and St. Stephen, and St. Hippolytus bearing his martyr's crown. Vitet remarks that the savage ascetic aspect of Christ resembles that of an Oriental monk. (Ciampini, Vet. Mon. vol. ii. c. 13, tab. 28; Parker, Mosaics, pp. 20–22.) "Standing on the boundary line between the earlier and later styles" (Kugler, u.s. p. 59), but shewing a very decided tendency to Byzantine treatment, are the mosaics of St. Agnes, the work of pope Honorius, A.D. 625–638. The picture, limited to three figures, is a strong contrast to the crowded compositions of later times. Here, for the first time, we have a human saint occupying the central place hitherto reserved for Christ. The Divine Hand holds the crown above her head. The execution is coarse, and the design poor. The forms are stiff and elongated, and the attitudes conventional, while an attempt is made to compensate for deficiencies in art by richness of colour and gorgeousness of costume. St. Agnes is attired with a barbarous splendour in a dark purple robe embroidered with gold and overloaded with gems, as is her jewelled tiara, while strings of pearls hang from her ears, reminding us of the Empress Theodora at St. Vital's. Her red cheeks are mere blotches, and the figure is outlined by heavy dark strokes. A sword lies at her feet, where flames are bursting from the ground, symbolizing her martyrdom. To her right Honorius presents his church; to her left pope Symmachus holds a book. The ground is of gold, which by this time had become the rule, seldom departed from (De Rossi, Musaici Cristiani, fasc. iv.; Fontana, u.s. tav. 8; D'Agincourt, Peinture, pl. 17, No. 2; Parker, Photogr. 1593; South Kens., No. 974). The mosaics which decorate the apse of the oratory of St. Venantius (A.D. 632–642), attached to the Lateran baptistery, depart somewhat from the usual type. Christ and the two adoring angels are reduced to busts, upborne on gaudy clouds. Below, not composed into a picture but standing motionless side by side, are ranged nine full-length figures, the central one being the Virgin as an "orante" (the earliest example of her representation, not in an historical subject, in a Roman mosaic). To her right are St. Paul, St. John, St. Venantius, and pope John IV., the builder of the oratory, of which he holds a model in his hand; to her left St. Peter, St. John the Baptist, St. Domnius, and pope Theodore, by whom the oratory was completed. The frieze above the arch has the usual symbolical representations; in the spandrels below are eight full-length figures of saints, four on each side, some having crowns, others books. The execution of the whole is coarse, and the design tasteless. We must pass rapidly over the remaining Roman mosaics in which Byzantine formalism gradually crushes out more and more of the life of art. Those of the small altar apse attached to the round church of St. Stephen, on the Coelian Hill, A.D. 642–649, display in the centre a richly jewelled cross between the standing figures of St. Primus and St. Felicianus, with a medallion head of Christ on its upper arm (recalling the analogous arrangement at St. Apollinaris in Classe), and the hand of the Father holding out the martyr's crown above. A solitary figure in mosaic, that of St. Sebastian, over a side altar at St. Pietro, in Vincoli, belongs to the same period of art. The saint appears, not as in later art as a youthful half-naked Christian Apollo, but as an old man with white hair and beard, in full Byzantine costume, with richly embroidered trousers bare legs and sandals. He holds his martyr's crown. His countenance displays stern resolution. The figure is stiff and lifeless. Some fragments of the mosaics put up in St. Peter's by John VII., A.D. 703, removed when the basilica was rebuilt, still exist. A figure of the Virgin, with uplifted hands as an orante, is preserved in the Ricci chapel, in St. Mark's at Florence. A portion of the Adoration of the Magi is to be seen in the sacristy of St. Mary, in Cosmedin, which "shews composition of a good character, somewhat in the older taste." The circular church of St. Theodore, A.D. 772–795, contains a well-executed picture, which of the character and value of the objects represented. If the eyes are not charmed, they are at least dazzled, and it is only after some time that we are aware of the feebleness and coarseness of the work, and that we feel a sad surprise at this great degradation of art." Any detailed description of the subjects is rendered unnecessary by their being a formal reproduction, with the necessary substitutions, of the mosaics at St. Cosmas and St. Damian. The sainted sisters St. Praxedes and St. Pudentiana take the place of St. Cosmas and St. Damian, and pope Paschal of pope Felix. All else is, in plan at least, the same. The degrading influence of the Byzantine art traditions were, however, too potent to allow the imitator to copy faithfully. He has reproduced the general form and lost the spirit. The execution is rude, and the gorgeousness of the colouring only increases the barbaric effect. The figures are stiff attenuated and angular; the countenances meagre and ascetic; the drapery formed only by a few dark lines. The sheep in the frieze are "like children's toys; small horses of wood badly cut" (Vitet). The arch of the tribune preserves the decoration in a degraded form which has almost entirely perished at St. Cosmas and St. Damian. (Woodcut No. 14.) The front of the arch of triumph represents in the centre the heavenly Jerusalem, within whose gates stands our Lord, too diminutive for effect, attended by angels and saints, while below a multitude of the redeemed approach in solemn procession "clad in white robes, and with palm branches in their hands." The simultaneous action of so vast a crowd is not without solemn effect, but the whole displays commonplace thought and feebleness of execution (Ciampini, tom. ii. tab. 47; Fontana, tav. 12; De Rossi, Musaici Cristiani, fasc. v.; Kugler, pt. i. p. 67; Crowe and Cavalcaselle, vol. i. p. 51; Parker, Photogr. No. 1477–1483, 1506, 1507; South Kens., No. 976). The side chapel, though from its barbaric splendour it has obtained the designation of the "Garden of

"is chiefly interesting to us as one of the earliest specimens of the copying of old mosaics" (Kugler, u.s. p. 41). Christ in a violet robe, with long light hair and a short beard, holding a cross in his left hand, is seated upon a blue starry globe. St. Peter on the right is introducing St. Theodore, both being exact copies of the corresponding figures in St. Cosmas and St. Damian. St. Paul, on the left, introduces another youthful saint. Both are offering their crowns on an embroidered mantle to Christ. The unmeaning draperies indicate the rapid decline of art. The largest and most magnificent of the works of this period are those in the church of St. Praxedes. Nowhere, except at Venice and Ravenna, do we find so wide an extent of mosaic decoration in the same building. Not only the portions usually so ornamented, the apse and its arch, but a second arch crossing the nave, and a side chapel, that of St. Zeno, with its vaulted roof, are similarly vested. "The effect of this grand work," writes M. Vitet, "is most imposing, the effect entirely of decoration, independent Paradise," is even poorer in design and ruder in execution. The walls are covered with long lean figures of saints—the Virgin Mary, St. John Baptist, Apostles, Virgins, busts, and sacred symbols, ranged side by side on a glittering gold ground, with no attempt at combined pictorial effect. The vault exhibits in the centre a half-length figure of Christ upborne by four angels, apparently copied from the ceiling of the archi-episcopal chapel at Ravenna. The most interesting portion of these decorations is the Holy Lamb on a mount, from which issue the four streams of Paradise, at which as many stags are drinking. The window above the side door is framed in double rows of medallion portraits, "which are merely rude caricatures" (Kugler, u.s. p. 68). (Ciampini, tom. ii. c. 26, tab. 48, 50; Parker, Photogr. No. 1508–1512; Parker, Mosaics, p. 32; South Kens., No. 1393–1396). To the same pope, Paschal I., are due the mosaics of the apse of St. Cecilia, in Trastevere, where the subjects and arrangements are nearly the same, and which in rudeness and "multiplicity of figures correspond pretty much with those at St. Praxedes." We have "the same forgetfulness of the human frame, the same disparity between the richness of the costumes and the deformity of those who are clothed in them" (Vitet). (Ciampini, vol. ii. c. 27, tab. 51, 52; Parker, Photogr. 1706.) To Paschal also we must ascribe the rich mosaics of the apse of St. Mary in Navicella, or in Domnica, where, for the first time in existing Christian Roman art (the example at Parenzo is three centuries earlier), we find the Virgin Mary enthroned with our Lord on her lap, not as an infant, but as a dwarfed man, taking the chief place in the composition. (Woodcut No. 15.) Kugler calls attention to the richness of the foliage decoration, usually proscribed by the moroseness of Byzantine art. The mosaics of St.

No. 15. St. Maria in Domnica; Rome. Circa 815.

Mark's, erected by Gregory IV., A.D. 828, are, according to M. Vitet, "unquestionably the most barbarous in Rome," in which "all respect for any kind of rule, all antiquity of expression, all notion of order and beauty have disappeared. The meagreness of the figures, the lengthening of the bodies, the stiff parallelism of the draperies, cannot be carried farther." The subject, Christ attended by apostles and saints, with the usual accessories, calls for no remark (Ciampini, tom. ii. c. 19, tab. 36, 37). The cathedral of Capua possesses mosaics of the same school, which deserve fuller description and illustration (Ciampini, tom. ii. c. 29, tab. 54). The celebrated mosaic of the apse of the Leonine Triclinium at the Lateran, though a modern restoration by Benedict XIV., A.D. 1740–1758, is a tolerably faithful copy of the original work. erected by Leo III., A.D. 798–816. The chief subject is the constantly repeated one of Christ and His apostles, with the river of Paradise gushing out at their feet. "The figures in their stiff yet infirm attitudes, and still more in the unmeaning disposition of the drapery, display a decided Byzantine influence" (Kugler, u.s. p. 66). On the walls on either side of the apse, at the springing of the arch, are the pictures famous for their ecclesiastical and political significance. To the left the enthroned Saviour bestows, with His right hand, the keys on St. Sylvester and with His left hand the Vexillum on the emperor Constantine each kneeling at His feet, as the symbols respectively of the spiritual and temporal power. To the right St. Peter, similarly enthroned, places a crown on the head of pope Leo III., with his right hand and with His left gives the Vexillum to the emperor Charles the Great (Ciampini, tom. ii. c. 21, tab. 39, 40; Wharton Marriott, Testimony of Catacombs, p. 95, pl. 6; Vestiarium Christ. pl. 32, 33; Parker, Photogr. No. 761). At the church of St. Nereus and Achilleus, rebuilt by Leo III., A.D. 796, the mosaics of the apse have perished, but those above the arch remain, and are remarkable as representing historical scenes instead of the usual symbolical and apocalyptic subjects. The Transfiguration is represented over the arch, with Moses and Elias standing on either side of Christ, whose superior dignity is indicated with a puerile realism by his taller stature, and the awkward prostrate figures of the three apostles beyond. Further to the left is the Annunciation, and to the right the Virgin and Child accompanied by an angel, less ungraceful than the other figures. The whole composition strikingly indicates the low state to which art had fallen at the end of the 8th century (Ciampini, tom. ii. c. 20, tab. 38). The last mosaic to be noticed in this period is that of the church originally called St. Maria Antiqua, then changed to St. M. Nova, and re-dedicated in the 16th century to St. Francesca Romana, the name by which it is commonly known. In this work there is a strange mixture of good and bad, with some novelties of treatment, indicating the introduction of a new influence. The chief figure, as at St. Maria in Navicella, is the Virgin attended by saints, with our Lord on her lap, throned, and now for the first time crowned. The attempt at pictorial composition is entirely given up, and architectural composition is substituted for it. The figures are, according to the arrangement with which we become afterwards so familiar, for the first time placed each under the arch of a continuous arcade, supported by columns. A sort of tabernacle, in the form of a cockle shell, spreads over all the upper part of the mosaic. The drawing is very bad; the figure of the Virgin, "one of the most hideous that can be imagined" (Vitet), the cheeks simply red blotches, the folds of the drapery merely dark strokes, poorly compensated for by the Oriental magnificence of the costumes, especially that of the chief figure. The garlands of foliage, however, display a certain grace alien from the usually morose rigidity of the Byzantine school. Indeed the whole composition indicates some original power and freedom of thought on part of its designer (Ciampini, tom. ii. c. . 53). With the Imperial power the art osaic was transferred from Rome to ...ren. Charles the Great summoned the artists to decorate his new basilica, for the enrichment of which rich marbles and pillars were transported from Ravenna. Ciampini (tom. ii. c. 22, tab. 41) preserves the design of the apse, which is very unlike the usual conventional type. In the centre is our Lord enthroned, holding a book with an angel on either side. Below are seven small figures of the elders rising from their thrones, and casting their crowns at our Lord's feet. After the 9th century, during the fierce struggles of contending factions, by which the unhappy land was rent asunder, mosaic ceased entirely in Rome and in Italy generally. Its first revival was in the republic of Venice, where we find its earliest examples in the church of St. Cyprian at Murano, and on a most extensive scale and with the utmost gorgeousness of character at St. Mark's. These, however, are outside our chronological limits. The art was much later in its revival in Rome itself, where the earliest examples, evidently the work of Byzantine artists, belong to the 12th century. We may specially mention those of St. Mary, in Trastevere A.D. 1130–1143; St. Clement, A.D. 1250–1274; St. John Lateran, A.D. 1288–1294; the apse of St. Mary Major's, of the same date, and the external mosaics in the façade, A.D. 1292–1307. But on these also their late date forbids us to touch.

MOTHER CHURCH. (Ecclesia matrix, Matricularis, Matricialis, Mater Principalis, Diocesana, or Ecclesia per se.) We find all these epithets used during the early ages, and substantially in the same sense, viz. that of a principal and dignified church, having other churches dependent upon it. We may distinguish four distinct varieties of meaning in which this word is employed.

I. Of a church planted immediately by the apostles, from which other churches were afterwards derived and propagated. Thus Tertullian (de Praescript. cap. 21) calls the churches in which the apostles preached, either in person or by their epistles, by this name, and makes their traditions to be the rule of doctrine for the whole church: "constat proinde omnem doctrinam, quae cum illis ecclesiis apostolicis matricibus et originalibus fidei conspiret, veritati deputandam, id sine dubio tenentem, quod Ecclesiae ab Apostolis, Apostoli a Christo, Christus a Deo, suscepit." And in this sense the second general council of Constantinople called the church of Jerusalem the mother of all churches in the world, Τῆς δέ γε μητρὸς ἁπασῶν τῶν ἐκκλησιῶν. And the church of Arles is similarly called the mother church of France, because Trophimus its first bishop was supposed to have first preached the gospel in that country.

II. It denotes a metropolitan church, i. e. the principal church of an ecclesiastical province. Thus in the African canons (can. 119 or 120). "Si autem non fecit, non praejudicetur matrici, sed liceat, cum locus acceperit episcopum, quem non habebat, ex ipso die intra triennium repetere." And in can. 90 we meet with the phrase "matrices cathedrae," and Ferrandus Diaconus uses the simple term "matrices" to denote metropolitan and cathedral churches (Brev. cap. ii. 17, 38). Similarly Agobard (de Privilegio et Jure Sacerdotii, cap. 12), "nos ab ecclesiâ non recedimus, nec spernimus matrices ecclesias." But Ducange suggests that the reading here should be nutrices.

III. The term was also and more generally used of the chief church of a diocese, a cathedral, as distinguished from parish churches, committed to the charge of single presbyters, which were called tituli. Among the Greeks the former were known as καθολικαὶ = generales. Thus Epiphanius, in treating of the Arian heresy, calls the cathedral of Alexandria καθολικὴν. See also a canon of the council in Trullo (can. 58 or 59). In the African canons (can. 123), we find again the phrase: "si in matricibus cathedris episcopus negligens fuerit adversus haereticos, convenia'ur a vicinis episcopis." And in the same sense, can. 33, by which the bishop is forbidden to alienate or sell the property of his cathedral, and the presbyters that belonging to their parishes: "non habenti necessitatem, nec episcopo liceat matricis ecclesiae, nec presbytero rem tituli sui." The fifth council of Carthage (A.D. 401) calls the metropolitan church "principalis cathedra" (can. 5). It was termed the "mother church," and the rest of the churches in the diocese diocesan churches, ecclesiae dioecesanae; as in the 8th canon of the council of Tarraco (A.D. 516), which directs bishops to visit their dioceses every year, and ascertain that the churches were in good repair; which, continued the canon, we find not to be the case in all instances—"reperimus nonnullas dioecesanas ecclesias esse destitutas."

IV. The term mater or matrix is sometimes applied, at a later period, to parish churches also, as distinguished from chapels or other churches dependent ecclesiastically upon them. Thus pope Alexander III., in the Appendix to the third council (A.D. 1167) at the Lateran (pars i. cap. 7): "nec eos duas matrices ecclesias, quarum unam sufficere sibi videbitis, tenere permittatis," where it is apparently equivalent to ecclesia baptismalis, a church in which baptisms were administered, which is one way of describing a parish church, as in Walafrid Strabo (de Rebus Ecclesiasticis, c. 30), "Presbyteri plebium, qui baptismales ecclesias tenent, et minoribus presbyteris praesunt." And similarly a charter of Hugh Capet mentions two churches existing in a particular place: "quarum una est mater ecclesia, in honore B. Remigii, et alia capella in honore S. Germani." This distinction was one commonly existing, and clearly recognised. The mother church was considered as a church per se, i. e. owing obedience to no other; having its own presbyter, and so distinguished from chapels, which were probably always served from the parish church. [ORATORY.] In illustration of this we may quote from a letter of Hincmar of Rheims (Ep. 7): "dicunt enim quia ex quo memorari ab his qui in carne sunt potest, quoniam ipsa ecclesia per se fuit semper, nulli alteri ecclesiae fuit subjecta. . . . Evidentibus documentis invenerunt, quod ipsa ecclesia de Follanaebraio nunquam ecclesiae in Codicinco fuerit subjecta, sed presbyterum semper habuerit."

MOURNERS. [PENITENCE.]

MOURNING. Outward signs of grief at the loss of friends, either by (a) formal lamentation, (b) change of attire, or (c) seclusion from society. The mourning of the disciples after our Lord's crucifixion and death (Mark xvi. 10), that of the devout men at the burial of Stephen (Acts viii. 2), and that of the widows on the death of Dorcas (ib. ix. 39) are passages that have been cited to shew that demonstrations of grief on such occasions were not regarded by the primitive Church as inconsistent with the Christian theory of the future life of the faithful. The language of St. Paul (1 Thess. iv. 13) probably indicates the character of the Church's teaching in relation to the question during the first three centuries; such losses being viewed as occasions for natural sorrow, tempered however by a firm belief in the joyous resurrection of the departed and their future reunion with their friends. Upon the bereaved Christian the Church enjoined neither a stoical disguising of all emotion nor a formal affectation of grief.

The earlier Christians appear to have condemned even a change of attire as a relic of paganism; and it is certain that many practices —such as the custom on the part of relatives to walk with the head bare, the women with their hair dishevelled and beating the breast, the hiring of female mourners (praeticae), who lamented and sang naenia or songs in praise of the dead, and of lictors dressed in black, corresponding to the modern mute, the observance of a definite period of mourning, during which time it was regarded as indecorous for the relatives of the deceased to appear in public—are all distinctly traceable to Jewish or pagan precedents. Traditional observance, however, often prevailed over religious conviction; and, speaking generally, actual practice appears to have been somewhat at variance with the more enlightened teaching of the Church. The authority of the most eminent among the Fathers is clearly condemnatory of such displays. St. Cyprian disapproves of excessive lamentation and black attire: "desiderari eos debere, non plangi, nec accipiendas esse hic atras vestes, quando illi ibi indumenta alba jam sumpserint, occasionem dandam non esse gentilibus ut nos merito ac jure reprehendant quod quos vivere apud Deum dicimus, ut extinctos et perditos lugeamus, et fidem quam sermone et voce depromimus cordis et pectoris testimonio non probemus" (Lib. de Mortal. Migne, iv. 234). The language of St. Zeno, bishop of Verona in the following century, shews that it was still customary for widows to indulge in displays of excessive grief. In a dissuasive against second marriages among this class, he adverts, though without direct censure, to the rending of the hair over the corpse, lacerated cheeks, "livore foedata ubera," the mourner "coelum ipsum ululatibus rumpens," as ordinary expressions of sorrow on the part of widows (Migne, xl. 305). The authority of St. Chrysostom is emphatically pronounced against such excesses. In addressing an audience, he says, "Thenceforth therefore let no one beat the breast, or wail, or impugn Christ's victory. For He conquered death. And why dost thou, O mourner, weep without measure? This state (τὸ πρᾶγμα) is but a sleep. Why dost thou lament and utter cries? For if even the Gentiles ("Ελληνες) were wont thus to do, it ought but to move us to scorn (καταγελᾶν ἔδει, in evident allusion to Matt. ix. 24, καὶ κατεγέλων αὐτοῦ). But if the faithful dishonour themselves by such practices, what excuse can they plead? For how canst thou expect to be forgiven who actest thus foolishly, and that too when Christ has so long been risen and the proofs of His resurrection are so clear? But thou, as though seeking to magnify thy offence, bringest in praeficae (θρηνῳδοὺς Ἑλληνίδας γυναῖκας), that thou mayst add fuel to thy grief and stir up the furnace of affliction; and heedest not the words of St. Paul, 'What concord hath Christ with Belial? or what part hath he that believeth with an infidel?'" (Homil. 31; Migne, Series Graeca, lvii. 374). This passage can hardly be understood otherwise than as implying that the practices condemned were prevalent in the Church in Chrysostom's time. The final conclusion of the homily is that the Christian ought not to mourn for the relative who has been removed from the calamities of life, nor even, with the prospect of future reunion, to grieve over a temporary separation. The passage is quoted in confirmation of his own view by John of Damascus in his Sacra Parallela, "De mortuis, et quod eorum causa non sit lugendum" (Migne, Series Graeca, xcvi. 543); see also a sermon attributed to Chrysostom by the Benedictine editors (ib. xl. 1166), in which the conduct of Horatius on receiving the intelligence of his son's death (Livy, ii. 8) is cited with approval.

St. Jerome holds similar language. In writing to one Julianus, a man of wealth, who in the lapse of a few days had not only lost his wife and two daughters by death, but also a considerable portion of his property through an invasion of the barbarians, he says, "laudent ergo te alii ... quod laeto vultu mortes tuleris filiarum, quod in quadragesimo die dormitionis earum lugubrem vestem mutaveris, et dedicatio ossium martyris candida tibi vestimenta reddiderit, ut non sentires dolorem orbitatis tuae, quem civitas universa sentiret, sed ad triumphum martyris exultares; quod sanctissimam conjugem tuam non quasi mortuam sed quasi proficiscentem deduxeris" (Epist. cxvii. Migne, xxii. 794).

It is, however, unquestionable that by many somewhat different views were held. A passage in one of the Apostolical Constitutions, belonging, it is conjectured, to the period intervening between the age of Cyprian and that of Chrysostom, shews that a more definite and formal observance of certain rites was already recognised and inculcated by the Church, though the passage probably indicates the practice of the East rather than of the West [APOST. CONST. p. 125]. A short religious service, whereby it was designed not so much to lament as to commemorate the deceased, is here directed to be held on the third, ninth, and fortieth days after the day of death, the anniversary of the day to be observed by a distribution of alms to the poor. Ἐπιτελείσθω δὲ τρίτα τῶν κεκοιμημένων, ἐν ψαλμοῖς καὶ ἀναγνώνεσι καὶ προσευχαῖς, διὰ τὸν διὰ τριῶν ἡμερῶν ἐγερθέντα. καὶ ἔννατα, εἰς ὑπόμνησιν τῶν περιόντων καὶ τῶν κεκοιμημένων· καὶ τεσσαρακοστὰ, κατὰ τὸν παλαιὸν τύπον· Μωσῆν γὰρ οὕτως ὁ λαὸς ἐκένθησε· καὶ ἐνιαύσια, ὑπὲρ μνείας αὐτοῦ. καὶ διδόσθω ἐκ τῶν ὑπαρχόντων αὐτοῦ, πένησιν εἰς ἀνάμνησιν αὐτοῦ (Const. Apost. viii. 42; Cotelerius, i. 424). The repetition of such observances on the ninth day (corresponding to the Greek ἔνατα, Lat, novendiulia) appears to have had only pagan precedent, and is accordingly condemned by St. Augustine, who considers that the observance of the other days is in conformity with Scriptural usage. "Nescio utrum inveniatur alicui sanctorum in Scripturis celebratum esse luctum novem dies, quod apud Latinos Novendial appellant. Unde mihi videntur ab hac consuetudine prohibendi, si qui Christianorum istum in mortuis suis numerum servant, qui magis est in Gentilium consuetudine. Septimus vero dies auctoritatem in Scripturis habet: unde alio loco scriptum est, Luctus mortui septem dierum; fatui autem omnes dies vitae ejus (Eccles. xxii. 15). Septenarius autem numerus propter sabbati sacramentum praecipue quietis indicium est; unde merito mortuis tanquam requiescentibus exhibetur" (Quaest. in Heptateuch. i. 172; Migne, xxxiv. 596). St. Ambrose, in his Oratio de obitu Theodosii (ann. 375), says, "Ejus ergo principis et proxime conclamavimus obitum, et nunc quadragesimam celebramus, assistente sacris altaribus Honorio principe; quia sicut sanctus Joseph patri suo quadraginta diebus humationis officia detulit, ita et hic Theodosio patri justa persolvit. Et quia alii tertium diem et trigesimum alii septimum et quadragesimum observare consueverunt, quid doceat lectio consideremus." He then quotes Gen. l. 2, and adds, "Haec ergo sequenda solemnitas quae praescribit lectio;" quoting again Deut. xxxiv. 8, he says, "Utraque ergo observatio habet auctoritatem."

Tertullian (de Corona, c. 3) speaks of offerings in memory of the departed, "oblationes pro defunctis," as customary on the anniversary of their death; and Evodius, bishop of Uzala, in 414, when giving an account of the obsequies of a young Christian, says, "per triduum hymnis Dominum collaudavimus super sepulchrum ipsius, et redemptionis sacramenta tertio die obtulimus" (Epist. clviii. Migne, xxxiii. 694). This passage is adduced, apparently with little reason, by Martigny (Dict. des Antiq. Chrét. art. DEUIL) as evidence that offerings for the repose of the soul of the departed were authorised by the church.

The contrast of Christian to pagan sentiment in relation to the subject is perhaps strongest in the manifestations of joy and exultation [BURIAL OF THE DEAD, p. 252] with which the relatives and friends followed the body to the grave. These demonstrations were, however, widely different from the spirit in which some barbarous nations (e.g. the Thracians, the earlier inhabitants of Marseilles) often conducted their funeral rites.

The latter indulged in unseemly riot and revelry. The feelings of the early Christians resembled rather those of the ancient Cimbri, who were wont to rejoice over friends fallen in battle (Amm. Marcell. II. vi. 2), and such demonstrations appear to have been confined to (α) the obsequies of a martyr, (β) those of some distinguished benefactor of the Church, (γ) those of an ecclesiastic of superior rank and eminent piety. Jerome, speaking of the funeral of Fabiola, says, "totius urbis populus ad exsequias congregabat; sonabant psalmi, et aurata tecta templorum in sublime quatiebat Alleluia" (Migne, xxii. 466). A decree attributed to pope Eutychianus directs that no martyr shall be interred without a purple undergarment (sine colobo purpureo), the emblem of his service in the cause of his divine Master (ib. v. 158–161). Gregory of Tours, in recording the burial of St. Lupicinus, says, "celebratis missis, cum summo honore gaudioque sepultus est." The office for the burial of a bishop in the time of Gregory the Great appears to have included the singing of the Hallelujah (Migne, lxxviii. 478, 479); and the singing of hymns when conveying the dead to the place of interment seems to have been an invariable accompaniment. Victor Vitensis, in describing the condition of the faithful during the occupation by the Vandals, ann. 487, says, "Quis vero sustineat, ac possit sine lacrumis recordari, cum praecieperet nostrorum corpora defunctorum sine solemnitate hymnorum, cum silentio ad sepulturam perduci" (Hist. Persecut. Vand. I. v.; Migne, lviii. 5). The Pseudo-Dionysius, which may be regarded as of some authority with respect to the theory of the Eastern church in the 5th century, inculcates the observance of distinctions in the funeral rites of the unconverted and of the righteous, corresponding to the sentiments proper to their different careers. Their lives have differed, and so their manner of encountering death must differ. The righteous man, who has not given himself up a slave to corrupt passions and criminal excesses, is filled with joy at the prospect of completing his course of trial. Similarly, his relatives, on his completion of that course, pronounce him happy (μακαρίζουσι, πρὸς τὸ νικηφόρον εὐκταίως ἀφικόμενον τέλος) and glorify Him who has given the victory, hoping that they themselves may come to a like end. These sentiments find, in turn, fitting expression in the actual rites [BURIAL, p. 254]; OBSEQUIES (De Eccles. Hierarch. c. 7; Migne, Series Graeca, iii. 263–265).

Undue parade and excess of adornment are censured by St. Jerome. Writing to the mother of Blaesilla, a convert who had died shortly after her conversion, he says, "ex more parantur exequiae, et nobilium ordine praeeunte, aureum feretro velamen obtenditur. Videbatur mihi tunc clamare de coelo: non agnosco vestes, amictus iste non est meus; hic ornatus alienus est" (Migne, xxii. 177). The language of St. Augustine (de Civit. Dei, i. 13) is that of one who looks upon details of ceremonial of this character as of little or no importance. At the third council of Carthage (A.D. 397), at which he was present, the practice of placing the Eucharist between the lips of the defunct was condemned. The ceremony of bidding the deceased farewell, probably by the kiss of peace, was condemned in the 6th century at the council of Auxerre.

The custom of remaining within doors, secluded from society, during the first week of mourning is traced by Buxtorf (Lex. Chald. Talm. ad v. Luctus) to Jewish precedent. Under Valentinian and Theodosius, it was enacted that a widow marrying again within a year from the time of the death of the husband "probrosis inustа notis, honestioris nobilisque personae et decore et jure privetur, atque omnia quae de prioris mariti bonis vel jure sponsaliorum vel judicio defuncti conjugis consecuta fuerat, amittat et sciat nec de nostro beneficio vel annotatione sperandum sibi esse subsidium" (Cod. Theodosianus, ed. Hänel, iii. 8). This law is evidently a reflex of Roman rather than Christian sentiment (see Ovid, Fasti, iii. 134; Zedler, Universal-Lexicon, s. v. Trauerjahr).

The tolling of the bell at the time of death, which is regarded by some as a tradition from paganism, and designed originally to drive away evil spirits, does not appear as a Christian usage before the 8th century [OBSEQUIES OF THE DEAD], and was more probably intended as a signal for prayer. MUNERARIUS. With the Romans, munus, in one of its senses, denoted a show of gladiators, and the person who paid the expenses of such a show and presided at it (edebat) was called editor, dominus, munerator or munerarius, and was honoured during the day of exhibition, even if a private person, with the official ensigns of a magistrate. [Dict. of Gr. and Roman Antiq. art. 'Gladiatores.']

From the very first, the church stigmatized these shows as cruel and debasing, and withdrew, as far as her power extended, all Christians from any share in or responsibility for them. [GLADIATORS, p. 728.] Tertullian (Apol. cap. 44) refers to such games as employing multitudes of criminals and of the lowest class of people, but among them no Christians; if there were any, that they were sent there simply for being Christians. That a Christian could possibly himself be a munerarius does not seem to have even occurred to him. De vestris [i.e. heathen] semper aestuat carcer, de vestris semper metalla suspirant, de vestris semper bestiae saginantur, de vestris semper munerarii noxiorum greges pascunt, nemo illic Christianus, nisi plane tantum Christianus, aut si et aliud, jam non Christianus." And the council of Elvira (A.D. 305), in its third canon, orders that those Christians who had taken upon them the office of flamen, to which it belonged to exhibit these games, if they had offered the sacrifices to the heathen gods which were customary, were never to be received again to communion, even at the hour of death; and such as did this, but avoided the sacrifice, were put to life-long penance, and only admitted to communion at the hour of death, after satisfactory proof of their penitence. A similar feeling governed the enactment in the 56th canon of the same synod, that all Christians who took upon them the city magistracy or duumvirate (to which office, also, it belonged to exhibit such shows) should be repelled from communion during the whole year in which they held office. Another somewhat deeper shade of blame is attached to those who were present on such occasions, and wore the crown or garland for the sacrifice (comp. Acts xiv. 13), but had neither actually sacrificed nor paid any portion of the expense. Such were readmitted to communion after two years' penance (can. 55). It is to be noticed that such provisions are not repeated by later synods; and probably they were rendered needful by a mere temporary phase of the conflict between Christianity and heathenism; when the newer faith, while yearly growing and already stronger in numbers than the paganism which it was supplanting, had for a while to deal with a social system in which the latter was recognized as the religion of the state. But, in fact, a very few years later (A.D. 313) Christianity was itself established as the religion of the Roman empire by Constantine. Nevertheless the gladiatorial shows lingered on until the reign of the emperor Honorius, almost a hundred years later, and were only then abolished through the self-sacrifice of the monk Telemachus (A.D. 404).

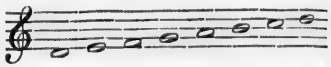
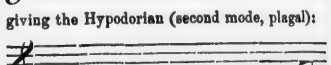
MUSIC.—For the first thousand years of the Christian era, the antique Greek system of music was adopted, with but few alterations, and those chiefly modifications of the compass of the scale, and of the notation. In the article on AMBROSIAN MUSIC, the matter (so far as chants are concerned) is taken down to the 4th century. Through the influence of St. Ambrose, all music but that consisting of a diatonic sequence of notes [see CANON] was discarded; the other methods had been considered preferable, perhaps on account of the difficulty in performing such music, or from reminiscences of an Oriental origin; and with the subsequent irruptions of the barbarians, which must have operated very seriously against the cultivation of any but ecclesiastical music, they became obsolete.

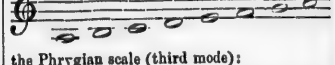
GREGORIAN CHANT.—It was observed by St. Gregory, a great musician of his time, that the Ambrosian chants, handed down traditionally to a great extent, had become corrupted; he therefore subjected them to revision, and added other modes and scales to those four which St. Ambrose had retained. This was done by taking away the upper tetrachord from the Ambrosian scales, and placing it below the lower tetrachord. The octaves thus formed were called from the previous scales, with the prefix hypo (ὑπό), thus: Hypodorian, Hypophrygian, Hypolydian, and Hypomixolydian. They were also called Plagal, while the four original ones were called Authentic. Thus in the Tonarius Reginonis Prumensis (middle of 9th century) we find them called "Authenticus protus; ii. Plaga proti; Tonus tertius autenticus: Tonus quartus, plaga deuteri; Differentie v. toni autenticus tritus; Differentie sexti toni plaga triti; Differentie vii. toni autenticus tetrarchus; Incipiunt viii. toni plaga tetrarchi." Thus we have the Dorian scale (first mode):



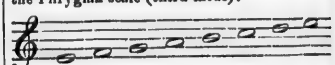
giving the Hypodorian (second mode, plagal):



the Phrygian scale (third mode):

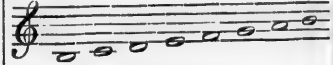


giving the Hypophrygian scale (fourth mode, plagal):

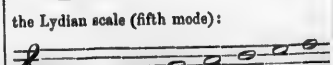


the Lydian scale (fifth mode):

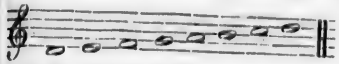
giving the Hypolydian scale (sixth mode, plagal):



and the Mixolydian scale (seventh mode):



giving the Hypomixolydian scale (eighth mode, plagal):



But it seems that the compass of chants was expected to be confined within five or six notes, and those which are generally accepted as typical examples in the odd modes are certainly not so much within such limits as those in the even modes, which points to the supposition that St. Ambrose's chants had become so altered that the originals were probably forgotten in most instances: in the first mode, for example, b flat is generally found, whereas it is not in the scale, and certainly some very early copies of chants in this mode have assigned the b without any indication; it is, however, hard to imagine but that it was sung b flat. It must be borne in mind that the system of chanting being a monotone with an ornamental end, there are in every one of these scales two important notes: the Dominant, or prevailing note on which the psalm was sung, and the Final, on which the chant was made to end. These, in the Ambrosian modes, are respectively: Proti a, D; Deuteri c, E; Triti c, F; Tetrardi d, G. In the plagal modes, the same finals, D, E, F, G, were kept, and the dominants placed lower, F, a, a, c. The first mode approximates the most nearly in effect to our modern minor mode: the fifth, to our major mode with its fourth sharpened; the seventh and eighth, to our modern major mode. The sixth, although it consists of the notes now forming the natural scale of C, is really in the tonality of F. Our modern use of the terms authentic and plagal, as applied to cadences, seems derived from the seventh and eighth modes, which are authentic and plagal, from taking the dominant and final in each of them and placing a common chord on them in succession. The authentic (or odd) modes will appear to have their finals as the lowest note in the scales; sometimes, but rarely, melodies written in them have been found to descend a note below this: whereas in the even plagal modes the scale itself descended below the final, and the melodies seldom exceeded a fifth above it; whence the line, "Vult descendere par, sed scandere vult modus impar."

"Majores toni, i.e. autentici, scil. primus et tertius, quintus et septimus possunt descendere una voce a fine et ascendere octo. Minores autem toni, i.e. plagales, viz. secundus et quartus, sextus et octavus possunt ascendere v. vocibus et descendere v., quod patet his versibus:

"Majores a fine toni descendere possunt.
Ad primas voces ascendunt vocibus octo.
Ad quintas voces scandunt a fine minores.
Ad quintas etiam possunt descendere voces."

Coussemaker, vol. II.

There is very little direct evidence in the first eight centuries as to what the chants were, but a good deal of indirect evidence from various tracts of the centuries immediately following, in many of which the author speaks of the chants as having come down to him from great antiquity. The great musical epoch that parts mediæval music from the antique is that of Guido Aretinus (11th century): and he asserts that there was a musical usage of 200 years and upwards at his time.

It appears that a distinction was drawn in the accommodating of chants to the psalms, the introits, the communions, and the responsories. All these appear in the Tonarius Reginonis Prumensis (9th century), and with the beginnings appear the musical notation, which presents an appearance more like shorthand writing than anything else; a kind of attempt to render visible the pitch of sounds. These same appear also in Guido Aretinus, with notation substantially the same as our present one; so also in the Intonarium attributed to abbat Oddo and believed by Guido Aretinus to be his. In some of these appears a more elaborate form, appropriated to the Canticles Magnificat and Benedictus. The various forms of beginning the antiphons were called Differentiæ, and these had appropriated to them different "endings" of the psalm-chant. One antiphon, ingeniously chosen to fix the mode, is given as a specimen, with a pneuma at the end of it, and intended to be committed to memory: and these have, in the Tonarius Reginonis, been added by a later hand.

There are five differentiæ of the first tone in Regino: nine in abbat Oddo, and twelve in Guido Aretinus. The following is the description given in the last-named author:

Protus adest, denis formarum nexus habenis
Que modum nectunt autentum undique totum:
He tibi sint cordi, jugiter habeantur in ore;
Has queso ne minuas; poteris si addere curas.

Diverso numero pollet non nomine tantum
Hic protus: proprias conceptus habere figuras.
Quas nec miscuit autento primo ordine fixo.
Consimili voce discordet recto tenore.

It would appear then that the first mode was allowed a compass up to d, and down to B, or perhaps more probably down to C, with the power of using b flat or b natural; i.e. using the synemmenon or diezeugmenon tetrachord at pleasure, which would have been, in the latter part of the ages we have under consideration, written b or ♮.

The second mode is thus described:

Plagarum tropi sociantur rite secundi;
Autentas formas retinent, semperque minores:
In quibus et proti primum contexere plagis
Libuit, ut recto succedant tramite cuncti
Ardua hic spernit, media et graviora resumit,
Et se per duplas patitur constringere formas.

thus giving two "endings;" but the former is evidently transposed, and requires b flat. In Regino and Oddo there is but one differentia of this tone, namely the usual ending, but with the accent differently placed; Messrs. Doran and Nottingham have placed it thus in their Psalter.

The third mode (Authentus Deuteri):

Phrygius modus est protus hypolydius deuterus estque
Hic aliter modus nescit distinguere vocum.
Hic resonant cetus tantum spiramina quinto.
Hic graditer sexto nec horum lege tenetur.

Five endings are given in Guido:

I.

II.

III.

IV.

V.

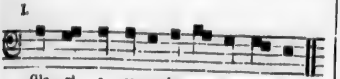
The first of these does not appear in Odde in Regino there are five differentiæ.

The fourth mode (Deuterus Plagis):

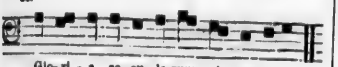
"Deuterus in quinis subactus congrue piris
Ipsius adstrictim curratur ordine plagis
Que quondam lembis cantus fulvare novenis,
Immensus pelagus multi quoque ciere motus
Consuit in cenis graditer inclita tribus adeptis."

and the following six endings are given by Guido:

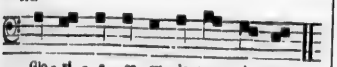
I.



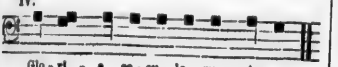
II.



III.

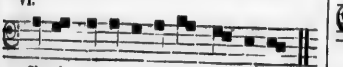


IV.



V.

VI.

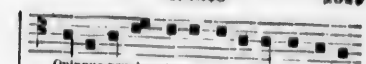


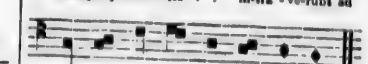
In Oddo, four endings are given, including the first and fourth of these: the other two differ somewhat: six differentiæ are specified in Regino.

The fifth mode (authentus tritus):

"Troporum quintus tritus agricole dictus
Insequitur splendens croceo rubroque colore
Hic monstrat ceteros super signacula notos
Deuterum et protum subscripto ordine primum
Claviger ac fortis reserat sic ostia vocis."

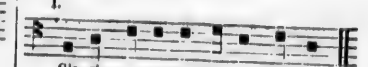
The allusion in the second of these lines is to a practice which was extensively adopted after the invention of the stave, of using a red line for that on which F was situated, and a yellow or golden line for C, in place of clefs; C is the dominant and F the final of this mode.



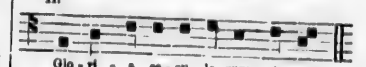


Guido gives three endings:

I.



II.



III.

In Oddo only the first two of these are given; in Regino three differentiæ are noticed.

The sixth mode (plagis triti):

"Simplicior casus quam strictas possidet amplas
Tertia plagarum districte et prima sub una Regula formarum variisque insistere vocum
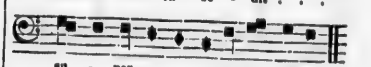
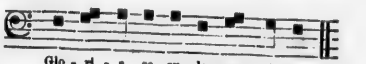
Ordinibusque solent fusca colorare alieno
Sub modulo trium referetur tertia vocum."



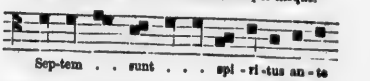
There is only one ending given in Guido and Oddo, viz.:

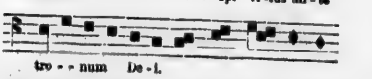


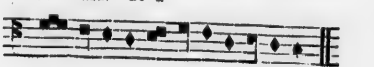
and one differentia in Regino.

The seventh mode (tetrardus authentus):

"Ultimus authentum tetrardus grece vocatur
Corpore d-tractas in cujus reddere formas
Perplacuit certis, valeant quo ciere phtongis
Pullulat ex proto et trito nam sub super hisque."

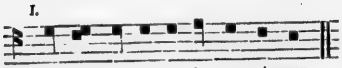






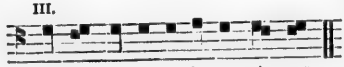
Guido gives the following endings:

I.

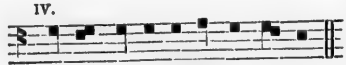


II.

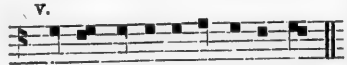
III.



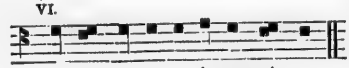
IV.



V.



VI.



VII.

VIII.

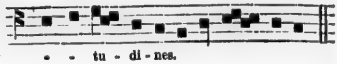
IX.

The penultimate note in II. would seem to be an error for a.

Oddo gives six endings, viz. the first, fifth, sixth, and seventh of these; one which is substantially identical with III., and one with which IV. would be identical if the three last notes are written in error for c, b, a. Regino specifies six differentiae.

The eighth mode (plagis tetrardi):

"Hinc plagis sequitur certoque fine tenetur
Nomen habens proprium toto de termine vocum
Namque alii qui ibi sunt quarti quintique locati
Unde magis melum datur variabile in ipsos,
Nescius ast horum fertur stricti-sime rectus
Octavus ponitur subsuper, hicque vocatur
Ut nomen loca sic mutat per climata nunquam."



Guido gives four endings:

I.

II.

III.

IV.

Oddo recognises three differentiae, the first of which is identical with III. above, the third is the ending commonly known and nearly identical with IV., and the second is "the Peregrine Tone;" why it should ever have been classed under the eighth mode is inexplicable to the writer; he thinks it naturally belongs to the first: the beginnings of antiphons given in Oddo are certainly more akin to those of the first mode than to the eighth.

No b flat is here indicated, though it would seem most probable that it was used, as in the first mode above, where it is not written.

This renders the verses more obscure, in the third and fourth lines, which the writer thinks must be intended to refer to the variation between b flat and b natural. Perhaps however Guido would not include this chant under the eighth mode in consequence of its using a b flat.

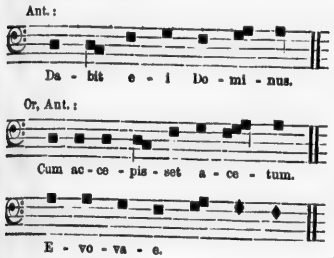
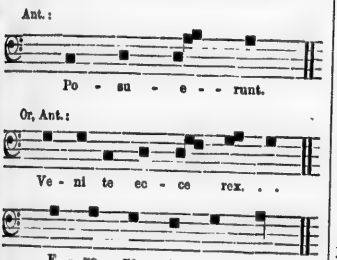
In Regino three differentiae of this tone are recognised.

As stated above, the endings of the tones were not taken arbitrarily (as is done so commonly at the present time), but depended upon the beginning of the antiphon used with the psalms. In the works here cited, a list of antiphons occur under each differentia, some of which are supplied with musical notation, and the others apparently left for the cantor to sing in like manner.

Thus in abbat Oddo, in the first tone, when the antiphon began on D, the first ending given above was used, thus:



When the Antiphon began on C or on g descending to C, the ninth ending was used;

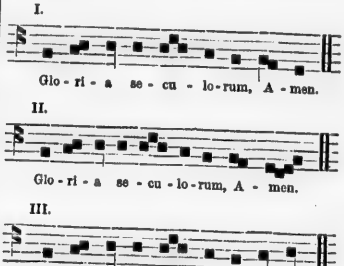


And so in other cases.

Of course in the Intonarium of abbat Oddo, the music was indicated by a notation different from the modern one: although it appears with the stave and notes, these must have been added by Guido Aretinus when he revised, or edited, the work. And at the head of every tone or mode, before the antiphons, occur the words NONANNEANE, or NOEACIS; with some slight variations: these are supplied with musical characters, and appear to be artificial words to assist the memory of the singer in making the proper inflections, something after the manner of EVOVAE q. v.): the former of these belong to the authentic modes (first, third, fifth, seventh), the latter to the plagal modes.

In Regino and in Guido are to be found forms for the introits and the communions, which differ in some respects from those already mentioned, generally being fuller, requiring more 'singing' than recitation.

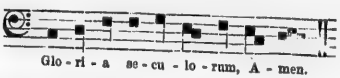
In the first mode, Guido gives the following for introits:



and for communions the first and third of these.

In Regino three differentiae for introits and one for communions appear.

In the second mode Guido gives the following form for both introits and communions:



No more differentiae are to be found in Regino.

In the third mode, for introits Guido gives the forms:

For communions, he gives (II.) again, and which may be thought an error for (I.) above; but the error, if any, may quite as well be the other way. In Regino, two differentiae for introits, and one for communions appear.

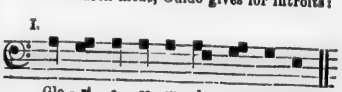
In the fourth mode, Guido gives for introits:



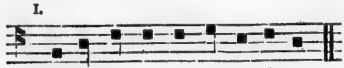
II.

III.

and the first of these for communions also. In Regino, there are two differentiae for introits, and one for communions.

In the fifth mode, for introits the following two forms appear in Guido, the first of them also for communions:

I.

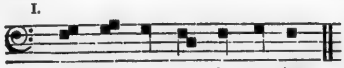


II.

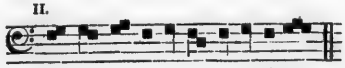
This appears to agree with Regino.

In the sixth mode, Guido gives two introit forms:

I.



II.

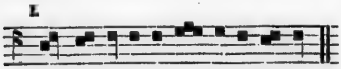


and for communions:

only one form for each appears to be recognised by Regino.

In the seventh mode, Guido gives two introit forms:

I.



II.

and two communion forms:

I.

Only one of each is recognised in Regino.

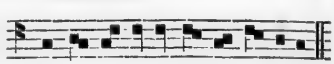
In the eighth tone, Guido gives the following for introits:

I.

II.

The former of these appears to have a pneuma added to it.

For communions:



Only one of each is recognised in Regino.

Besides these, Guido gives one elaborate form of a chant for the Gloria Patri in each mode: it is preceded by a response and a versicle. These responses appear in Regino, for the most part: but in that work it is professedly a selection of them only that is given.

The Intonarium of abbat Oddo concludes with a short "Modus Intonandi Psalmos," professing to be then of an antiquity of two centuries and upwards: the following complete forms for the tones appear; they are as given below, with an example "Dixit Dominus" (Ps. 110):

The G before the last three notes has been accidentally omitted, as it is given in his examples. Here we have the 'intonation' at the beginning, and the 'mediation' ("sic elevatur,") and the 'ending': besides this an 'inflection' appears; but it does not seem quite clear how this is to be used.

The tenor clef here seems put by mistake for the bass.

The last five notes of this have been placed a line or space too high, as appears from the examples: they should be F, G, a, G, F.

From the examples the notes e, d, c, at "sic e-le-" should be f, e, d.

A more florid form was adopted for the Magnificat and Benedictus, in this work of the abbat's, and has been continued in later authors:

I.

II.

III.

IV.

V.

VI.

This ending is misplaced a line or space too low, as appears from the psalm 'Dixit Dominus' given with it.

VII.

VIII.

There is no indication here whether the b in the first tone is flat or natural: but probably the flat would be taken, in the synemmenon tetrachord of the Dorian mode.

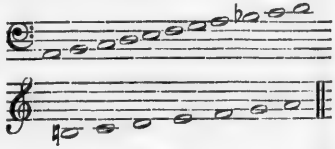
Amongst the early authors preserved by abbé Gerbert occurs Aurelian; he lived in the ninth century, and he gives the following varieties in the several tones:

Tone.	Introits.	Offertories.	Communions.	Responsories.	Antiphons.	Invitatories.	Total.
I.	3	1	2	6	5	—	17
II.	1	1	1	2	1	—	6
III.	2	1	1	2	4	2	12
IV.	2	1	1	5	5	4	18
V.	2	1	1	2	1	2	9
VI.	1	1	1	4	1	—	8
VII.	2	1	3	3	11	2	21
VIII.	1	1	1	4	5	—	12

It appears also that occasionally the modes in Antiphons were changed, i.e. an Antiphon would begin in one mode and end in another. This is what is called in Euclid commutation or modulation (μεταβολή), for example changing from Dorian into Phrygian, or the like. Thus in the Tonarius Reginonis Prumensis, under the first tone we find to the antiphon "Domine salva nos, perimus," the note "Finit[ur] iiij tono;" and under the 2nd tone to "Cum indurerent" and "Primum audisset Job" is the note "Ton. j potest esse." And so in Guido Aretinus, "Sunt preterea plurime antiphonarum que hujus videntur formule [third tone] cum sint ex autento proto et prima voce: sic est Pulchra es et inter quas quidem autenti deuteri faciunt, non bene tonorum semitoniorumque positionem intuentes: vel idcirco eas deuteri faciunt quidam quibusdam D, E, F, et G, finales constitute in omnibus omnino modis vel vocum tropis indifferenter et improvide sint." Again under Tone 6: "Iste due communiones que sequuntur, i. e. Panem de celo et Anima nostra proprie sunt de quinto tono et de secunda differentia. Multa responsoria sunt ex isto modo que magis finiuntur in tetrardo quam in trito, sicut est Ego sum id quod sum." So J. M. Neale (De Sequentiis ad H. A. Daniel Epistola) mentions some MSS. containing a list of sequences &c., in which occurs the word "Frigdola," applied to melodies, as some other adjectives are in the MS.: of which he says, "Frigdola vel Frigdora facilius agnoscit etymon: idem enim vult atque Phrygo-Doricum, i.e. Tonus primus mixtus cum tertio." One of the best known examples of this practice is the old melody of the Te Deum, usually attributed to St. Ambrose; which is in the third and fourth modes combined: and this fact would lead us to conclude that the melody had undergone some change since St. Ambrose's time, as the fourth mode was not then in use, unless indeed the tradition of it may have varied, which is quite possible, and may have had some weight in inducing St. Gregory to add the four plagal modes.

The chief authors used here are those mentioned, and reference has been made also to later ones, such as St. Bernard (Tonale), Peter de Cruce, Walter de Odyngton, John de Muris, Hucbaldus, &c., preserved in the collections of abbé Gerbert and M. de Coussemaker. The most valuable authority (probably) is the treatise of Gabriel Nivers (Paris, 1685) which the writer has in vain endeavoured to meet with: it is mentioned in Sir John Hawkins' History of Music as the most exhaustive book on the subject published up to that time, and seems to have been pretty well known then.

MUSICAL NOTATION.—During the first six centuries of the Christian era the Greek musical notation was in universal use, and indeed the knowledge of it was kept up as late as the time of John de Muris (c. 1320). This notation was exceedingly complicated, being at first sight purely arbitrary, and scarcely reducible to any law. This is the more extraordinary, as some instances can be observed which indicate the acquaintance possessed by the ancients with the property of the octave which has caused sounds separated by that interval to be now called by the same name. Referring to Smith's Dictionary of Antiquities it will be seen that the different modes, Dorian &c., were ultimately, at any rate, nothing more than transpositions of the 'greater system' of two octaves:



and they were determined by the pitch of the Proslambanomenos, the lowest note, an octave below the Mese.

These are mentioned in Euclid's Introductio Harmonica. But the most important work for this purpose is the tract of Alypius, published by Meibomius amongst the Antiquæ Musicæ Auctores Septem: this consists of a short preface, a mere résumé of Euclid's Introductio, and a catalogue of all the notes in every mode. There were five principal modes, the Dorian, Iastian, Phrygian, Æolian, and Lydian: these had for their Proslambanomeni respectively and five others, named from the above with the prefix Hyper, whose Proslambanomeni were and five others, named from the first with the prefix Hypo, whose Proslambanomeni were

The Proslambanomenos of the Hypodorian mode was supposed to be the lowest sound producible by the human voice (βόμβος, Eucl. sect. Can. Theor. 19). Meibomius arranged all the diatonic notes in a tabular form (as also all the chromatic notes, and the enharmonic notes), but the overlapping of the synemmenon and diezeugmenon tetrachords has caused his diagrams to be rather obscure.

The writer has combined the whole set, without this disadvantage; but it was impossible to introduce them here without interfering with the convenience of the book.

The following notes, being those of the diatonic Dorian mode, are given as an example.

Proslambanomenos	(our A),	И	(antinu and double π).
Hypate hypaton	(B),	—	(ι sideways, and ε written square).
Parhypate hypaton	(C),	Ɛ	(half θ, looking downwards, and ε square, inverted).
Lichanos hypaton	(D),	∇	(δ inverted, and τ sideways, reversed).
Hypate meson	(E),	Ω	(the left half of μ).
Parhypate meson	(F),	Ψ	(half μ inverted).
Lichanos meson	(G),	Τ	(digamma reversed).
Mese	(a),	Π	(ς reversed).
Trite synemmenon	(b ♭)	Ο
Paranete synemmenon	(c),	Κ	(half δ extended).
Nete synemmenon	(d),	Η	(λ sideways, reversed).
Paramese	(b ♮),	Μ	(π extended).
Trite diezeugmenon	(c),	Λ	(half δ inverted).
Paranete diezeugmenon	(d),	Η
Nete diezeugmenon	(e),	Γ
Trite hyperboleon	(f),	Β	(the acute accent).
Paranete hyperboleon	(g),	Ж	(χ with a line through it, διεφθορός, and the left half of a looking down).
Nete hyperboleon	(a a),	Τ	(τ inverted, and the right half of a looking up).

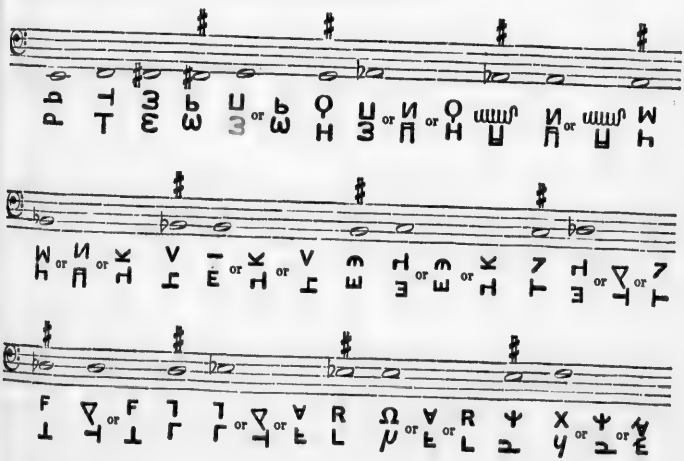
The following are the notes with their present equivalents:



The symbols here given are formed from the Greek letters:

A	Α	(the right and left halves of the letter made "to look up or down").
B	Β	(β imperfect).
Γ	Γ	(γ inverted).
Δ	Δ	(δ imperfect, and lengthened).
E	Ε	(ε written square).
Z	Ζ	(imperfect).

Η Ͱ ⊦ ⊥ (imperfect), Ч ("careless," ἀμελητικόν).
Θ ⊖ (half of the letter).
Ι ⊣ Κ ⋊ ⋊
Λ ⋁ > <
Μ Ν Ϻ Ϻ ⋀ (the halves of the letter).
Ν И (antinu).
Ξ ⩍ ("double" ξ, sideways).
Ο Ο
Π ⊔ ⊏ ⊐ ⊓ (lengthened), ⊓ ⊔ ("double").
Ρ ⊾
Σ ⊃ ⊍ ⋾ ω Ɛ (the last three are "double" s's).
Τ ⊥ ⊣ ⊦
Υ ⊻
Φ ⊕ ⊅ ⊄ (the two halves of the letter).
Χ ⋋ (διεφθορός).
Ψ ⊹
Ω (capital, to distinguish it from double s). ⊔ written square, and inverted.
F ⊐ ⊔ ⊧
/ \ (the acute and grave accents).

NOTE.—"We have seen by the treatise of Alypius, written professedly to explain the Greek musical characters, to what an amazing number they amounted, 1240 at the lowest computation." (Hawkins' History of Music, p. 104 ed. Novello, 1853.) The number of characters here given is eighty-four; to these must be added the accented ones (twenty-eight), and a few in Aristides Quintilianus. I have tabulated sixty-three vocal notes and sixty-three instrumental, from Alypius, and the total number of entries in a complete diagram is 816.

The ambiguities here shewn arise from the different genera, enharmonic, chromatic, and diatonic. There are no ambiguities in any given mode. The enharmonic notes (which have a # over them) have generally the same symbols as the chromatic notes next above them. In a few instances, where four alternatives are given, those with the line through them are chromatic notes, in the Lydian mode: the writer is inclined to suspect that this was carried throughout all the chromatic systems for the sake of distinction.

The immoveable sounds (ἑστῶτες), viz. the Proslambanomenos, Hypate hypaton, Hypate meson, Mese, Nete synemmenon, Paramese, Nete diezeugmenon, and Nete hyperboleon, are of course expressed in the three genera (in any given mode) by the same symbols; the two Parhypatae and three Tritae in the three genera have the same characters; these chromatic and diatonic notes are identical, but the enharmonic ones are flatter. The two Lichani, and three Paranetae of the chromatic genus, are distinguished by the line through them.

In some of the latter notes an accent will be found; it is probable that this should be applied to both the symbols employed: these are all one octave above the notes belonging to the corresponding unaccented symbols. This must evidently have been done when the 'Great System' received its fullest development, and the property of the octave mentioned before had been observed, so that the musicians avoided the necessity of introducing fresh arbitrary symbols. But it is a surprising thing that this did not suggest a reform in the notation, discarding for the lower notes symbols different from those in the medium pitch, and making a somewhat similar accommodation. For these symbols had become now representatives of pitch, rather than of the place in the scale.

The pairs of symbols are sometimes put side by side, instead of over each other, as just given; the first of them has reference to the voice, the other to the accompanyist on the lyre or other instrument. It is strange that it should not have been seen that one symbol would be quite sufficient for both purposes; and great complication must have arisen from the use of the same symbol to express different sounds, according as it was to be sung or played: thus Ш as a vocal note is the Proslambanomenos of the Hypoaeolian mode in all the three genera, or the same sound as the Hypate hypaton of the Hypoiastian mode in them all; or the same sound as the enharmonic Lichanos hypaton of the Hypodorian mode; or it is  the chromatic Lichanos hypaton of the Hypodorian mode: but as an instrumental note, it is the Trite hyperboleon in the Hypolydian mode, or the Trite diezeugmenon in the Lydian mode, or the Trite synemmenon in the Hyperiastian mode, and will therefore be  when it is diatonic or chromatic, and when enharmonic. (Here the # or ♭ above the modern note sharpens or flattens it by a quarter-tone.)

Aristides Quintilianus gives a description of all the genera and modes, with notation, which is identical with that of Alypius, but a little extension downwards is perceptible. It would appear that the enharmonic system was becoming obsolete in his time, or likely to become so; for he speaks of the diatonic as most natural (φυσικώτερον) and capable of being used even by uninstructed people (πᾶσι γὰρ, καὶ τοῖς ἀπαιδεύτοις παντάπασι μελῳδητόν ἐστι); of the chromatic, as most artistic (τεχνικώτατον), being manageable by practised performers only (παρὰ γὰρ μόνοις μελῳδεῖται τοῖς πεπαιδευμένοις); of the enharmonic, as most subtle (ἀκριβέστερον), because it requires none but the most advanced musicians to attempt it (παρὰ γὰρ τοῖς ἐπιφανεστάτοις ἐν μουσικῇ τετύχηκε παραδοχῆς); and that it is impossible to average people, and they were discontinuing the use of it (τοῖς δὲ πολλοῖς ἐστιν ἀδύνατον. ὅθεν ἀπέγνωσάν τινες τὴν κατὰ δίεσιν μελῳδίαν, διὰ τὴν αὐτῶν ἀσθένειαν καὶ παντελῶς ἀμελῳδήτον εἶναι τὸ διάστημα ὑπολαβόντες). He gives the enharmonic notes arranged in dieses for the lowest octave, and in semitones for the next octave. In this list appear the following, not in Alypius. used for (it has been already used for FF♯), and for . And in another list of notes, arranged according to tones, he gives for and for

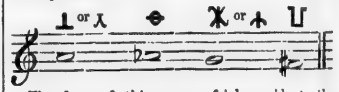
From his semitonic list we find also and for  respectively, and for
He has also catalogued them in such a manner as to shew that the vocal notes were first chosen, having the twenty-four letters adopted in their usual form; then these for the most part inverted, some written 'imperfect,' and ξ and s 'doubled': also and ; and correlative with .

If the diatonic vocal notes be taken out, they give the following:

This ends at the Hypate hypaton of the Hypodorian mode, and, therefore, must have been in use before the Proslambanomenos was added to the scale. The first note, A, is the Nete diezeugmenon of the Iastian mode, or Nete synemmenon of the Aeolian, and also in their derivatives. The sound is not in the Lydian or the Phrygian mode at all; the Dorian employs B, the Hyperdorian both, and the Hyperphrygian B. The remaining inverted letters seem to have been adopted for the Hyperboleon tetrachord, which would obviously have been added to the lyre at some later period.



The law of this seems fairly evident, the alternatives arising from different modes. The order, it will be perceived, is precisely the contrary of the modern one; probably it was derived from the position of the lyre, and the hand of the performer on it. The highest note but one of the original tetrachords, being called λίχανος, would seem to indicate that the highest string was played by the thumb, and the others by our first, second, and third fingers, and this made one "position" of the hand, which would be "shifted" for another tetrachord; the lyre would be held on the left side of the performer, and the letters of the alphabet would follow the order of the fingers of the right hand. The omitted letters, , , , are only chromatic and enharmonic notes. When the Proslambanomenos was adopted it involved two more symbols; ⊣, as next to C, but not inverted, presented itself at once for , then for an enharmonic note, and next ⏢ for . The notes above were indicated by accenting their replicates below, as has been said. The instrumental notes were then, apparently, made up of the various contrivances seen above. The authors, here appealed to, flourished at the beginning of the second century.

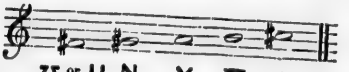
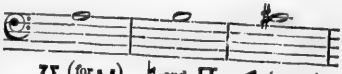
The most celebrated author (in musical respects) of the early centuries is Boethius; unfortunately his work, De Musicâ, was left incomplete; in his time evidence is forthcoming of a modification of the notation in the direction of simplicity; still the old notation was preserved, and in some cases the letters were joined together, thus Z. There appear to be some errors in the text of Boethius, owing probably to insufficient acquaintance with the notation, and clerical errors in the MS.; as the symbols in some cases do not agree with Boethius's own description of them. One deserves notice: the Parhypate hypaton of the Lydian mode is described rightly as β imperfect, yet it is given in four different places in Boethius as BL; and apparently this has been copied by later writers. These seem to have contented themselves with one symbol only in the pairs; thus Hucbaldus (ninth century) gives the following for the notes of the Lydian mode:

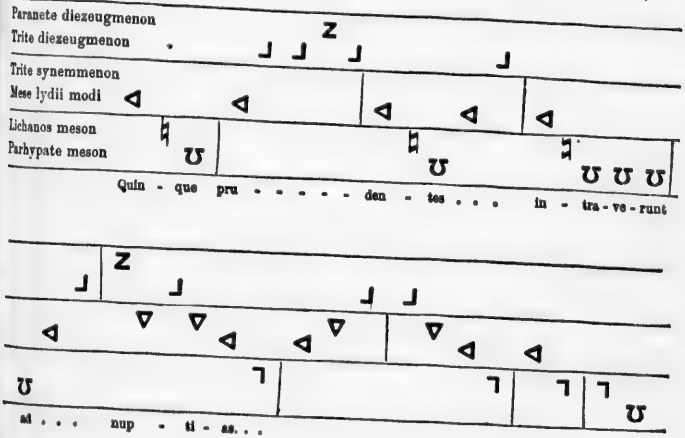


("Iota extensum, sic V.")

The N here is doubtless a corruption of the "careless" η.

And later still, John de Muris uses some of these notes:





Paranete diezeugmenon
Trite diezeugmenon
Trite synemmenon
Mese lydii modi
Lichanos meson
Parhypate meson
Quin - que pru - - - - - den - tes . . . in - tra - ve - runt ad . . . nup - ti - as. . .

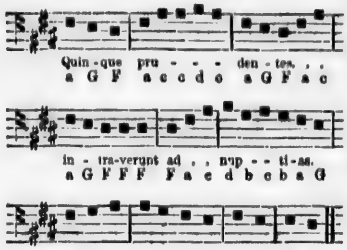
Which he also gives in the notation, presently to be noticed, of letters (alone, and between lines as above), but he has transposed it. His 'letters' are appended underneath the text here, and the equivalent modern notation (not transposed) given.



It is right to say that this is subsequent to the invention of the stave.

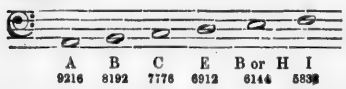
But the great change made about this time was the adoption of Latin letters instead of Greek, and using one symbol only, instead of two. Boethius gives the following as one system of notes:

Hypate hypaton,	A: modern equivalent	B.
Parhypate hypaton,	B: "	C.
Lichanos hypaton,	C: "	D.
Hypate meson,	D: "	E.
Parhypate meson,	E: "	F.
Lichanos meson,	F: "	G.
Mese,	G: "	a.
Paramese,	H: "	b.
Trite diezeugmenon,	I: "	c.
Paranete diezeugmenon,	K: "	d.
Nete diezeugmenon,	L: "	e.
Trite hyperboleon,	M: "	f.
Paranete hyperboleon,	N: "	g.
Nete hyperboleon,	O: "	aa.

The Proslambanomenos here has no letter assigned to it; but it seems that it was soon found advisable to do this, and so the whole of the set just given was shifted one place, thus using up the letters from A to P, and occupying the double octave through our modern natural notes.

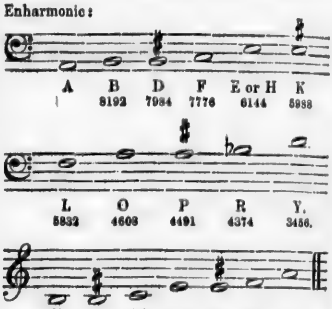
But in another place Boethius gives a larger system, combining all the three genera, and giving the relative lengths of the strings producing the respective sounds.

Diatonic:



Chromatic:

Enharmonic:



His description of this is, "Sed ita ut quoniam trium generum est facienda partitio, nervorum que modus literarum excedit numerum, ubi defecerint literæ, easdem geminamus versus hoc modo, ut quando ad Z fuerit usque perventum, ita describamus reliquos nervos Bis A, i.e. AA, et bis B, i.e. BB." He assigns A, O, and LL, and a few more, but some errors would seem to have crept into the table from whence the above is obtained.

It appears from Walter de Odyngton that the double octave of the diatonic genus at one time, used the letters from A to S, the Proslambanomenos being A, and the rest up to the Mese B, C, D, E, F, G, H; the synemmenon notes I, K, L; and the diezeugmenon and hyperboleon M, N, O, P, Q, R, S. This would make K and L identical with N and O. But it would seem that this was soon reduced to the fifteen. Accordingly we find Jerome de Moravia describing the eight modes as follows:

"Let the double octave be A, B, C, D, E, F, G, H, I, K, L, M, N, O, P. Then—

A to H	is an 8ve, and is the	Hypodorian	mode.
B to I	"	"	Hypophrygian "
C to K	"	"	Hypolydian "
D to L	"	"	Dorian "
E to M	"	"	Phrygian "
F to N	"	"	Lydian "
G to O	"	"	Mixolydian "

And another one must be added, from H to P, which was done by Ptolemy."

The next development is due to St. Gregory, and arises from a further perception of the qualities of the octave as alluded to above, in respect of the accented Greek symbols for the upper notes; if the synemmenon tetrachord be eliminated, the notes from the Mese upwards are each an octave above those from the Proslambanomenos; and when performed they produce an almost identical effect. The idea may have been suggested by the accented Greek notes; anyhow St. Gregory made those from the Mese become replicates of the preceding ones, by assigning to them the same letters; this rejected all the letters beyond the first seven; the notes from the Proslambanomenos to the Lichanos meson, inclusive, being written A, B, C, D, E, F, G; from the Mese to the Paranete hyperboleon a, b, c, d, e, f, g; and the Nete hyperboleon itself aa. This notation is sometimes used at the present day, and the writer has had to employ it here. It is obvious that this can be continued further, and, indeed, is the basis of our present nomenclature. If the synemmenon tetrachord be re-introduced, it requires the note next to a to be a semitone, not a tone above it; accordingly, in the course of time, the letter belonging to this received two forms, "quadratum" and "rotundum," ♮ and ♭, according as the diezeugmenon or synemmenon tetrachord was to be used; these were also called ♭ "durum" and ♭ "molle," and the former became written ♮. This is the origin of the German nomenclature of H for the note a semitone below C, confining B to that a semitone above A (e.g. J. S. Bach's fugue on his own name:

and also of the terms "dur" and "moll" applied to the major and minor tonality. It will be at once seen in the key of G; it is also the origin of the symbol ♭, and the French term bémol, applied thereunto.

Accordingly we find Walter de Odyngton giving the compass of the modes, thus: "Dorius. CDEFGabhcd; Hypodorius Plaga prothi, ΓABCDEFGab; Phrygius, CDEFGahc de; Hypophrygius Plaga deuteri, ABCDEF Gabhc; Lydius, EFGabhcdef; Hypolydius Plaga triti, BCDEFGabcd; Hypermixolydius ΓGahcdefg; Mixolydius Plaga tetrardi, CDEFGabhcde." (The Γ in the last but one should apparently be F.)

These letters were written over or under the words to be sung; there was no method of indicating duration of sound, that being entirely dependent upon the "quantity" of the syllable. Thus, from Jerome de Moravia:

Ad antiphonam vero nos qui vivimus communiter talis differentia datur:

In ex-i-tu Is-ra-el de E-gyp-to do-mus Ja-cob de po-pu-lo bar-bar-o. Ma-nus ha-bent et non pal-pa-bunt, pe-des ha-bent et non am-bu-la-bunt, non clama-bunt in gut-tu-re su-o.

Another method of notation appears to have been in considerable use about the 8th and 9th centuries, invented apparently to diminish, if possible, the number of the arbitrary symbols employed. For this purpose the system of tetrachords was employed, but they were all disjoined by a tone from each other, giving the notes of our natural scale from  to  and occasionally to .

The symbols present in one tetrachord a similarity to the characters of the lowest notes in the Lydian mode, ⊢, Γ, B (ought to be "imperfect"), F; it is alleged that they are all made from the first of these, for the most part by affixing a s in various positions to it. Thus the first four are ⅁ ⅂ N ⅂ which correspond to the notes ; for the tetrachord next above, these were reversed, F ⅁ | ⅁ corresponding to  ; for the next two tetrachords above these were inverted, ⅃ ⅃ ⅄ ⅃, corresponding to  ; and ⅄ ⊔ X ⅃, corresponding to  . Also ⅂ ⅁ were used for  . The connection of N ⅄ X | together is not very evident, but it professes to exist. In abbé Gerbert's collection, ⅄ is replaced by ♭. This notation is largely used by Hucbaldus, and is mentioned by Guido Aretinus.

Ex.—A Cadence, &c., in the first mode, from Hucbaldus:

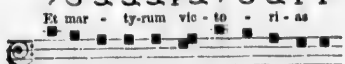
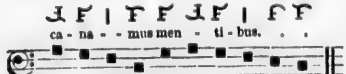
Hymn, from the same:



One method of assisting the performer by indicating the distances between sounds is mentioned by Hermanus Contractus: it consisted in specifying the intervals which the note belonging to each syllable stood above or below the preceding note; thus, e for unison (equal), s for semitone, t for tone, ts for the Minor third, td for the perfect fourth (diatessaron), 5 for the perfect fifth (diapente) a point being placed after these when the interval was taken in a descending manner; and a comma when ascending. For example:



It was then attempted to render the positions of the sounds visible, so that the eye might assist the ear of the performer; and the first system was that mentioned before as like shorthand: the following is extracted from the Tonarius Reginonis Prumiensis, under the Second Tone.

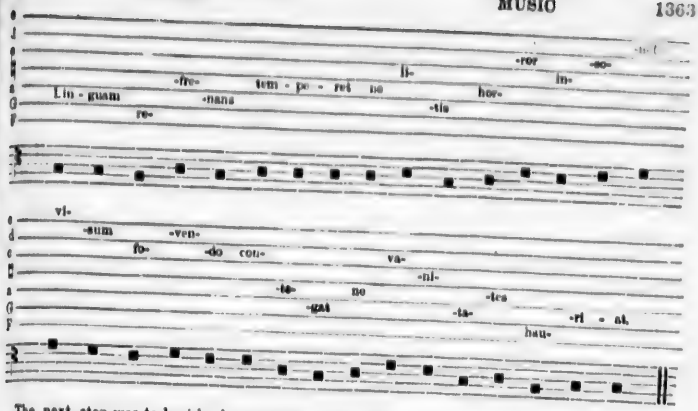
These are not precisely identical with the versions above, or in Walter de Odyngton. But it is obvious that great uncertainty must have prevailed on this system, so that without diligent study and much instruction no singer could sing these without error; accordingly we find that great varieties were known, so much that almost every church had its own way of singing. This was partly remedied by the introduction of a red line and sometimes another which would tend to fix the pitch of the notes placed on or near them. According to Sir John Hawkins (Hist. Music) Gabriel Nivers examined many old MSS., and concluded that the whole system of notation before the time of Guido Aretinus was uncertain, that there were no means, in this method, of ascertaining the distinction between a tone and a semitone, which of course was of itself sufficient to induce musicians to seek improvements.

The first was the multiplication of these lines and the writing of the words on them in such a manner that the position of the syllable should indicate the sound to which it was to be sung. Each line corresponded to a sound of the scale of the mode adopted, and the symbol for its note was placed at the beginning of it. See the example on the next page, from 'Aribonis Scholastica.'

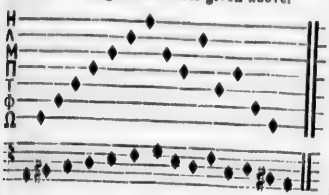
This was further improved by adopting a red line for the place of F, and a yellow one for that of C. So we find Guido Aretinus writing in his Micrologus,

> "Quasdam lineas signamus variis coloribus
> Ut quo loco sit sonus mox discernat oculus;
> Ordine tertiae vocis splendens crocus radiat,
> Sexta ejus, sed affinis flavo rubet minio."

C being the third from A, and F the sixth, in ascending order.



The next step was to banish the words from these lines, and put points on them. In Sir John Hawkins' Hist. Music is a specimen given from Vincentio Galilei, which is much anterior to Guido Aretinus; but it does not appear to have been correctly translated; the version is here revised, according to the notes given above.



It is easy to see what a great convenience the coloured lines introduced would be in the great number that would often be used.

The improvement of Guido Aretinus consisted in placing notes in the spaces, i.e. abolishing every other line; when this was done, the fifth mode was the only one which would have both F and C on lines, and therefore be "splendens ceteris rubroque colore."

A mystical reason has been assigned to these coloured lines: a yellow line is assigned to C, because gold is the most precious among the metals, and C may represent Charity, the chief of the Christian graces; and a red line is given to F, which may stand for Faith that caused the martyrs to seal their testimony with their blood.

These lines most probably were intended in the first instance to represent the actual strings, something after the manner in which the music for the lute was written "in tablature" (see Mace's Musick's Monument, 1676), but the ancients were not apparently acquainted with the art of "stopping" strings in performance. And so, curiously enough, to this day in the harp, coloured strings (red and black) are assigned to the C's and F's, the others being the natural colour of the catgut; it is difficult to avoid connecting this with the old practice, as G would now be a more likely note to be chosen than F.

Consequently Guido's improvement may be said to be the invention of the stave, in the sense of indicating the sound irrespective of the instrument producing it, and when this was once done the whole system of music became so revolutionised as to enter upon a new phase altogether, mediæval instead of antique; which is foreign to the purpose of this book.

The writer has here used the modern stave of five lines, and the modern forms of some of the clefs: there is no difference in principle between these and their predecessors, and the music is much more easily read.

MUSIC, CHRISTIAN USE OF.—We are left a good deal to conjecture to what extent music was used, or what forms it took. The first intimation is that of St. Paul (Ephes. v. 19; Col. iii. 16), in which he recognises three distinct kinds of composition; psalms, hymns, and spiritual songs (ψαλμοί, ὕμνοι, ᾠδαὶ πνευματικαί): these it would seem most reasonable to suppose to be the Psalms of David, original compositions in stanzas, and more irregular compositions, such as the choruses in the Greek plays. Each of these would require a somewhat different musical treatment, although all of them would be little else than recitative. (Vide HYMNS.) The first of these would be fitted with a monotonous chant having an ending, as shewn above; the second with something more like a rhythmical tune, and the third with a melody similar to those of the antiphons. It is commonly believed that St. Ambrose took a melody that had been in use in pagan rites, and adapted it to his Advent hyma "Creator alme siderum," which melody is still in use, though with some varieties of reading; and it is easy to see that for such compositions the example would be followed. All the early writers assign to St. Ignatius the introduction of antiphonal chanting; "A quibus vel quando cepit antiphona dici, Ignatius Antiochie Syrie tertius post Apostolum Petrum Episcopus, qui et jam (etiam?) cum ipsis degebat apostolis, vidit visionem angelorum, quomodo per antiphonas Sancte Trinitati dicebant ymnos. Isque modus visionis Antiochie tradidisse probatur ecclesie, et ex hoc ad cunctas transivit ecclesias." (Tonarius Reginonis Prumensis.) Accordingly we find these forms appearing in the liturgies: the thirty-third psalm is specified in that of St. Clement, and the twenty-third and others in St. James's. But the presence of a choir is recognised, and a part assigned them. Lit. St. Mark: καὶ ψάλλουσιν ὁ μονογενής,—καὶ ψάλλουσι τὸν χερουβικόν,—σὺν αὐτοῖς ὑμνούντων καὶ λεγοντων · [Ὁ λαός] Ἅγιος ἅγιος ἅγιος Κύριος.

So in St. James: Εἶτα οἱ ψάλται τὸν τρισάγιον ψάλλουσιν ὕμνον,—Οἱ ψάλται· Ἄξιόν ἐστιν ὡς ἀληθῶς· κ.τ.λ.,—Καὶ πάλιν ψάλλουσιν,—and St. Chrysostom: Καὶ ψάλλεται τὸ πρῶτον Ἀντίφωνον παρὰ τῶν ψαλτῶν (and so for the second antiphon, and the third, or in some cases the beatitudes); ψαλλομένου δὲ τοῦ Τρισαγίου, λέγει ὁ Ἱερεὺς τὴν εὐχὴν ταύτην μυστικῶς,—Εὐχὴ, ἣν λέγει ὁ Ἱερεὺς καθ' ἑαυτὸν, τοῦ Χερουβικοῦ ᾀδομένου. Accordingly provision is made for a choir in the early churches. Neale (Introduction to Translation of Primitive Liturgies) gives a ground plan of the church of St. Theodere at Athens; in it the choir are placed under the trullus, or dome, which position was maintained up to the 12th century. A very early ode is still extant, φῶς ἱλαρὸν ἁγίας δόξης; but it is not known whether the music of it has been preserved. The use of the church of Alexandria in the 4th century is shewn by an account in the Geronticon of St. Pambo, abbat of Nitria (apud Gerbert); he had sent a disciple there for some purpose, and the disciple regretted the ignorance of singing in the monastery: Ἀπελθόντος γάρ μου ἐν Ἀλεξανδρείᾳ, εἶδον τὰ τάγματα τῆς ἐκκλησίας πῶς ψάλλουσι, καὶ ἐν λύπῃ γέγονα πολλῇ, διατι καὶ ἡμεῖς οὐ ψάλλομεν κανόνας καὶ τροπάρια" (vide CANON OF ODES). The abbat thought his disciple departing from primitive simplicity. From another work of uncertain date, but of great antiquity, preserved by Gerbert, the Institutio Patrum de modo psallendi sive cantandi, we find three kinds of chanting recognised, according to the nature of the day, whether a principal festival, a Sunday or saint's day, or an ordinary day: "Tres ordines melodiae in tribus distinctionibus temporum habeamus, verbi gratia, in praecipuis solemnitatibus toto corde et ore omnique affectu devotionis; in Dominicis diebus et majoribus festivitatibus sive natalitiis sanctorum . . . multo remissius; privatis autem diebus ita psalmodia modulatur nocturnis horis, et cantus de die, ut omnes possent devote psallere et intente cantare sine strepitu vocis, cum affectu absque defectu." And the nature of this chant, as similar to the Gregorian chant, appears also: "syllabas, verba, metrum, in modo et in finem versus, id est, initium, medium, et finem, simul incipiamus, et pariter diuittamus. Punctum aequaliter teneant omnes. In omni textu lectionis, psalmodiae vel cantus, accentus sive concentus verborum (in quantum suppetit facultas) non negligatur, quia exinde permaxime redolet intellectus. Scire debet omnis cantor, quod literae quae liquescunt in metrica rite, etiam in Neumis musicae ritis liquescunt." This last shews that the musical rhythm conformed to the poetical, elisions and crases being made when necessary; and probably that the system of one note to a syllable was adopted; in this case Neuma (q. v.) would mean a cadence, and not assume its more usual meaning.

It does not appear that the early British church used any music in the services; from the few remains of the old churches that have come down to us, it would seem that no provision was made for a choir: this is remarkable, so far as the Cambrian part of the British church is concerned, since they had an order of bards, and were skilled in the harp. According to John the deacon, certain singers came with St. Augustine to Canterbury, and the church's song (more Romano) became known in Kent; and in several instances we find from Bede that exertions were made to spread this over England. Thus when St. Paulinus became bishop of Rochester he left behind him in the diocese of York a deacon, James, a skilled musician, who lived at Catterick, and taught the Roman or Cantuarian method of church song. "Qui, quoniam cantandi in ecclesia erat peritissimus, . . . etiam magister ecclesiasticae cantionis juxta morem Romanorum seu Cantuariorum multis coepit exsistere." (Bede, ii. 20.) And the custom of using music in the church service began to be generally spread over England at the accession to the see of Canterbury of archbishop Theodore (A.D. 669). "Sed et sonos cantandi in ecclesia, quos eatenus in Cantia tantum noverant, ab hoc tempore per omnes Anglorum ecclesias discere coeperunt; primusque, excepto Jacobo, . . . cantandi magister Northanhumbrorum ecclesiis Eddi cognomento Stephanus fuit, invitatus de Cantia a reverendissimo viro Wilfrido" (Bede, iv. 2); and the archbishop filled up the vacant see of Rochester by another musician, Putta; "maxime modulandi in ecclesia more Romanorum, quem a discipulis beati papae Gregorii didicerat, peritum" (ibid.): a few years afterwards this bishop abandoned his see, and having received an appointment from the bishop of Lichfield of a church and glebe, propagated church music: "in illa solum ecclesia Deo serviens et ubicunque rogabatur ad docenda ecclesiae carmina diver-tens." (Bede, iv. 12.) About this time John the precentor of St. Peter's, Rome, was sent by pope Agatho, and received by Benedict Biscop into his monastery at Wearmouth for the purpose of teaching church music, and was very much resorted to. "Non solum autem idem Joannes ipsius monasterii fratres docebat, verum de omnibus pene ejusdem provinciae monasteriis ad audiendum eum, qui cantandi erant periti, confluebant. Sed et ipsum per loca, in quibus docuit, multi invitare curabant." (Bede, iv. 18.) From this we may fairly infer that the Cantus Gregorianus soon became naturalised in England so as to create an Anglican tradition of it, of which there is reason to suppose traces have descended to this day.

The same use was professed in France and Germany, but had become corrupted. Gabriel Nivers (quoted by Sir John Hawkins, Hist. Music) asserts that in consequence of pope Stephen II. coming to Pepin, king of France, a number of singers who had accompanied him propagated the church-song in the Gregorian manner over France generally; but after the death of Pepin, the purity of the song was not maintained. In consequence, Charlemagne made an application to pope Adrian to send experts to restore the music: this was attended to, but a second mission of experts had to be made before the desired result was accomplished.

Instruments.—Whatever evidence is forthcoming, is to the effect that the early Christians did not use musical instruments. Various causes would operate: the poverty of a considerable portion of the church, the frequency of persecution, but chiefly the associations, theatrical and indecent, with which the musical instruments that were attainable were associated. (v. DIAPSALMA). But at a later period, after the disruption of the empire, and the re-organisation of society, such causes not existing to any extent, the feeling against instruments ceased to exist; and we find that organs were introduced into churches and in some cases other instruments also. Thus it appears, from the above reference to Gabriel Nivers, that the choir that accompanied pope Stephen II. into France spread over that country not only the knowledge of the Roman plain-song, but also the use of instruments. Organs deserve a separate notice.

Harmony.—Whether the ancients were acquainted with harmony has been much disputed: the writer, following most of the eminent musicians, is strongly of opinion that they were not (v. CANON OF THE SCALE): ἁρμονία would appear to mean nothing more than 'true intonation,' or producing successive notes in their right sound. Seneca has been cited to prove the contrary. "Non vides quam multorum vocibus chorus constet? Unus tamen ex omnibus sonus redditur. Aliqua illic acuta est, aliqua gravis, aliqua media. Accedunt viris feminae, interponuntur tibiae, singulorum latent voces, omnium apparent." It would be perfectly impossible that "one sound" should be produced under such circumstances, unless the voices and instruments sung and played in unisons and octaves. This passage and others appear in Hawkins' History, and the writer only wishes to add that the adoption of the accented symbols (as shewn above) for notes an octave above the others appears to him proof positive that this is the true meaning of this and similar phraseology. When men and women sing together the same melody, their voices are really an octave apart; and if the "interposition" of the tibia is to be taken literally, the consequence is consecutive fifths or discordance, which would be detected instantly as not 'unus sonus.'

It has been conjectured that the practice of harmony of some kind, i.e. the use of two notes not always of the same modern name (A, B, C, D, E, F, G) simultaneously, so that two persons would not always sing in unisons or octaves, took its rise in Northumbria in the 8th century. Sir J. Hawkins quotes Giraldus Cambrensis, who gives the following account, and believes (Hawkins thinks without sufficient reason) that the Northumbrians obtained it from Denmark or Norway. "In borealibus quoque majoris Britanniae partibus trans Humbrum, Eboracique finibus Anglorum populi qui partes illas inhabitant simili canendo symphonicae utuntur harmonia: binis tamen solummodo differentiae et vocum modulando varietatibus, una inferius submurmurante altera vero superne demulcente pariter et delectante (i.e. singing 'in two parts'). Nec arte tantum sed usu longaevo et quasi in naturam morn diutina jam converso, haec vel illa sibi gens hanc specialitatem comparavit. Qui alio apud utramque invaluit et altas jam radices posuit, ut nihil hic simpliciter, ubi multipliciter ut apud priores, vel saltem dupliciter ut apud sequentes, mellite proferri consueverit. Pueris etiam (quod magis admirandum) et fere infantibus (cum primum a fletibus in cantus erumpunt) eamdem modulationem observantibus. Angli vero quoniam non generaliter omnes sed boreales solum hujusmodi vocum utuntur modulationibus, credo quod a Dacis et Norwagiensibus, qui partes illas insulae frequentius occupare et diutius obtinere solebant, sicut loquendi affinitatem, sic canendi proprietatem contraxerunt." (Cambr. Descr. xiii.)

It has been already noticed that John the precentor of Rome lived at Wearmouth for some time and taught music; and it has been conjectured that the invention of this kind of harmony (or its introduction into England) is due to him. The writer thinks that the system described by Giraldus may mean no more than that the melody was not sung in octaves, at least at the time of John, whatever it may have become afterwards. If this be true, the practice of harmony in church music is due to the church of Rome.

The writer is aware, and thinks he ought here to mention, that Sir F. Ouseley (a good authority) believes harmony to be an invention of the northern tribes of Europe; but he is not acquainted with the evidence for this belief: and Professor Macfarren (Lectures on Harmony) contrasts the peoples of the South and North in respect of inventive power of melody and harmony. Those who advocate the opinion that the ancients were acquainted with harmony, consider a strong point of evidence to be the number of voices and instruments collected together on several public occasions: but as the writer is not satisfied with this, he thinks it more likely that harmony was a discovery of the learned musicians, who had had the experience of their predecessors for centuries, during which many advances had been made in the science of music, and that the inventive powers of the people have little to do with it: and in this view it is certainly most likely that such a discovery should have been made, or at least pursued, chiefly at Rome. It is rather difficult to imagine barbarous tribes inventing harmony while civilised people were ignorant of it and studied music all the while. Certainly towards the ninth century, the practice of producing octaves, fifths, or fourths simultaneously was known, and in the former two cases it was called 'symphonia,' and in the latter 'diaphonia.' The terms 'succentus' and 'concentus' are also used as synonymous with 'symphonia.' Regino Prumensis allows the use of succentus in octaves and fifths, but he prohibits diaphony: Huebaldus acknowledges both. Thus for a 'symphony' of octaves and fifths we should have, in the fifth tone—

The ancients always considered the fourth a concord; and it is a satisfactory interval in melody; probably for this reason the experiment of singing in fourths as well as in fifths and octaves was tried, and found unsatisfactory: wherefore it was called diaphony, a term used by the ancients as contrary to συμφωνία. This is doubtless the reason why the fourth is now considered a dissonance. Harmony appears to have extended no further than this before the time of Guido Aretinus. [J. R. L.]

MYROPHORI (μυροφόροι). The women who brought to the Lord's tomb the "spices and ointments" which they had prepared are so called in Greek office-books. The third Sunday after Easter is in the Greek church the "Sunday of the Unguent-bearers" (τῶν μυροφόρων). [C.]

MYSTAGOGIA (μυσταγωγία) would naturally mean the conducting or initiating into mysteries. It is, however, commonly used by the Greek fathers as a term for the sacraments themselves, regarded as conducting to higher life. Thus Chrysostom uses the word μυσταγωγία for Baptism, ἱερὰ μυσταγωγία for Holy Communion, κρατὴρ τῆς μυσταγωγίας for the cup in the Lord's Supper (Suicer, Thesaurus, s. v.). [C.]

MYSTAGOGUS (μυσταγωγός) is, as Suidas has defined it, "a priest, an initiator into mysteries." Hence the Lord Himself is described as acting as Mystagogus to His disciples (Greg. Nazianz. Orat. 40, p. 659). And those who prepared Christians for initiation into the sacred mysteries of the church were called by the same name. Hence the lectures which Cyril of Jerusalem addressed to his catechumens, in which he expounds the rites to which they were to be admitted, are called Κατηχήσεις μυσταγωγικαί. [C.]

MYSTERY (μυστήριον, root μυ-, as in μύειν, to shut). A μυστήριον is properly a rite to which none but the initiated can be admitted. Hence baptism, to which in early ages men were not commonly admitted without a catechumenate of some length; and the Holy Communion, to which none could be admitted without baptism, and of which the most sacred portions were concealed from the profane [Disciplina Arcani], naturally came to be called μυστήρια. Thus Chrysostom on St. John xix. 34 (Hom. 85), speaking of the water and blood, says that from these are derived the mysteries of baptism and the Lord's Supper. Gregory of Nazianzus (Orat. 39, p. 632, ed. Paris, 1630) calls the ministers of baptism οἰκονόμους τοῦ μυστηρίου; and (Orat. 44, p. 713) says that Jesus in the upper room partook of the mystery (κοινωνεῖ τοῦ μυστηρίου). The Laodicean Council (Can. 7) provides that certain heretics, after learning an orthodox creed and being anointed with chrism, should be admitted to the holy mystery (κοινωνεῖν τῷ μυστηρίῳ τῷ ἁγίῳ [al. τῶν μ. τῶν ἁγ.]), i. e. to the Holy Communion, for they were already baptized. In later times, however, the word μυστήριον came to be applied to many rites of the church in much the same way as the Latin Sacramentum, and the Greek doctors generally reckon the same number—seven. NAMES (Influence of Christianity on). The origin and meaning of names, a subject long regarded as too capricious and arbitrary in character to admit of scientific treatment, has received considerable elucidation from recent philological research both in England and on the continent. Very slight investigation suffices to shew that religion, whether pagan or Christian, furnishes a most valuable clue to such inquiry. The present article is restricted to the comparatively limited field presented in the nomenclature of Christian nations during the first eight centuries, and to an endeavour to determine how far that nomenclature was modified or remained unmodified by Christian influences.

For this purpose, it will obviously be of primary importance to ascertain how far the early Christian theory required from converts the assumption of a new name at the ordinance of baptism. On this point the evidence is somewhat conflicting, but generally it would seem that the practice was comparatively rare until after the period of persecution. In the first and second centuries, it is to be remembered, the ancient gentile relations, which transferred to an adopted member of a gens the praenomen, nomen, and cognomen of his adoptive father, gradually ceased to exist. So early as the reign of Trajan we find instances in the Fasti of the designation of consuls solely by their cognomina or agnomina; and in the second and third centuries such instances are numerous. Sometimes a consul is designated only by his cognomen or agnomen, and sometimes by all his names. Thus Domitian's colleague in his ninth consulship (A.D. 83) appears now as Rufus, and again as Q. Petilius Rufus; the colleague of Philippus in the reign of Honorius is sometimes Bassus, sometimes Anicius Auchenius Bassus. Gradually, however, the Roman form of nomenclature almost entirely disappears; though even so late as the 6th century we find Fulgentius, the eminent African bishop, bearing also the names Fabius Claudius Gordianus, while Sidonius, bishop of Clermont, in the preceding century, bore also the name Apollinaris.

The influences that successively determined Christian practice, were—(1) indifference, originating in the causes above mentioned, with regard to adoption or family names; (2) the freedom conceded by legislative enactments; (3) the removal of deterrent considerations such as existed during the persecuting age; (4) the express exhortations of the teachers of the church to a change of practice; (5) the veneration of relics. Of these influences (1) and (2) were shared in common with paganism, and belong to the first three centuries; (3) (4) and (5) are connected with the subsequent period only.

(1.) The letters of Cyprian illustrate the prevalent indifference of his age. In default of motives like those which had formerly existed in adopting a Roman name on admission to the rights of citizenship, the provincial contented himself with Latinising his native name. We find, for example, Cyprian referring to a fellow bishop by the name of Jubalianus, a provincial name with a Roman termination. (Migne, Patr. iv. 129.) In the same correspondence we find in letters written on behalf of different church communities, and signed by their leading members, names of signataries such as Saturninus and Felix, repeated with addition of alter or iterum alter (ibid. iv. 158), where it is evident that the employment of the nomen or praenomen would have effectually prevented any confusion.

(2.) In the 3rd century it was declared lawful by the state for any citizen to lay aside his name and assume any other he might wish. This enactment, first promulgated in the reign of Caracalla (A.D. 212), and sanctioned by succeeding emperors, is thus re-enacted under Diocletian and Maximin:—"Sicut in initio, nominis, cognominis, praenominis recognoscendi singulos impositio libera est privatis: ita eorum mutatio innocentibus periculosa non est. Mutare itaque nomen, vel praenomen sive cognomen sine aliqua fraude licito jure, si liber es, secundum ea, quae statuta sunt, minime prohiberis: nullo ex hoc praejudicio futuro. S. 15. Kal. Jan. A. A. Conss." Justiniani Codex, ix. 25: Corp. Jur. Civil. (Lipsiae, 1720), ii. 396.

(3.) Under ordinary circumstances, the Christian of the first three centuries appears to have shared in the prevalent indifference with respect to names, and to have baptized his children with little regard to the significance of the particular name bestowed; the expression of St. Ambrose that our ancestors were wont to coin names on definite principles,—"apud veteres nostros ratione nomina componebantur" (Migne, xvii. 47), is confirmed by the language of St. Chrysostom, who says that the Jews made the names given to their offspring a means of moral training and an incitement to virtue, and bestowed them not as men did in his day, carelessly and as chance might dictate, καὶ οὐ καθάπερ οἱ νῦν ἁπλῶς καὶ ὡς ἔτυχε τὰς προσηγορίας ποιοῦντες (Migne, S. G. liii. 179). It may be observed that this latter passage is alone sufficient to discredit the spurious Arabian canon of Nicaea (Mansi, Concilia, ii. 961), quoted by Martigny, which represents the church as having already, in the early part of the 4th century, forbidden the faithful to give their children names other than those distinctively Christian. There is, however, good reason for inferring that prudential motives also deterred Christians from assuming names significant of their change of faith, although in times of persecution, when compelled openly to avow their religion, they often changed a pagan for a scriptural name before undergoing a martyr's death. Procopius of Gaza, who wrote in the first half of the 6th century, refers to this as no uncommon practice under such circumstances. "One," he says, "called himself Jacob; another, Israel; another, Jeremiah; another, Isaiah; another, Daniel; and having taken these names they readily went forth to martyrdom" (Comment. in Isaiah, c. 44; Migne, S. G. lxxxvii. 2401).

(4.) The example and teaching of the fathers proves that from the earliest times the teachers of the church did not share in the prevalent indifference. St. Cyprian assumed the name of Caecilius in addition to his own, as an acknowledgment of gratitude to one to whom he owed his conversion. Eusebius took the name of Pamphili from that of the martyr Pamphilus, whom he held in special veneration. It is, however, in the 4th century, when Christianity had received state recognition, that we first find evidence of a desire on the part of the leaders of religious opinion to modify the customary practice. St. Chrysostom, in the Homily above quoted, distinctly censures the prevailing fashion of giving a child his father's or grandfather's name without regard to the import of the name itself. Such, he says, was not the custom in ancient times. Then especial care was taken to give children names which should not merely incite to virtue those who received them, but also serve as admonitions to all wisdom (διδασκαλία φιλοσοφίας ἀπάσης) to others, and even to after generations. "Let us not, therefore," he concludes, "give chance names (τὰς τύχουσας προσηγορίας) to children, nor seek to gratify fathers, or grandfathers, or those allied by descent, by giving their names, but rather choose the names of holy men conspicuous for virtue and for boldness before God." (Migne, S. G. liii. 179.) At the same time he warns his hearers against ascribing any efficacy to such names, all justifiable hope on the part of the Christian being grounded upon an upright life. We find, from another discourse, that the practice he recommended was already sometimes observed. The parents of Antioch, he tells us, gave the name of Meletius (an eminent bishop of that city, who died 381) in preference to any other name, each thinking thereby to bring the saint under his own roof (Migne, S. G. i. 515).

But notwithstanding some eminent exceptions, there can be no doubt that, prior to the 4th century, such practice was rare, a conclusion supported by the evidence afforded by the early Christian epitaphs. The Martyrologies also present us with many names (as will be seen from the subjoined lists) which reflect not merely the secular associations of paganism, but even its religious culture. Martyrs often encountered death bearing the names of those very divinities to whom they refuse to offer sacrifice. It has, indeed, been sought to qualify the evidence derived from Christian epitaphs, by conjecturing that, in order to prevent confusion, only the original name was inserted in the inscription, and that in those instances where we are presented with a second name,—e.g., Muscula quae et Galatea (ann. 383, De Rossi, i. 112), Asellus qui et Martinianus (Marangoni, Cose Gent. 458), and in the well-known one of king Ceadwalla, Hic depositus est Ceadwalla qui et Petrus (Baedae Hist. Eccles. v. 7),—the second name is that conferred at baptism. Against this theory Le Blant, however, quotes the equally notable instance Petrus qui et Balsamus (Ruinart, Acta Sincera, p. 501). Balsamus, according to the Acta, on being asked his name, replied, "Nomine patris, Balsamus dicor, spirituali vero nomine, quod in baptismo accepi, Petrus dicor." Other instances, e.g., Macrina quae Jovina (Marangoni, Acta Sancti Vict., 88). Vitalis qui et Dioscurus (Marangoni, Cose Gent. 465), Convsias qui et Asclepius (Mai, Coll. Vat. v. 14), where the second name is directly derived from the pagan mythology, are equally adverse to such a theory.

(5.) While the customs and associations which had once given interest and importance to names gradually disappeared, other circumstances began to invest them with new significance. Foremost among these must be placed the superstitious veneration of relics. As the presence of a supposed fragment of a body of a saint was believed to secure his protection for the locality where it was enshrined, the inhabitants of the district sought to prove their reverence for his memory by assuming his name. In later times, with the adoption by each country of a patron saint, the same principle became still further extended. St. James (San Diego or Iago) in Spain, St. Andrew in Scotland and Holland, St. Martin in France, and St. Maurice in Switzerland, are some of the more notable instances in which a name (in some cases that of an altogether mythical character) became the favourite national designation for the individual. In those countries which were among the last to embrace Christianity, this principle is to be seen yet more widely extended. Here the adoption at baptism of a Christian name was the usual practice. In the 14th century, Ladislas Jagellon, duke of Lithuania, on becoming a convert to the faith, persuaded many of his subjects to follow his example. In consequence of their numbers they were baptized in companies, the same name being given to all in one company. All the men in the first company were named Peter, and all the women Catherine; in the second company, the names given were Paul and Margaret; and so on. (Salverte, i. 171.)

A considerable stimulus to the interest attaching to names was imparted, in the 7th century, by the chapters on the subject in the Etymologiae of Isidore of Seville. He taught that all scriptural names had been given with a pregnant reference to the part or future career of the individual, and in a lengthened enumeration assigned to each name a meaning (often erroneous) expressive of that individual's character or experiences. To the influence of his treatise, we may attribute the fact that in the 8th century, with the revival of letters in Frankland, it became a not uncommon practice for men of eminence to assume a literary alias. Charles the Great, and many of his courtiers, were addressed in more familiar intercourse, by other than their baptismal names, scriptural names being generally adopted. Charles probably was led to assume the name of David, from the erroneous meaning given to it by Isidore, "fortis manu, quia fortissimus in praeliis fuit." (Migne, lxxxii. 323.)

NAMES OF CHRISTIANS DERIVED FROM PAGAN ANCESTORS; (B.) NAMES OF CHRISTIAN ORIGIN AND SIGNIFICANCE. Of the works from which these lists have been principally compiled, a critical notice will be found under INSCRIPTIONS (pp. 841–844); see also CATACOMBS, pp. 295–306. Those which rest on the authority of Aringhi, Boldetti, or Perret, must be accepted with the caution necessary in relation to the researches of those archaeologists, but it has not been thought desirable to expunge them from the lists. It must also be borne in mind that the value of this evidence rests, in not a few instances, on the assumption of the exclusively Christian character of the Catacombs of Rome,—the view adopted in CATACOMBS, and maintained by Messrs. Northcote and Brownlow (Roma Sotterranea), but one by no means unanimously accepted.

A. (a) Under the first head are given names derived, unchanged, or but slightly modified from the pagan mythology: Alcinous (Act. Sanct. Vict. 76); APOLLOS = Apollonius (1 Cor. xvi. 12); to be met with even in the 6th century (De Rossi, i. 1013); Apollinaris (Marangoni, Act. S. V. 122); Apollinaria (Muratori, Thesaur. 1830–6); Apollonius (Martyr. Rom. xiv. Feb.); Phoebe (Rom. xvi. 1); Pythius (Act. S. V. 83). CERES, Cerealis, and from Demeter, Demetrius (Act. S. V. 115); this name would appear to have been borne by many martyrs (Ib. 701). DIANA: Dianesis (Ib. 89); Cinthia (Vignoli, 332). EROS: this appears as the name of a bishop of Arles at the commencement of the 5th century; Erotis (Perret, v. pl. 46); a martyr in Cappadocia, under Diocletian (Oct. xxvii.) was named Erotheides. HERCULES: (?) Herculanus (Perret, v. pl. 58); Eracles, Eraclia (Act. S. V. 77, 120); Heraclides (Ruinart, p. 121); HPAKΛEIA (Act. S. V. 77); Heraclius, m. (Oct. xxii.). HYGIEA: Hygina (? Act. S. V.). JANUS: Janus (Muratori, 387, 1); Janilla (Ib. 1886, 6). JUPITER: Jovina (Act. S. V. 120); Jovianus (Perret, v. pl. 27); Jovinus (Marini, 383); Jovita, m. (Feb. xv.); Olympius (Act. S. V. 106); Olympia (Cardinali, Inc. Velit. 203); Olympiades, m. (Apr. i. Dec. i.). Jupiter Ammon: Ammonius, Ammononia (Martyrol. passim). LEDA: Laeda (Boldetti, 379). LUCINA: Lucina (Ib. 428). MARS: Martia, m. (Jun. xxi.); Martianus (Boldetti, 487); Martialis, Martinus, Martina, passim; Martinianus (July ii.). MERCURY: Mercurius (Act. S. V. 82); Mercuria (Ib. 98); Mercurionus (Ib. 4); Mercurus (Fabretti, 551); Mercurialis (May xiii.); Mercurilis (Mai, v. 393); Mercurianetis (De Rossi, i. 71); Mercurina (Le Blant, i. 74); Mercuriolus (Cancellieri, Orsa e Simplic. 18). HERMES: Ermes (Boldetti, 483); Ermogenes, (Act. S. V. 72); Ermogenia (Ib. 94); Hermes, many martyrs, Nov. ii., Mar. i. etc.; Hermogenes (Dec. x.; Sept. xi.). These last names were extremely common in the primitive church, and Martigny conjectures that their prevalence is to be ascribed to the occurrence of the name (Romans xvi. 14) as that of one of St. Paul's disciples. This supposition is hardly in harmony with what we have seen to be the practice of the church at that period. MINERVA: Minervia (Boldetti, 491); Minervinus (Dec. xxxi.); Minervus (Aug. xxv.). Athene: Athenodorus, martyr in Mesopotamia under Diocletian (Nov. xi.); Athenogenes, bishop of Sebaste, martyr in the same persecution (July xvi.). Pallas: Palladius (Osann. 539, 14) occurs also as the name of a hermit of Nitria, afterwards bishop of Helenopolis in Bithynia. MUSAEUS: Museus (Perret, v. pl. 39). NEMESIS: Nemesis (Muratori, 1515, 9); Nemesius (Feb. xx.); Nemesianus (Sept. 10); Naemisius (De Rossi, i. 272); here, however, De Rossi observes, "Vox Emisina defunctae patriam significat, Emesam nempe celeberrimam Phoenices urbem." NEPTUNE: Posidonius (Le Blant, i. 339). NEREUS: Nereus saluted by St. Paul (Rom. xvi. 15). The Roman martyrology gives (Feb. xvii.) the name of a martyr named Romulus. SATURN: Saturninus, extremely common in the primitive church (Marchi, p. 85; Act. S. V. 82); also name of the reputed founder of the church at Toulouse, sent by Fabianus, bishop of Rome; Saturnina (Act. S. V. 80). A brother of St. Ambrose bore the name of Satyrus. SILVANUS: African martyr (Feb. xviii.), bishop of Emesa m. (Feb. vi.), and many other martyrs. The Museum of the Lateran (Inscript. class. xviii. n. 17) contains a marble inscribed with the name URANIA: Oderico (Syll. Vet. Inscript. Romae, 1765) gives (261) the name of a Christian, derived from that of the muse of astronomy, Uranius. Boldetti (p. 477) gives the epitaph of a Christian female named VENUS, though Maury (Croyances et Légend. de l'Antiquité, 349) denies that the name can be found in the Acta, and endeavours to prove that the St. Venise of Gaul was really the Venus of antiquity accepted under Christian modes of veneration; we have also Venere (Marini, 452); Veneriosa (Le Blant, i. 117); Venerius (Ib. ii. 467), also a bishop of Milan and a hermit in the Island of Palms (May iv; Sept. xiii.); Venerigine (Oderico, 259). Aphrodite, Aphrodisias (Act. S. V. 97); Aphrodisius, m. at Alexandria (Apr. xxx.). In Egypt many Christians bore the names of the divinities of that country, though these often receive from writers or in inscriptions a Greek or Latin terminal,—e.g. Serapio from SERAPIS (Boldetti, 469); the Acta of some of the martyrs of the Thebaïs give us the names unmodified (Giorgi, de Miracul. S. Coluthi).

(β) From religious rites, auguries, and omens. Augurius (Marchi, 39); Augurinus (Le Blant, i. 341); Augustus (ib. 26); Auspicius (Le Blant, i. 342); Desiderius, m. (Mar. xxv.); Expectatus (Gazzera, Iscr. del Piem. 28); Faustinus (Marchi, 27); Faustus, m. (Aug. i.); Felix (Act. S. V. 129); Felicia (Perret, lxii. 62); Felicissimus (Passionei, 118); Felicitas (Perret, v. pl. 3); the derivatives of these in great number; Firmus, m. (Feb. xi.); Firma (Maffei, Mus. Veron. 281); Macarius, m. (Sept. 5), the Greek form is found on many marbles; Optatus (Perret, xv.); Profuturus (ib. xli.); Pretiosa (Wiseman, Fabiola, 264).

(γ) From numbers. Primus, Prima, Primenia (Fabretti, 579); Primenius (De Rossi, i. 206); Primigenius (Marini, 96); Secundus, m. (Jan. ix.); Secundilla, m. (Mar. vii.); Secundinus (Perret, 41); Tertius, conf. (Dec. vi.); Quartus, disciple of the apostles (Nov. iii.); Quartinus (Act. S. V. 112); Quartina (Boldetti, 479); Quintillianus (De Rossi, i. 222); Quintus, m. (May x.); Sextus (Perret, lxii.); Septimus (ib. lxix.); Septimius (ib. xvii.); Octaviana (Marangoni, Cose Gent. 454); Octavia (Fabretti, 375); Octavius, m. (Nov. xx.); Octavianus (De Boissieu, Suppl. xiv.); Nonnosa (De Rossi, i. 205); Nonnosus (Le Blant, i. 110); Decia (Aringhi, ii. 262); Chylianus, martyr bishop (July viii.).

(δ) From colours. Albanus (June, xxi.); Albano (Marini, 266); Albina (Reines. 952); Candidus (Perret, xxxvi); Candida (De Rossi, i. 346); Candidiana (Doni, 539–70); Flavius (Bosio, 433); Fusca, v. m. (Feb. xiii.); Fusculus, m. (Sept. vi.); Nigrinus (Le Blant, i. 388); Rubicus (Passionei, 118); Rufus (Mai, v. 404).

(ε) From animals. Names of this class, already adopted by paganism, seem to have become more common among Christians; not improbably, as Martigny suggests, from a sentiment of humility. Aper (Act. S. V. 93); Aequitius (Oderico, 33); Agnes, v. m. (Jan. xxi.; Le Blant, ii. 455); Agnella (De Rossi, i. 277); Agnellus (Dec. xiv.); Aquila, m. (June xxiii.); Aquilinus, m. (May xvi.); Aquilius (Le Blant, i. 157); Asella (Act. S. V. 120); Asellus (Maffei, 281); Asellicete (Marini, 394); Asellicus (ib. 422); Asellianus (Boldetti, 487); Asellius (Marini, 293); Asinia (Lupi, Severi martyris epitaph. 102); Basiliscus, m. (Mar. iii.); Capra (Boldetti, 361); Capriola (Act. S. V. 85); Capriole (ib. 102); Caprioles (Perret, v. pl. 5); Castora (Maffei, 264); Castoria (De Rossi, i. 284); Castorius, (Gruter, 1050, 10); Castorinus (Act. S. V. 129); Castellus (Bosio, 106); Catalinus, m. (July, xv.); Catullina (Act. S. V. 131); Cerviola (Mai, v. 424); Cervinus (Lupi, Severi m. epitaph. 173); Cervonia (Marangoni, 460); Columba, m. (Sept. xvii.), Columbanus, etc.; Dracontius (Buonarr. Vetri, 169); Damalis is perhaps the true form of Damaris, a convert of St. Paul at Athens; Felicula (Fabretti, 549) and Faelicla; Formica (Muratori, 1872, 5); Leo (Passionei, 125); Leonilla, Leontia (Marini, 188); Leonteia (ib. Arv. 422); Leontius (De Boissieu, Suppl. iv.); Leopardo (De Rossi, i. 136); Leopardus (Perret, v. pl. 26); Lepusculus Leo, these two names of a child present themselves in singular contrast on a Roman marble of the year 401 (De Rossi, i. 226); Lupus, m. (Oct. xiv.); Lupercus (Perret, v. pl. 41); Lupicinus (Marini, Arv. 296); Lupicus (Boldetti, 398); Lupula (Le Blant, i. 396); Melissa (Act. S. V. 96); Merola (De Boissieu, 545); Merulus, m. (Jan. xvii.); Muscula (Perret, v. pl. 33 and 71); Onager (Boldetti, 428); Palumba (Muratori, 1919, 11); Palumbus (Boldetti. 413); Panteris (Perret, v. pl. 50); Pardales (De Rossi, i. 248); Pecus (Mai, v. 397); Pecorius (Lupi, 181); Porcaria (De Boissieu, 561); Porcella (Boldetti, 376); Porcus, Porcia (Boldetti, 449); Serpentia (ib. 482); Soricius (Act. S. V. 153); Taurus (Boldetti, 413); Taurinus (Perret, v. pl. 58); Tigris (Fabretti, ii. 287); Tigridina (Boldetti, 346); Tigridius (Le Blant, i. 26); Tigrinianus (Boldetti, 416); Tigrinus (Reines. xx. 398); Tigritis (De Rossi, i. 281); Tigrius, m. (Jan. xii.); Turdus (Boldetti, 400); Turtura (De Rossi, i. 423); Ursa (Boldetti, 429); Ursacius (Lami, de Erudit. Apost. 353); Ursicinus (Perret, v. pl. 36); Ursulus (Marini, Alb. 193); Ursula, v. m. (Oct. 21); Ursus (Boldetti, 308); Vitella (Bottari, ii. 127); Vitellianus (Maffei, 483). Many of these names owe their preservation to the fact of their having been borne by martyrs. A stone engraved by Macarius (Hagiogl. 200) gives us the name ΙΧΘΤCA from ἰχθύς, a fish (ΙΧΘΤC). As if to leave no doubt that the significance of the name was present to the minds of those to whom the bearer was known, we sometimes find, side by side, a figure of the animal delineated. Thus the name of Porcella is accompanied by a design of a young sow (Boldetti, 376); that of Dracontius (ib. 386) by that of a serpent; that of Onager (ib. 428) by that of an ass; that of Caprioles by that of a young goat; that of Turtura, by two turtles (Mai, v. 451); that of Aquilius, by two eagles (De Boissieu, 562). Over the tomb of a female Christian named Aquilina (Boldetti, 397) there is the representation of a flying eagle; while on the marble of Pontius Leo, in the corridor of the Vatican, there is the figure of a lion. Signs of another description are used in the same way. The following is one which can only be explained thus: GENETHLIA IVGATI COIVGI IN PACE. This inscription is accompanied by a design (see woodcut) evidently intended for a yoke, in allusion to the name of the husband, Jugas.

(θ) From Jewels.—Chrysanthus, husband of St. Daria; Margaret (μαργαρίτης) vir. m. of Antioch; Sapphira, this entirely shunned by Christians; Smaragdus, m.

(ι) From maritime or military life.—Symbols and names of the former class were adopted by Christians in the first ages of the church, precedents being afforded by the New Testament. Armiger (Hübner, n. 7); Emerentiana, m.; Marinus (Bosio, 564); Marina (Maffei, 208); Maritimus (Fabretti, viii. 5); Maritima (Reines. xx. 443); Nabira, accompanied by the design of a ship (Boldetti, 373); Nancello (ib. 485); Nauticus (Aringhi, ii. 261); Navalis, m. (Dec. xvi.); Navicia (De Rossi, i. 40); Navigia, Navigius (Muratori, 1924, 1997); Nautico (Bosio, 506); Navicius (Doni, xx. 64); Pelagia (Bosio, 213). This name also occurs in an inscription given by Marangoni, "Pelagiae Restitutae Filiae" (Act. S. V. 107), with a fish between two anchors. Pelagio (Bosio, 507); Pelagius (Marchi, 163); Pelacianus (Fabretti, 549); Scutarius, bp. (Le Blant, i. 346); Sicarius, St. (ib. i. 49); Thalasia (ib. i. 147); Thalassus (Reines. xx. 395); Thalassiae (Spon, Miscell. 232); Talassobe (Bosio, 283).

(κ) From Rivers.—Cydnus (Boldetti, 392); Inachus (Fabretti, 548); Jordanis (Muratori, 1972); Nilus (ib.); Rodane, m. of Lyons; Rodanus (Mai, v. 401–8); Siquana, name of a female Christian whose titulus was discovered in the Quartier St. Just, at Lyons (De Boissieu, 567). The church of Evreux celebrates on Jan. xxii. a martyr of the name of Orontius, who suffered under Diocletian.

(λ) From Countries and Cities.—Afra, m. (May xxiv.); Africanus, m. (April x); Africa (Hübner, n. 71); Alexandria (Boldetti, 484); Araba, m. (Mar. xiii.); Ausonia, m. of Lyons; Barbara, m. of Heliopolis; Calcedonius (Act. S. V. 108); ΧΑΛΚΗΔΟΝΙC (Fabretti, 592); Creticus (Boldetti, 430); Cyprianus, bp. of Carthage, m. (Sept. xiv.); Daciana (Maffei, 179); Dalmatia (Le Blant, ii. 144); Dalmatius (D'Agincourt, iii. 10); Dardanius (Le Blant, i. 349); Galatia (Boldetti, 808); Garamantius, from a country in Libya (Act. S. V. 82); Germanus, St., opponent of Pelagius; Galla (Le Blant, i. 363); Graecinia (Boissieu, Suppl. 28); Heraclia (Lupi, ii.); Italia (Pellicia, Polit. Eccl. iv. 152); Laodicia (Mai, v. 437); Ligurius (Reines. cl. xx. 115); Libya, m. in Syria (June xv.); Lydia (Acts, xv. 19); Macedonia (Boldetti, 477); Macedonius (De Rossi, i. 500); Maura (Le Blant, i. 382); Mauritius (ib. ii. 45); Maurus, disciple of St. Benedict; Partenope (Perret, xx. 82); Pelusius, m. at Alexandria (Apr. vii.); Pausilippus, m. (Apr. xv.); Roma (Aringhi, ii. 169); Romanus (Passionei, 124); POMANOC (Mus. Later. Inscrip. class. xviii. 9); Sabina, m. (Aug. xxix.); Sabinianus, m. (Jan. xxix.); Sabinus, m. (Jan. xxv. and Boldetti, 545); Sabinilla (Mai, v. 477); Sabinilius (De Rossi, i. 269); Samaius (Boldetti, 534); Salonice (ib. 419); Sebastianus, from Sebastos, the Greek equivalent for Augustus, probably prior to the assumption of the title by Diocletian and his colleague, but frequent in the Martyrology. Sepianus (Sept. xix.); Sidonia (Boldetti, 481); Tessalius (Boldetti, 413); Thessalonica, m. (Nov. 7); Tiburtius (Mamachi, ii. 230); Trajanus, bp. of Saintes (Greg. Tur. de Glor. Conf. c. lix.); Transpadanus (Mai, v. 408); Troadius, m. at Neo-Caesarea in Pontus (Greg. Nyss. in Act. Greg. Thaum.); Tuscula (Boldetti, 436); Urbanus, greeted by St. Paul.

(μ) From the Months. Aprilis (Boldetti, 409, 420; Maffei, 288; Marini, Arv. 506); December (Marangoni, Cose Gent. 467); ΔΕΚΕΜΒΡΟC (Perret, v. pl. 77); Decembrina (Boldetti, 389); Februarius (Le Blant, i. 324); Januaria (Marini, Arv. 170); Januaris (Boldetti, 55); Januarius (Gazzera, Append. ii.); Januarinus (Fabretti, 552); Julius (Marini, Papiri., 301); Junia (Perret, v. pl. 40); Junianus (ib. v. pl. 32); Kalendius (Boldetti, 490); Marius (Marchi, 91); Martius (ib. 410); October (Act. S. V. 92).

(ν) Implying physical qualities or defects. Balbina (Perret, v. pl. 29); Capito, m. (July 21); Callistus, Callista (Oct. xiv.; Sept. ii.); Crispinus (Perret, vi. 158); Crispus, m. (Oct. xiv.); Currentius (Passionei, 116); Eucharius (Marini, Alb. 32); Eucharistus (Mai, v. 376); ΕΤΧΑΡΙCΤΟC (Aringhi, i. 522); Eucharistianus (Boldetti, 382); Fronto, m. (April xvi.); Longina (Boldetti, 475); Pulcheria, v. m. (Sept. x.); Venustus (May vi.); Venustianus, m. (Dec. xxx.).

(ξ) Implying mental or moral qualities (very numerous). Agathon, m. (Dec. xvii.); Amandius (De Boissieu. 13); Amantius (Perret, v. p. 54); Amator (Hübner, n. 171); derivatives from amo seem to have been especially in favour with the Christians of Gaul. Angelica (Perret, v. pl. 23); Aristo (De Rossi, i. 166); Bona (Boldetti, 381); Bonifacius, m. under Diocletian (Ruinart, 284); Bonosus (Ciampini, Vet. Mon. i. 275); Bonusa (Perret, v. pl. 9); Benignus (Boldetti, 489); Candidus, Candida (Martyrol. passim); Candidiana (De Rossi, i. 44); Casta (Mai, v. 425); Castinus (Act. S. V. 82); Castus (Boldetti, 390); Clarus, St., first bp. of Nantes, 3rd century; Clemes (Act. S. V. 89); Clementianus (ib. 132); Concordia (Le Blant, i. 344); Constantia (Marini, Alb. 31); Constantius (Act. S. V. 96); Contumeliosus, with the adjunct Venerabilis (Le Blant, i. 177); Credula, m. (Ruinart, 201); Crescens, companion of St. Paul; Decentius (Boldetti, 345); Digna (ib. 492); Dignitas (ib. 410); Dignantius (Le Blant, i. 350); Dulcitia (Le Blant, ii. 58); Dulcitudo (Boldetti, 410); Eusebius (ib. 82); ΕΤCΕΒΙΑ (ib. 71); Facundus (Perret, v. pl. 26); Firmus (Act. S. V. 133); Fortissima (Marini, 433); Fulgens, Fulgentius, and the diminutive Fulgentillia in Roman inscription of year 385 (De Rossi, i. 155); Gaudentius, m. (Ruinart, 201); Generose (Mamachi, iii. 243); Generosus, Generosa (Martyrol. passim); Grata, v. m. (May i.); Gratinianus, m. under Decius (June i.); Gratus, m. (Dec. v.); Hidonitas (Oderico, 349); Hilarius, bp. of Poitiers; Honorata (De Boissieu, 47); Honoratus, bp. of Milan (Feb. viii.); Hospitius (May xxi.); Ingenua (Steiner, 849); Innocentia (Boldetti, 79); I nocentina (Perret, v. pl. 37); Innocentius (passim); Justa, Justus (Marini, Pap. 244); Justina (Perret, v. pl. 53); Katharina, v. m. of Alexandria; Lactus (Le Blant, ii. 321); Lumianus for Luminosus (De Rossi, i. 499); Modestus, m.; Nobilis (De Boissieu, 534); Patiens, bp. of Lyons; Pretiosa (De Rossi, i. 213); Pudens, Pudentiana (Muratori, 1854); Probus, m.; Procopius, m. under Diocletian; Reverens (Olerico, 34); Sanctus, Sanctinus (Muratori, 1985, 12); Scholastica, sister of St. Benedict; Sedatus (Steiner, 830); Serenus (Bosio, 534); Severus (Marchi, 85); Simplicius (ib. 27); ΣΙΜΠΛΗΚΙΑ (Act. S. V. 71); Studentius (Muratori, 1907); Urbana (Hübner, n. 112); Venerandus (Marini, Pap. 332); Vera (Perret, v. pl. 62); Verus (Act. S. V. 85); Viricunda (Perret, v. p. 51); Vigilantius (Passionei, 125); Virissimus (Boldetti, 431).

(o) Indicative of servile condition or extraction.

The sect to which Minucius Felix refers (c. 8; Migne, iii. 259) as "latebrosa et lucifugax natio," appears to have included many of the servile class, though, where the master himself became a convert to Christianity, their enfranchisement almost necessarily followed. Tertullian, in adducing examples to shew how ineffectual was the reformation of character that followed upon conversion to protect the Christian from the odium attaching to the name, takes as one of his instances the converted slave (Apol. c. 8; Migne, i. 281). [SLAVERY.]

Two martyrs bearing the name of Servus suffered under Hunneric in the 5th century; one at Carthage (Aug. xvii.), the other at Tibur (Dec. vii). In the Roman Martyrology we find Servilius (May xxiv.) Servilianus, a m. under Trajan (Apr. xx.), and Servulus, a m. at Adrumetum (Feb. xxi.). This last name also occurs on a Roman marble of the year 424 (De Rossi, i. 277). Other examples are Bernacle (Boldetti, 55); Bernacla (Fabretti, viii. 140) for Vernacla; Verna (Maffei, 358); Vernacia (Act. S. V. 95); Vernacla (Le Blant, i. 119); Vernacolo (Bosio, 408); Vernacula (Boldetti, 54); Serbulus (Reines. 987); Servilianus (Mai, v. 406); Servuli (Bosio, 213).

(π) Diminutives, expressive of endearment, and chiefly bestowed on females, are common to pagan and Christian usage. Augustula (Marchi, 30); Capriola (Perret, v. pl. 75); Castula (Doni, xx. 91); Catullina (Act. S. V. 131); Fabiola (De Rossi, i. 344), d. 452, consequently not the Fabiola praised by Jerome; Feliciola (Perret, v. pl. 67); Fornicula (Boldetti, 545); Fortunula (Act. S. V. 94); the tomb of a young female in the year 444 gives the diminutive Gemmula (De Rossi, i. 313); Muscula (ib. 112); Rosula, m. (Sept. xiv.); Sanctula (Stein, 835); Serenilla (Boldetti, 365); Silviola (De Rossi, i. 235).

Examples of abnormal forms of inflexion sometimes occur: as Julianen*is* for Julian*ae*, Zosimen*is* for Zosimae. We also find Irenetis, Ispetis, Leopardetis, etc. (Lupi, Sever. m. Epitaph. 157). These latter forms, however, occur as early as the commencement of the Empire, examples being found of the time of Claudius and even in that of Augustus (Caredoni, Cimit. 157).

(ρ) Names of historical celebrity frequently occur, especially in the Acta Martyrum: Agrippina an aged m. under Valerian (May xxiv.); Alexander (Martyrol. passim); Amphion, bp. in Cilicia, conf. under Maximin (June xii.); Amulius (Boldetti, 475); Annon, bp. of Cologne (Dec. iv.); Antigonius, m. at Rome (Feb. xxvii.); Antiochus, m. at Sebaste (July xv.); Antonius, passim; Apelles, one of the earliest converts (Romans xvi. 10); Arcadius (Jan. xii.); Archelaus (Mar. iv.); Augustus, m. in Nicomedia (May vii.); Cato (Le Blant, i. 334); Cesar (ib. i. 344); Cesarius (ib. i. 72); Cornelia (ib. i. 345); Darius, m. in Nicaea (Dec. ix.); Demetrius, passim; Democritus, m. (July xxxi.); Diocles, m. in Istria (May xxiv.); Diomedes, m. in Laodicea (Sept. xi.); Domitianus, deacon, m. at Ancyra (Dec. xxviii.); Epictetus, m. (Aug. xxii.); Fabius, m. at Caesarea (July xxxi.); Flavius, Flavia (May vii., Oct. v.); Hadrianus, m. at Caesarea (May v.); Heraclius, passim; Juliana, m.; Julianus (De Rossi, i. 500); Narses, m. in Persia under Sapor; Orestes, m. under Diocletian (Nov. ix.); Otacilia, wife of the emperor Philip; Patroclus (Le Blant, ii. 416); Peleus, bp. m. in Phoenicia, under Diocletian (Feb. xx.); Philadelphus, m. (May x.); Plato, m. at Ancyra (July xxii.); Plutarchus, m. (June xxviii.) Pompeius, bp. of Pavia (Dec. xiv.); Poppaea (Boldetti, 361); Ptolemaeus, soldier in Alexandria, m. (Dec. x.); Pyrus (Boldetti, 415); Satyrus (De Rossi, i. 198); Seleucus, m. (Feb. xvi.); Socrates, m. (Apr. xix.); Themistocles, m. in Lycia, under Decius (Dec. xxi.); Theodosius, m. (Mar. xxvi.); Thraseas, bp. m. at Smyrna (Oct. v.); Tiberius, m. under Diocletian, (Nov. x.); Timolaus, m. at Caesarea, under the same (Mar. xxiv.); Titus, disciple of St. Paul; also m. at Rome (Aug. xvi.); Valens, bp. m. (May xxi.); three martyrs bearing the names of three Roman emperors, Valerianus, Macrinus, and Gordianus, suffered at Nyon in Switzerland; but nothing is known respecting them, beyond the fact of their martyrdom. Varus, soldier, m. under Maximin (Oct. xix.); Vergilius (De Rossi, i. 195); Volusianus, bp. of Tours in the time of Childeric, son of Clovis (Greg. Tur. Hist. Franc. ii. 26).

B. NAMES OF CHRISTIAN ORIGIN AND SIGNIFICANCE.

Aeternalis, found on an ancient marble at Vienne, supposed by Martigny to be the only instance of this as a proper name; Hübner, however (n. 25) gives another example found at Emerita in Lusitania. Anastasia (Perret, v. pl. 61); Anastasius (Boldetti, 363); Athanasia, Athanasius (Martyrol. passim, but almost entirely confined to Italy); Christianus, Christela, m. (Oct. xxvii.); Christinus, Christophorus (July xxv.); Aquisita (Act. S. V. 123); Redempta (Lupi, 185; De Rossi, i. 156); ΡΕΔΕΜΠΤΑ (Act. S. V. 109); Redemptius (Vermiglioli, Iscr. Perus. 589); Redemptus (Lupi, ib. 110; Gazzera, 10; De Boissieu, Append. 10); Reparatus (Nicolai, 232). With reference to spiritual salvation: Salutia (Bosio, 532); Salvius (Jan. xi.); Soteris (Act. S. V. 91). With reference to Predestination: Prelecta (De Rossi, i. 597); ΡΕΚΕΠΤΟΣ, Receptus (Aringhi, iv. 37, p. 121). Referring to the new birth and adoption by baptism: Adepta (De Boissieu, 534); Renata (Act. S. V. 84); Restitutus (Boldetti, 399), this last being of frequent occurrence in the Martyrology. With reference to the spiritual life: Viventius (Act. S. V. 106); Vivianus (ib. 134; Vitalis (ib. 88); Vitalissimus (ib. 123); Zoe (ib. 129); ΖΩΤΙΚΕ (Osann. 441, 119); Refrigerius (De Rossi, i. 88); Refrigeria (Boldetti, 286–7). Paumulus, from πνεῦμα, expressive of divine inspiration, occurs on a marble from Lyons (De Boissieu, 582).

(β) From Festivals and Rites of the Church. Epiphana, m. under Diocletian (July xii.); Epiphanius (De Rossi, i. 287); the mother of the emperor Heraclius I. was called Epiphania (in later times the more common form of this name was Theophania): Natalis, Natalia, m. (July xxvii.); Natalis (Boldetti, 492); Pascasia (De Boissieu, 550); Pascasius (Glorgi, de Mon. Cris. 33); Pascasus (Act. S. V. 108); Pasqualina (Nicolai, Basil. di S. P. 230); Parasceves, m. (Mar. xx.); Eulogia (Buon. Vetri, tav. iii. 2); Sabbatius (Passionei, 135); Sabbatia (De Rossi, i. 87); Sabbatus (Boldetti, 490).

(γ) Martyrdom, from the veneration which it commanded, often induced Christians to adopt the names of the sufferers; while the generic term gave rise to the name Martyrius or Martyria (Lupi, 82; Gruter, mliii. 3; Marangoni, etc.). Martigny compares with this the widespread name of Toussaint (All Saints) in modern times.

(δ) From Christian virtues. Among these Agape and Irene, with their derivatives, are of especially frequent occurrence, the latter being often borne by the Eastern empresses. They are also common on the earliest monuments. In a fresco from the cemetery of St. Marcellin-et-Pierre (Bottari, 127) they appear to be employed with a figurative allusion to the heavenly feast therein depicted, but they are also to be found with unquestionable reference to individuals (Boldetti, 55; Ruinart, 348). The collection by Le Blant (i. 40) gives the epitaph of a Lyonnese merchant with the name of Agapus; so Agapetus (Perret, v. pl. 27 and 62); Agapenis (De Rossi, i. 99 and 209). A splendid sarcophagus in Boldetti (p. 466) gives us Aurelia Agapetilla. Sometimes the names of the three Christian virtues, Pistis, Elpis, Agape, are united in one family (De Rossi, IXΘTC 19). The Roman Martyrology (Aug. i.) records these names as those of three virgins who suffered under Hadrian. Passionei (118, 47) has the epitaph of a Christian lady named Fides. The first wife of Boethius was, according to tradition, a daughter of the consul Festus, and bore the name of Elpis. The bishop of the church at Lyons, in 426, was named Elpidius (Boev. Lugd. Sept. xi.). Other forms, such as Elpisura, Elpidephorus, are to be met with (Boldetti, 366). Ispes (Perret, v. pl. 32); Spesina (Cyprian, Epist. xxi., Migne, iv. 281; Vermiglioli, Iscr. Perug. 587). Caritosa (Perret, v. pl. 77); Charitina, virg. m. under Diocletian (Oct. v.). From Irene we have Irenaeus, a name borne by many martyrs as well as by the famous bishop of Lyons. The church at Gaza in Palestine had a bishop named Irenion, whom it commemorates Dec. xvi. Brotherly love is expressed by names like Adelfius (De Boissieu, 597) and Adelphus (Martyr. Gallic. April xxviii.).

Adeodatus (Perret, i. pl. 31); Adeodata (De Rossi, i. 164); Ambrose, with allusion to the bread of life; Amphibalus (?), priest for whom St. Alban gave himself up to martyrdom; Angelica (Perret, v. pl. 31); Aromatia (Maffei, 279); Benedictus; Cyricus (Act. S. V. 89); Cyriacus, child m. in Seleucia; also (Marini, Arv. 266), with other names derived from Κύριος. Deicola (Jan. xviii.); Deogratias (Kalend. Carth. Ruinart, 532); Deusdedit (De Rossi, i. 406), and of frequent occurrence in the Martyrologies; Donatus, the grammarian, tutor of St. Jerome; Donata (Perret, v. pl. 21); Erasmus, m. under Diocletian; Evangelius (Perret, v. 19); Memoriolus (Le Blant, i. 107) (?), with reference to the phrase frequent in Christian epitaphs, bonae memoriae; Pientia (Fabretti, 579); Pius, the first pope of this name suffered under Antoninus; Sanctus, m. at Lyons; Sanctinus (De Rossi, i. 532); Sanctulus (Boldetti, 436); Sophia, first introduced from the dedication of the newly-erected church at Constantinople, was subsequently adopted by the niece of Justinian's consort; it afterwards became a favourite name with the imperial princesses, and spread widely among the Slavonic nations; Vera (Le Blant, ii. 234); Vitalis (De Rossi, i. 212).

Derivatives from Θεός are frequent; many, however, appear to have been transmitted from paganism. Theophilus was the name of a Greek poet of the Middle Comedy, and the individual addressed by St. Luke must evidently have been so called prior to his conversion to Christianity; one of the last high priests was also so named. Thekla, the feminine of Θεοκλῆς (also a pagan name), is said by tradition to hav been a disciple of St. Paul at Ancona. In most of the pagan names of this class the word probably denotes merely a high degree of excellence. ΘΕΟΤΕΚΝΕ and ΘΕΟΚΤΙCΤΕ (Marini, Alb. 98) are probably distinctively Christian; as also Theopistes, m. (Sept. xx.). The name of Servus Dei occurs on some of the marbles of the earlier centuries (Act. S. V. 132), and also as borne by two martyrs of Cordova (Jan. xiii.; Sept. vi.); but Boldetti, who at first took it for a proper name in the inscription on a tomb in the cemetery of St. Praetextatus, subsequently found the words impressed with a seal on the cement of a loculus in the cemetery of St. Agnes—a fact that would seem to imply that it was customary to stamp them on the tombs. Ancilla Dei, according to De Rossi (i. 133), was also a proper name; and an inscription of the year 366 gives us Quod vult Deus (ib. 99). This latter is not unfrequent in the earlier centuries, and was borne by a bishop of Carthage of the 5th century, and by a Donatist bishop, a contemporary of Augustine. Hübner (n. 2) gives the singular name Deidomus. A marble at Naples bears an inscription with the name Habet Deus (Fabretti, 757). The first Saxon archbishop was called Deusdedit (Haddan and Stubbs, Conc. iii. 99). [INSCRIPTIONS, i. 853a.]

(η) Other names express the Christian joy and assurance in the midst of tribulation: Beatus (Perret, 59); Caelestinus (De Rossi, i. 72); Exillaratus (ibid. i. 533); Felix, Felicio (Marini, Atti, 110, 26); Felicissimus (Act. S. V. 91); Fidencius (Le Blant, ii. 15); Gaudentiolus (ib. i. 364); Gaudentius, Gaudiosus (Fabretti, iv. 46); Hilara (Marchi, 53); Hilaris, Hilaritas (Boldetti, 397, 407); Hilarius (Martyrol. passim); Hilarus (Marchi, 39); Ilarissus (Marini, Arv. 405); Iodocus (from jocus), an Armorican prince who settled as a hermit in Pontlieu, and gave his name to a monastery owned by Alcuin; Jubilator (Aringhi, ii. 175); Sozomen, the church historian; Sozomene (Le Blant, ii. 234); Tutus (ib. i. 204).

The designation υἱοὶ φωτός (1 Thess. v. 5) seems to have suggested many names. Boldetti (407) gives an inscription containing three derivatives from lux.

LUCEIO LUCELLO FLORENTIO QUI VIXIT ANN. XIIII. MENS) IIII.
DIEB. XXVIII. ORIS XS. LUCEIUS
RUFINUS PATER CONTRA VOTUM.

Towards the close of the 4th century, the name of Mary, preceded or followed by another, is occasionally to be met with. LIVIA MARIA IN PACE (De Rossi, i. 143); MAPIE ΙΦΙΝΙ, Iphinae for Rufinae (Act. S. V. 77). It occurs, also, in two inscriptions given by Perret: MARIA IN PACE (v. c.) and MARIA FECIT FILIAE CIRICE (lxiii. 23). De Boissieu (p. 585) gives the epitaph of one Maria Venerabilis, a centenarian of Lyons in the 5th century. A marble of the cemetery of SS. Thruso et Saturninus (Act. S. V. 89) gives the name of Anna, but this is yet more rare.

The following are instances of apostolic names:—Andreas (Vermiglioli, 589); ΑΝΔΡΕΑC (Osann. 428, xliv.); Johannes (Marini, Pop. 251), Ruinart, passim; with the commencement of the 5th century the name becomes of more common occurrence (De Rossi, i. 278, 280). Paulus (Act. S. V. 105; De Rossi, i. 191); ΦΛΑΤΙΟC ΠΑΤΛΟC (Act. S. V. 73); Paula (ib. 106). Petrus (Marchi, 27; Hubner, n. 135a); ΠΕΤΡΟC (Osann. ib. xlvi.), with its derivatives Petrius (Act. S. V. 129); Petronia (Montfaucon, Iter Ital. 118); Thomas, extremely rare, occurs in the year 490 (De Rossi, i. 398; Hubner, n. 178). Osann. (485, xi.) gives us the derivation from Stephanus of ΣΤΕΦΑΝΙΝΟC.

Among names taken from the Old Testament, that of Susanna is not uncommon: SVSSANNA (De Rossi, i. 196); Rebecca is found in a Roman epitaph of the 4th century (De Rossi, ib. 96) REVECCAE INNOCENTI. Many names of martyrs are of this class: Moyses, at Alexandria (Feb. xiv.); Samuel and Daniel, in Mauritania (Oct. xiii.); Tobias, at Sebaste under Licinius (Nov. ii.).

The European races which remained unsubdued by the arms of the Empire, or but imperfectly subjugated, offer certain points of contrast which may be briefly noted. Among the Celts there is discernible, on the part of the early converts, a feeling of deeper reverence and humility in the adoption of sacred names. The prefixes of Ceile (the companion or vassal), Cear (the friend), Cailleach (the handmaiden), and giolla, the modern gillie, and mael, a disciple, denote nothing more than relations of reverent dependence. St. Michael was the object of widespread devotion; hence Cear Michael, now Carmichael. In many Irish families of the old Celtic blood Gilla Christ (Gilchrist) appears to have been a Christian name (Petrie and Stokes, p. 67). Gillespiug (Gillespie, cspiuj = episcopus) belonged to the line of Diarmid. The names of four northern proprietors in Domesday Book,—Ghilemicel, Ghilander, Ghillepetair, and Ghilebrid,—probably attest the presence of a Celtic element attracted by the illustrious foundation at Lindisfarne. The name of Mary, which gradually spread in the Latin church, after the 4th century (Northcote and Brownlow, R. S., pp. 254–7) is wanting, a point illustrative possibly of the divergence between Celtic and Latin Christianity; it is not until the 12th century that we find the name of Mailmare, "servant of Mary" (Petrie and Stokes, 59). Maelcolum (Malcolm) bears testimony to the veneration in which the memory of the apostle of Iona was held.

Among the Teutonic races on the continent we find ourselves on less firm ground. Many names compounded with that of the Supreme Being were assumed in purely pagan times, and it is often a matter for doubt whether the prefix that belongs to names of this character does not really denote a name of the numerous class commencing with gund (war), a class conceived in a very different spirit. Other names, again, like Theodoric, Theudebert, etc., offer a deceptive but unreal appearance of affinity to Greek Christian derivatives. Converts appear to have retained their names unchanged; Ereda (? Freda), Brinca or Bringa, Uviliaric, Trasaric, Sedaigauchus, occur as those of Gothic Christians (McCaul, Christian Inscr. p. 21); in the opinion of Schottel (Teutsche Haubtsprache, p. 1031) it was not until after the death of the emperor Friedrich II. (ann. 1250) that, under ecclesiastical influences, Germany began to admit a certain infusion of Latin elements in her nomenclature. Pott, however, recognises a Christian element in proper names like Traugott, Dankegott, Gottlob ('Deum lauda'), and in family names such as Kennegott, Lebgott, Gottleber, regarding them as originally imperatives, dictated by pious sentiment. To Herr and Herrgott, which some have derived from the pagan Divus (e.g., Divus Augustus, Divus Antiochus, etc., combined with the equivalent for Θεός), he attributes a like origin (Die Personennamen, pp. 94–98).

An interesting illustration of the importance of this subject will be found at p. 879, in the account there given of the name Veronica—an example of the manner in which a false etymology has sometimes in turn given rise to the fabrication of legend.

NAMES APPLIED TO CHRISTIANS.

[FAITHFUL.]

NAMES, OBLATION OR RECITAL OF.

I. The Offerers.—It was a very early rule in the church, that when the bishop received any gifts for the poor, he should inform them "who the donor was, that they might pray for him by name." This precept was in the original text of the Apostolical Constitutions, being found in the Syriac recension as well as in the interpolated Greek (Bunsen, Analecta Ante-Nicæna, ii. 133, 286). When converts were numerous this could hardly be carried out otherwise than by a public notice in church, and if this was done in the case of offerings for the poor, it would soon be done for other offerings. Such is the probable origin of the recital or "oblation" of the names of the offerers in the Liturgy. If a gift were brought on behalf of the sick or otherwise suffering, or of one deceased, then it was their name, not that of the person who brought it, which was offered. In any case the publication of the name was understood as a request for the prayers of the church on behalf of the person named.

St. Cyprian uses the phrase "nomen offerre" of the living, when, complaining of the too easy absolution granted to the lapsed, he says, "While the persecution still continues, ere the peace of the church itself is yet restored, they are admitted to communicate, and their name is offered" (Ad Presbyt. Ep. 16). When he forwarded a charitable collection to Numidia, he gave the bishops there the names of all the contributors, and of the other bishops, and of the priests, who had assisted in making it, "that they might bear them in mind in their petitions, and make a return for their good work in sacrifices and prayers" (PRECES, Ad Januar. Ep. 62). St. Jerome speaks more than once of this practice, which appears to have had its evils after the conversion of the empire: "The names of the offerers are now publicly recited, and the redemption of sins is turned into praise" (Comment. in Jerem. ii. i. 16); "The deacon recites in the churches the names of the offerers, 'She offers so much,' 'He has promised so much,' and they take pleasure in the applause of the people, while conscience is tormenting them" (Comm. in Ezek. vi. xviii. 5–9). When the benefaction was of an enduring kind, as the erection or endowment of a church, the name was recited at every celebration. Thus St. Chrysostom (Hom. xviii. in Acta Apost. 5), addressing the founder of a church, "Is it a small thing, tell me, for thy name to have a place perpetually in the holy oblations?" The council of Merida, 666, decreed that "the names of those by whom it is certain that churches have been built or who are declared, or who have been declared, to have given anything to the said holy churches, shall, if they are living in the body, be recited before the altar in the time of mass; but that, if they have departed or shall depart from this life, their names shall be recited with those of the faithful departed, in their order" (can. 19). The publication of the names of the dead, when an offering was made for them, is found in Africa in the 3rd century. Thus St. Cyprian, ordering that "no oblation should be made for the falling asleep" of one who had broken a law of the church, gives as the reason that one who had done so did "not deserve to be named at the altar in the prayer of the priests" (Epist. ad Presbyt. Furnit. 1). St. Augustine, speaking of the future punishment of heresiarchs, says, "In that day there will be none to recite the names of the chiefs of their madness at the altar" (C. Parmen. iii. 6.)

II. Names constantly offered.—The names of the offerers on a given occasion, and of the sufferers or the dead for whom oblations were made, would be published only once or a few times at the most; but there were other names, as those of the bishop, archbishop, &c., certain eminent teachers of the church, whether living or dead, and those of departed martyrs, confessors, &c., including the apostles and the Blessed Virgin, which were recited continually. These were inscribed in the DIPTYCHA. In Africa at least, the names of the priests seem also to have been recited from a written document. Thus St. Augustine, suggesting that the name of a suspected priest should "not be recited," says, "For what hurt does it do to one, that human ignorance will not have him recited from that tablet, if a guilty conscience does not blot him out from the book of the living?" (Epist. 78 ad Cler. § 4).

III. When offered.—At first the names of the living and of the dead were recited at the same part of the service. Thus in a Gothico-Gallican Collectio post Nomina: "Let us beseech God. . . . that He sanctify the names of the offerers and of the departed, which have been recited." (Liturg. Gall. 221). Again: "Let us commemorate the names of those who offer and of those who are at rest" (255). Similarly in Mozarabic Orationes post Nomina: "Offerentibus venia et defunctis requies condonetur" (Miss. Moz. Leslie, 17); "Nominibus sanctorum martyrum offerentiumque fidelium atque eorum qui ab hoc sæculo transierunt, a ministris jam sacri ordinis recensitis" (27); etc. That the names were all offered about the same time is also implied whenever petitions for the living and the dead occur in the same collect, as Miss. Goth. u.s. 191, 194, 201, &c.; Miss. Gall. Vet. 365, 571; Miss. Moz. u. s. 34, 43, 46, &c. In the Mozarabic Missal the Post Nomina follows the names of a long series of confessors: "Let the presbyter say, Our priests offer an oblation to the Lord God. . . . Making a commemoration of the most blessed apostles and martyrs, the glorious holy Virgin Mary. . . . Also for the spirits of those at rest, Hilary, Athanasius, Martin, Ambrose, Augustine," &c. (46 names). There is no direction for the recital of the names of the offerers or others, but after the Post Nomina, the following constant form, from which the practice appears, is said, "Let the presbyter say, For Thou art the life of the living, the health of the sick, and the rest of the faithful departed, for ever and ever" (Leslie, 4). So of the Post Nomina itself, St. Isidore, 610, says, "Effunditur pro offerentibus sive pro defunctis fidelibus" (De Eccl. Off. i. 15).

The later Roman rule and the reason for it were, as we learn from Pseudo-Innocent, as follows: "Thou mayest know of thyself, of thine own good sense, how superfluous it is for thee to mention the name of him whose oblation thou offerest to God (though nothing be hid from Him) previously; (that is), before the priest makes the prayers (PRECES), and by his petitions commends the oblations of those whose names are to be recited. The oblations are therefore to be commended first, and then the names of those, whose oblations they are, to be given out: that they may be named in the holy mysteries [i.e., in the Missa Fidelium, or anaphora], and not among the other forms [as in the secreta, or collectio post nomina] which we put before them, that by the mysteries themselves we may open the way for our subsequent prayers" (Ep. ad Decent. 2). Hence the origin of the Commemoratio pro vivis before the consecration, and the Commemoratio pro defunctis after it in the Roman canon. In both, the priest may still call up silently the names of any for whom he desires to pray (Ritus Celebr. viii. 3; ix. 2); but when the change was first made, the canon was still said, and therefore the names would be recited, aloud. See Notitia Eucharistica, ed. 2, p. 565. In the Vatican MS. of the Gregorian Sacramentary, printed by Rocca (Opp. Greg. V. 63; ed. 1615), the former commemoration runs as follows: "Memento, Domine, famulorum famularumque tuarum, Ill. et Ill. et omnium circum astantium, quorum Tibi fides cognita est et nota devotio, qui Tibi offerunt hoc sacrificium laudis pro se suisque omnibus." The Eligian codex resembles this (Ménard in Opp. Greg., ed. Ben. iii. 3). In the margin of the Othobonian, and in every vacant space about the pages, are many names of the living who sought the prayers of the church, especially of the sick, as well as of deceased persons (Murat. Lit. Rom. Vet. i. 73; ii. 2). One of the Cologne MSS., used by Pamelius, inserts after "tuarum," in the margin, "et eorum quorum nomina ad memorandum conscripsimus, ac super sanctum altare Tuum scripta adesse videntur" (Rituale PP. ii. 180). In the canon as given by Amalarius (Eclogae de Off. Miss. in fine) we have, after "tuarum," "Illorum et Illarum [Hic nomina vivorum memorentur, si volueris; sed non dominica die, nisi certis diebus], et omnium," etc. Sim. a Saltzburg Pontifical, cited by Martene (Ant. Eccl. Rit. I. iv. viii. 15). The old Ambrosian canon here resembles the old Roman, but contains an additional clause which has been borrowed by the later Roman: "Memento, Domine, famulorum famularumque Tuarum [Illorum] et omnium circum adstantium quorum tibi fides cognita est et nota devotio, pro quibus Tibi offerimus vel qui Tibi offerunt," etc. (Murat. u. s. 123).

There is no Commemoratio pro Mortuis in the Gelasian canon (Murat. i. 697), nor in several copies of the Gregorian. Gerbert mentions three in which it is altogether wanting, and three others in which it has been supplied by a later hand (Mon. Vet. Lit. Alemann. i. 236). Only in one copy, it is believed, does a memorial of the dead occur in the canon both before and after the consecration; viz., in the Rhenaugen MS. of the 8th century (itself shewn to be a copy of an earlier) from a transcript of which Gerbert prints. The former of these commemorations, which immediately follows that for the living is as follows: "Memento etiam, Domine, et animarum famulorum famularumque tuarum fidelium Catholicorum in Christo quiescentium, qui nos praecesserunt, illorum et illarum, qui per eleemosynam et confessionem Tibi reddunt vota sua" (ibid. 233). The second memorial after the consecration, in this MS. is, "Memento etiam, Domine, et eorum nomina, qui nos praecesserunt cum signo fidei et dormiunt in somno pacis." With this agrees to the letter one Cologne MS., from which Pamelius prints (i. 182), the Romanising Frankish and Besançon Missals (Murat. ii. 894, 779), and the canon given by Amalarius, but the last named adds, "Et recitantur nomina. Dein postquam recitata fuerint dicit," etc. In others the prayer begins thus: "Super Diptycha" (Cod. Vatic. Rocca), "Memento etiam Domine famulorum (N. Cod. Col. 2; Pamel. u. s.) famularumque (N. Cod. Col. 2) Tuarum (Ill. Rocca and Cod. Eligi. u. s. 4; Illorum et Illarum (with several names in the margin), Codex Vatic. Bibl. Murat. ii. 4) qui nos . . . pacis." All these proceed thus, "Ipsis, Domine, et omnibus in Christo quiescentibus, locum refrigerii, lucis et pacis ut indulgeas deprecamur, per," etc.

The Council of Aix in 789, under the influence of Charlemagne, adopted the later rule of Rome as expressed by Pseudo-Innocent (can. 54; see also Conc. Francof. A.D. 794, can. 51).

The early Ambrosian canon did not commemorate the departed (Murat. u.s. 134), but an unvarying prayer, introduced at an unknown period, was said secretly after the oblations were set on the altar, but before the Offerend, Creed and Super Oblatum, in which both living and dead are prayed for: "Receive, holy Trinity, this oblation which we offer unto Thee . . . for the health and safety of Thy servants and handmaidens N., for whom we have promised to implore Thy clemency, and whose alms we have received, and of all faithful Christians, both living and departed" (Pamel. u. s. i. 298).

The liturgies of the East do not shew expressly where the names of offerers were published, but there is every reason to think that it was done when the diptychs were read. St. Mark thus refers to offerers in a prayer before the anaphora, which, following immediately the diptychs of the dead, intercedes for them and for the living also: "Receive, O God, on to Thy holy, supercelestial, and intellectual altar, the greatness of the heavens, through the ministry of Thy archangels, the thank-offerings of those that offer the sacrifices and oblations, of those who desire to offer much and little, secretly, and openly, and are not able; and of those who have this day offered the oblations" (Renaud. i. 150). In St. James these intercessions come after the consecration. As the offerers are mentioned immediately after the diptychs of the living (compare Assem. Codex Lit. v. 43 with 85), we infer that their names had also been recited at the same time. The clause in St. James is, "Vouchsafe also to remember, O Lord, them who have this day offered these oblations on Thy holy altar, and those for whom each has offered, or has in mind, and those whose names have been now read unto Thee" (u. s. 43). The diptychs of the dead follow. In St. Basil, which is derived from St. James, the diptychs of the living and dead are read before any of the intercessions are said. The following is the reference to the offerers: "Remember, O Lord, those who have offered these gifts unto Thee, and those for whom, and by whom, and on account of whom they have offered them" (Goar, 171). This is not preserved in St. Chrysostom, nor in the Armenian, which is also derived from St. Basil. Perhaps it was thought, when all oblations but those of bread and wine had ceased, that the similar clause in the prayer of prothesis ("Remember those who have offered, and those for whom they have offered," Goar, 63), was sufficient. In St. James this prayer is said with the same intention at the great entrance (Assem. u.s. 17). In the Syriac rites derived from St. James the offerers are prayed for, as in that, when the diptychs are read after the consecration (Renaud. ii. 35, 149, 157, &c.). There is no prayer for them in the Nestorian liturgies, but the usual context comes after (Theod. Renaud. i. 620; Nest. 631), except in the Malabar (Raulin, 314), in which it comes before the consecration, though the diopatkeen (diptychs) were read even before the anaphora. In the Coptic St. Basil the deacon says, "Pray for —," apparently naming the offerers; and the priest, "pointing to the bread and wine," prays for "those who offer them, and those for whom they offer" (Ren. i. 17). This is after the consecration; and so the Greek Alexandrine Basil and Gregory (Ibid. 71, 108); but in the Coptic Gregory and Cyril and the Ethiopic (32, 42, 515), the intercessions, of which this is one, are said before.

IV. Whose names were not offered.—When an oblation was brought, the publication of the name necessarily depended on its acceptance or rejection. Thus the council of Illiberis in 313 forbids the names of energumens to be given out "with an oblation at the altar" (can. 19). On the rejection of oblations, see OBLATIONS, § III. On the exclusion of names of the living or dead for whom mention was claimed as a token of communion, see DIPTYCHS, § 2.

V. By whom the names were recited.—This was generally the office of the deacon, both in the east and west. We have seen it ascribed to him by St. Jerome. St. Isidore of Seville says, "To him also pertains the office of prayers [PRECES], the recitation of the names" (ad Leudefr. 8). Nor is this irreconcilable with the language of St. Cyprian, "Named at the altar of God in the prayer of the priests;" for we may suppose that in Africa, as in Gaul and Spain, the priest made express reference to the names published by the deacons immediately before. If there was an exception, they were rather published by the subdeacon than by the priest. Thus, in an ancient pontifical the MS. of which dates from the tenth century, "the subdeacons behind the altar name or recite the names of the living and dead" (at the "Memento," Missa Ratoldi in Greg. Sacram. App. u.s. 246). So by an old custom at Rheims, recorded as still existing about 965, the subdeacon daily recited at mass in the ear of the celebrant the names of all bishops of the diocese (Fulcuinus de Abbat. Lobiens. vii.; S. Achegium Dacher. vi. 551).

In the Greek Liturgy the deacon still reads the diptychs, and "makes memorials of whom he will of the dead and of the living" (Euchol. Goar, 78, 170). Compare the Armenian (Neale, Introd. Hist. East. Ch. 594–610). The deacon is ordered to say them in the margin of the Sicilian use of St. James, from which liturgy the foregoing are derived (Assem. v. 85, 86); in St. Mark (Renaud. i. 150), and the Egyptian liturgies, Coptic (Bas. 19), and Greek (Bas. 72, Greg. 112); the Syrian (Ibid. ii. 34–36, 137, 279–282); and the Nestorian (Badger, ii. 222). Only the Ethiopic, which is in other respects in confusion, assigns this duty to the priest.

VI. Notices of the Names in the Collectio post Nomina.—These are often of interest, e.g. "Nomina quorum sunt recitatione complexa, scribi jubeas in aeternitate" (Miss. Goth. in Liturg. Gall. 191); "Offerentium nomina recitata coelesti chirographo in libro vitae jubeas adscribi" (232, comp. 233, 273, 276, 286); "Quorum texuit recitatio praemissa sortem, inter electos jubeas adgregari" (207, 209); "Offerentum ac pausantium quae recitata sunt nomina, apostoli sui intercessione sanctificet" (221); "Quorum nomina ante altare sanctum recitata, aeterna quies suscipiat" (288, comp. Sacr. Vet. Gall. 334); "Nomina quae vocabulorum sunt pro aetatibus memorata, aeternitatis titulo jubeas praesignari" (234). The last appears to refer to the different ages in which the persons commemorated had lived. "Offerentium nuncupationem compertasque etiam dantium accipientiumque personas nota vocabulorum designatione monstravit [sc. diaconus]. Ad dilecta precum revertamur officia" (Miss. Richenov. Neale and Forbes, 16). This seems to imply a custom of mentioning also the name of the deacon to whose hands an oblation was committed. Many similar references to the nomina occur in the corresponding prayer of the Mozarabic missal (Leslie, 15, 27, 57, &c.).

The Roman, Greek, and Eastern methods of introducing a reference to the offerers in the prayers have been sufficiently illustrated in § III.

NANTES, COUNCIL OF (Nannetense Concilium). Because Flodoard, who was canon of Rheims in the tenth century, speaks of one of the bishops of Rheims, in the seventh, having repaired a church in that diocese, "by common consent of the whole council of the bishops of France, set forth at Nantes," it has been inferred that a council was held there A.D. 658; and because twenty canons were quoted in the ninth and following centuries, as though they had been passed at Nantes, it has been further inferred that these canons may have been the work of this council in the seventh. Whatever may be thought of the first supposition, internal evidence forbids this last (Mansi, xi. 59, and xviii. 165–74; comp. Delaland, Suppl. 69; also RHEIMS, COUNCILS OF.)

[E. S. F.]

NARBONNE, COUNCILS OF (Narbonensia Concilia). (1.) A.D. 589, at which Nigetius, bishop of Narbonne, and six others, all subjects of king Reccared, were present, and fifteen canons passed, agreeably with what had been decreed at the third council of Toledo the same year. By the first the clergy may not wear purple. The second orders the doxology to be repeated at the end of every psalm; or, when a psalm is divided, at the end of every such division. By the third the clergy may not stand gossiping in the streets. The fifth refers to the eighteenth canon of Chalcedon, as though it had been passed at Nicaea. By the eleventh, bishops may not ordain illiterate men. By the last, a superstitious way of keeping Thursday as a holiday is censured (Mansi, ix. 1013 sq.).

(2) Said to have been held A.D. 788, by order of the Emperor Charles, for determining the bounds of that diocese, which alone shews that the account given of it is in part spurious. But further, it purports to have been occasioned by the errors of Felix, bishop of Urgel, and yet he is set down among the subscribers to it. If it ever met, therefore, its records are deserving of no credit as they stand now (Mansi, xiii. 821 sq.).

NARTHEX (νάρθηξ, προνάος, αὐλὼν, (qy. αὐλή) by Paul the Silentiary; στοὰ by Hesychius; Paradisus.) (1) The word first of all means the plant called giant-fennel, which was used as a cane; then it means a cane or staff, and even a surgeon's splint. In Christian ecclesiology it was used to designate the vestibule of a church. The reason of this application is given in a passage of Procopius of Caesarea (circa 527) in describing the church which the emperor Justinian built at Jerusalem in honour of the Blessed Virgin. "A great quantity of columns, immense in size and in colour resembling a flame of fire, support the church (τὸν νεὼ) on every side, some below and some above, and some about the cloisters (στοὰς) which surround the whole precinct (ἱερὸν), except on the side which is turned towards the east. Of which two stand before the door of the church (τοῦ νεὼ), very fine, and probably second to no columns in the world. Next there follows a kind of cloister (στοά τις) named after the narthex, I suppose, from its not being made wide." (Procopius, de Aedificiis, lib. v. cap. 6, ed. Dindorf in Corpus Scriptorum Historiae Byzantinae, vol. iii. p. 323, Bonn, 1838.) It is laid down by Hofmann (Lex. Univ. s. v.) that the length of the narthex was the whole width of the church.

Another etymology, unnoticed by Bingham and others, but exclusively relied on by the Etymologium Magnum, and the Lexicon of Zonaras, connects the word narthex with νέρθεν (παρὰ τὸ νέρθεν εἶναι τοῦ ναοῦ [al. lect. ἄμβωνος, ed. Gaisford]), because it was on a lower level than the body of the church (see a long note upon the subject by the commentator on the Concordia Regularum of St. Benedict of Anianum, temp. Charlemagne, ed. Migne, Patrol. Cursus, tom. 103, p. 1010). This however does not appear to be in accordance with the fact. For it will be seen lower down, that in some cases the narthex was the receptacle of the female part of the congregation, and that that receptacle was upon a higher, not a lower, level than the body of the church. [Nave.]

The word is used sometimes of a part within the church, and sometimes of one without; but it always means a part of the church further from the altar than the part where the faithful were assembled. Hence it was a place for the catechumens. Near them the possessed (χειμαζόμενοι, Syn. Ancyr. Can. 17) seem anciently to have had their place, also in the narthex. The entrance from the narthex to the nave was, according to Beveridge, by the "beautiful gates" [Doors, p. 573], near which, as the most honourable part of the narthex, the Audientes stood. The communication of the narthex with the outside was through the "great gates" (μεγάλαι πύλαι). The place of the Catechumeni in the narthex was near these last gates. The Energumens or possessed coming between the Catechumens and the Audientes.

A passage of St. Gregory Thaumaturgus shews distinctly that in his plan the narthex was within the gate of the church. He says that the Audientes were to do their part "within the gate (of the church) in the narthex," (ἔνδοθι τῆς πύλης ἐν τῷ νάρθηκι), Epist. Canonica, Can. xi. See a discussion of the several views in the commentary of Du Cange upon Paul the Silentiary, cap. 81.

Leo Allatius wrote a tract upon the narthex, in which he refutes the opinion that the narthex was in the porch, and shews that it was inside the church, near the door, and that it was the place where the Catechumens, the Energumens, and the Penitents were gathered.

Du Cange (Gloss. Graec. s. v. 986) points to a distinction (and possibly to some solution of the discrepancy amongst writers) between monastic and non-monastic churches; and he affirms that in the latter class, the narthex was outside, not inside, the church. In monastic churches, a distinction had to be made between the fraternity and the general public; and accordingly such churches were divided internally into three parts: (1) the Bema (Sacrarium) with the screen; (2) the ναὸς, for the monks, with rails separating it from (3) the narthex for the non-monastic public. Du Cange quotes a MS. Life of St. Paul Latrensis, which says that his body was buried "in the choir of the church (ναοῦ); we have been accustomed to call the place a narthex." As to the distinction between monastic and non-monastic churches in the East, Magri (Hierolexicon, s. v.) gives a different account, which he says depends upon his own observation. The narthex, he says, in monastic churches serves for lay monks, and in secular churches for women. In the latter case it is fenced off by grilles and rails.

A search has been made in vain for any transcription of the Greek word by any of the earlier Latin writers. It appears to be always translated by porticus, atrium, or some kindred word. Bingham, indeed (Antiq. viii. cap. 4, s. 2), while he claims great antiquity for the thing, admits that the name itself is "not very ancient." But the passage quoted above from Gregory Thaumaturgus may be thought to shew that even the name was more ancient than Bingham imagined.

It is affirmed, indeed, by Hofmann (Lexicon Univ. s.v.) that the narthex was by the Latins called Paradisus. This, however, seems to be strictly the name for the cloistered court, which in some of the older basilicas stood in front of the entrance to the church proper. In the view of some writers narthex was the name appropriated to that side of the quadrangular cloister which abutted on the church wall. It is not till the 6th century (Greg. Turon. lib. 2, c. 21) that we find any trace of the font being placed in this part of the structure.

NATALE, also Natalis, dies natalis, natalitia; γενέθλιον, ἡμέρα γενέθλιος. These words designate, in the language of the early church, the death-day of one of the faithful, regarded as a birth into eternal life. Even in the generation which immediately succeeded the apostles, we find the church saying of Polycarp, "we celebrate the birthday of his testimony or martyrdom (τὴν τοῦ μαρτυρίου αὐτοῦ ἡμέραν γενέθλιον)" (Mart. Polycarpi, c. 18); and at a somewhat later date, Tertullian tells us (de Corona, 3) "oblationes pro defunctis, pro natalitiis, annua die facimus," where the word natalitia seems to be used for the death-day, not of a martyr only, but of any of the faithful.

Pagi (on Baronius, ann. 67, n. 23) contends that the natalis of a martyr in the calendar is rarely his actual death-day, but commonly that of the translation of his relics, as in time of persecution the actual death-day could not generally be discovered. Muratori, on the contrary (De SS. Martt. Natalitiis) believes that the church took all possible pains to determine this very point. The writer of the Acta S. Ignatii, for instance, communicates to the faithful the very day of the saint's martyrdom, that they might hold an assembly on that day (Acta Ign. c. 6). Cyprian, too, (Epist. 37) required that the death-days of such of the faithful as died in prison should be communicated to him, in order that they might be commemorated by an oblation on that day. In this way were formed CALENDARS and MARTYROLOGIES. Calendars of this kind were also common among pagans. In the records, for instance, of the collegium of Lanuvium, published by Mommsen (de Collegiis, p. 112), we find the death-days which were to be celebrated by members of the collegium set down thus: "xiii. Kal. Sept. natali Caesenni Silvari patris," etc. Here we have the form adopted in the oldest Christian calendars (De Rossi, Roma Sott. i. 210). We have but to substitute some such name as "Callisti" for "Caesenni" and we have at once a Christian entry. [Compare MARTYR, pp. 1123, 1127.]

In inscriptions, Natale or natalis is very common.

To take two examples out of a multitude; the inscription SANCTIS MARTYRIBVS TIBVRTIO ‖ BALERIANO ET MAXIMO QVORVM ‖ NATALES [natalis] EST XVIII. KALENDAS MAIAS tells us that the death-day of the martyrs Tiburtius, Valerianus and Maximus was on the eighteenth day before the calends of May; and the inscription PARENTES FILIO MERCVRIO FECE‖RVNT QVI VIXIT ANN. V. ET MESES VIII. ‖ NATVS IN PACE IDVS FEBRV, that the child Mercurius was "born in peace"—i.e. died—on the ides of February (Mamachi, Origines, ii. 230; Marangoni, Acta S. Vict. p. 88). It was in accordance with this feeling that the anniversary of a Christian's death-day was celebrated with the rejoicing which generally accompanies a birthday [CELLA MEMORIAE]. It will be observed in the two inscriptions given above—and the same is the case with all inscriptions of that antiquity—that no year-date is given; it was sufficient to mark the day on which the annual commemoration was to be held.

The natalia of distinguished persons naturally soon came to be used themselves as dates. Thus in an inscription given by De Rossi, Studentia is said to have died on the natale of pope Marcellus (Jan. 16).

In process of time, the word natalis came to mean little more than an annual festival, and was applied to commemorations to which in the strict sense it was inapplicable; thus the Kalendarium Bucherianum (Ruinart, p. 617) has "VIII. Kal. Mart. Natale Petri de Cathedra," for the festival of the Chair of St. Peter. And the word was also not unfrequently used for the anniversary of the ordination of a bishop. It designated also, with a certain appropriateness, the anniversary festival of the foundation of a city.

The day of the Institution of the Lord's Supper is called Natalis Calicis, or Dies Natalis Eucharistiae. [MAUNDY THURSDAY, p. 1160.]

The Natalis Domini is the birthday of the Lord in the flesh [CHRISTMAS DAY, p. 356]; the entrance into the life of this world of ST. JOHN BAPTIST [p. 881] is also a festival.

NATATORIA or NATATORIUM, a word sometimes used to designate a baptismal font, κολυμβήθρα "in natatorio Sancti Martyris Barlaae" (Hist. Miscell. in Zenone, apud Ducange, Gloss.). In Sidonius Apollinaris it is found in its ordinary sense for a swimming bath. (Epist. lib. ii. Ep. 2). "Natatoria" is the translation of κολυμβήθρα Joh. ix. 7. Vulg. and Joh. v. 2. Vet. Lat. (Vulg. "piscina probatica"), and is so used by St. Ambrose (de Myst. c. iv. § 22). [E. V.]

NATIVITY, THE (IN ART). It has been remarked in a previous article (MARY, THE VIRGIN, IN ART) that while the Adoration of the Magi is one of the commonest subjects in early Christian art, the Nativity, with the contemporaneous gospel fact, the Adoration of the Shepherds, is one of the very rarest. Indeed it cannot be said to belong to pictorial art at all. It does not once appear in the innumerable catacomb frescoes. It is equally absent from the mosaics of the basilicas and churches. The only examples of the subject are sculptural, and must be looked for on minor works, such as sarcophagi, ivories, and gems, and even here it is by no means frequent.

The representations of this scene generally follow one type. We usually see the Divine Child wrapped in its swaddling bands as the central object, lying either in a basket-work manger, or on a tall stool, vested with hangings. The Babe is sometimes recumbent; but more usually the head and shoulders are raised without any support, in supposed allusion to Matt. viii. 20, Luke ix. 58. The star appears above. The virgin mother sometimes lies on a rude couch as a newly delivered woman, either above or below the Infant, on which she lays her right hand, sometimes sits by the manger. Joseph, when present, is seated at its foot, rapt in thought, his head resting on his hand. The ox and the ass, the traditional accompaniments of the nativity, in allusion to Isai. i. 3, Habak. iii. (cf. Baron. Annot. i. § 3; Tillemont, i. 423) appear either behind, or at the head and foot of the manger. The shepherds, with curved staves in their hands, stand by adoring.

The representations of the nativity on sarcophagi are rare. The pediment of that which forms the substructure of the pulpit of the basilica of St. Ambrose at Milan, offers an example. The divine Babe lies on a bed, unattended, the star resting on its head, while at its feet couch the ox and the ass (Allegranza, Monum. di Milan, p. 63, tav. v.; Martigny, Dictionn.

No. 1. Nativity. Sarcophagus under Pulpit, St. Ambrogio, Milan.

p. 89; woodcut No. 1). We find the same subject very rudely portrayed on a sarcophagus at Arles, figured by Millin (Midi de la France, pl. lxvi. No. 4). Christ here lies on a wicker-work cradle, to the left of which His mother is seated, and on the right stands one of the shepherds with his right arm extended, holding his pastoral staff in his left hand. The ox and ass are seen in the background. Joseph is absent. In a compartment below we find the three Magi, with Phrygian bonnets. The ox and ass are also represented in adoration on a sepulchral fragment assigned to A.D. 343, given by De Rossi (Inscr. Christ. Rom. i. p. 51, No. 73). Here the Infant lies on the ground, and we have two shepherds standing with hands outstretched in adoration. The scene is similarly represented on two Roman sarcophagi (Aringhi, i. p. 615, ii. 355; Bottari, tav. lxxxv. and cxciii.; Bosio, pp. 327, 589). The former, of which we give a woodcut (No. 2), is a double subject; the left-hand half representing the Adoration of the Magi. It will be noticed that one of the shepherds kisses his hand in token of worship. On the sarcophagi it is not at all unusual to find, by a continuation of the two subjects, the accessories of the nativity, the ox and the ass, together with the swaddled babe and the manger, forming part of the Adoration of the Magi. (Bottari, tav. xxii., lxxxv., lxxxvi.; Aringhi, i. pp. 295, 617; Bosio, 63.)

The nativity is a somewhat frequent subject on ivories. The great collection of Gori (Thesaur. vet. diptych. vol. iii.) presents several examples. He gives the ivory sheath of a knife (tab. x.), on one side of which are carved scenes from the opening of the Gospel history—the Annunciation, Nativity, Adoration of the Magi, Presentation in the Temple, and on the other side scenes from the Passion. The nativity follows the type given below (woodcut No. 3), only that the Virgin lies on a higher couch than the child. In the background are two pensile lamps, and the star. An ivory tablet in the treasury of the cathedral of Milan (tab. xxxii) represents the same scene, the Virgin lying below; un-nimbed angels stand at the head and foot of the manger. Joseph sits in deep thought. In the foreground are placed a basin and flagon for water. It is inscribed H. FENHCIC. Another ivory from the Cospian Museum at Bologna (tab. xxxv.) corresponds with this in almost all its details, but the workmanship is very coarse (cf. tab. xxxix.). The treatment in the ivory given (tab. xi.) is somewhat different. The Virgin, half standing, half kneeling, supports her Child on the manger. Joseph sits meditating. Angels, unnimbed, stand by the manger, above which the star casts a trail of light, on which one of two shepherds below is gazing with elevated eyes, while his companion kneels, with his offering of a lamb standing by.

A gem engraved by Vettori (Numm. Aen. Explic. p. 37; Perret, Catacombes, tom. iv. pl. xvi. No. 84) furnishes a good example of the type described above (woodcut No. 3). Both angels and shepherds are absent. The moon appears as well as the star. The whole scene breathes a holy calm. Cut No. 4 gives one half of a much mutilated green cameo of the 6th century, representing the same type. It is engraved and described by Venuti (Accadem. di Cortona, tom. vii. p. 45, tav. ii. 14). The mutilated inscription below the subject refers to the lost half of the cameo, on which was cut the visitation, Η υπαπαντη τυμε μητρος χριστου. NATIVITY. [CHRISTMAS.]

NAULIS. [NAVALIS.]

NAVALIS, martyr with Valentinus and Agricola; commemorated at Ravenna Dec. 17 (Hieron. Mart.); Naulis (Usuard. Mart.).

[C. H.]

NAVE. (Gr. ναος: εὐκτήριον τοῦ λαοῦ; Lat. Navis, Capsum; Fr. Nef; Ital. Nave, Germ. Schiff, Langhaus.) Authorities are not agreed upon the etymology of the word, some deriving it from (1) ναος, temple, which is the ordinary Greek term for what we should call "the body of the church;" and others from (2) navis, a ship. The fact that in several European languages (e. g. French and Italian), the corresponding word is used to designate both "ship," and "part of a church," may be thought to favour the latter hypothesis. As being distinct from the Sanctuary upon the one hand (the place for clergy), and from the Porch (the place for certain exceptional classes of people) upon the other, it was spoken of as the "quadrangular oratory of the people" (εὐκτήριον τοῦ λαοῦ τετράγωνον). As being the receptacle of the people, for whose salvation the church existed, it was no great stretch of fancy to speak of it under the figure of a ship. The Ark was at all times the Old Testament figure of the Church. The idea of the comparison between the church and a ship was elaborated very early. There is a long parallel in the so-called letter of Clement I. to James, the Lord's brother (Labbe, i. 86, 87), in which the laity are represented as the passengers occupying the body of the ship. The same idea is worked at length in the directions to bishops, given in the Apostolic Constitutions, lib. ii. cap. 57 (Labbe, i.), "And first let the house be oblong, turned towards the east, the Pastophoria on either side towards the east, seeing it resembles a ship" (ὅστις ἔοικε νηΐ). In the sixth century St. Gregory the Great casually (Expos. Moralis in Job, lib. xvii. cap. 14) connects the same imagery with the church as containing an audience whose safety had to be secured. The resemblance of nave to its Greek equivalent (ναος) may be nothing more than accidental. The earliest description of the architecture of a church which Christian literature presents is, according to Fleury (Hist. Eccl. vol. iii.), the account of the church at Tyre restored by its bishop, Paulinus (Euseb. Hist. Eccl. lib. x. cap. 4). In this church, the nave was entered from the cloistered area outside by three doors, of which (as in many modern churches) the centre one far exceeded the other two both in size and in magnificence, for it was overlaid with brazen plates and divers carvings.

In the nave the place of the women was distinct from that of the men—it was on a different story (ὑπερῷον) of the structure, so that the women were not visible to the men. This design of making the women invisible gives colour to the opinion of some writers that the position of the women was at the lower end of the nave farthest from the sanctuary towards which the faces of the men would naturally be turned. (See a note of Billius upon the 19th oration of St. Gregory of Nazianzum. Works, vol. ii. p. 728, ed. Colon.) [GALLERY.]

In early days the right of asylum for criminals extended to the nave as well as to the altar of the church. See SANCTUARY.

In later days the nave has often been put to base purposes (e. g. buying and selling).

search has been made in vain for any trace of similar desecration within the period embraced in this Dictionary; unless indeed such a prohibition as that in the 42nd of the African canons be taken as a proof that a habit was growing in Africa of converting the body of the church into a banqueting hall. (Labbe, vol. ii. p. 1070, ed. Paris.)

The plans of an early church that have been worked out from ancient writers by Goar and our own learned Bishop Beveridge differ from each other in several respects; but they both agree in assigning the nave as the place of the Ambo or Pulpit. Not only were the Scripture Lessons read from this pulpit, but it was sometimes (not always) used for preaching, so that some of St. Chrysostom's famous harangues were delivered from it. A phrase of Socrates the historian shews why the nave was chosen as the locality for it. He says (Hist. lib. vi. cap. 5, circa med.), that St. Chrysostom had been in the habit of preaching from this position, "for the sake of being completely heard."

Some idea of the size which a nave sometimes assumed in early days may be gathered from the description given by Evagrius Scholasticus of the church of St. Sophia at Constantinople, which was built by Justinian in the fifth century. "The length from the door opposite the sacred apse, wherein the function of the bloodless sacrifice is celebrated, up to the apse itself, is a hundred and ninety feet (this probably included a Narthex as well as a Nave); and the breadth from north to south is a hundred and fifteen feet." (Evagr. Hist. lib. iv. cap. 31.)

An early church, which is described to us is that built in the time of king Childeric over the sepulchre of St. Martin, at Tours, by Perpetuus, the fifth bishop of the see from St. Martin himself. Its total length was a hundred and sixty feet, its breadth sixty feet, and its height forty-five feet. Its nave had twenty windows and five doors. (Greg. Turon. Hist. Franc. lib. ii. cap. 14.) Another church of the same period was that of Arverne. It was a hundred and fifty feet long, sixty feet wide, and fifty feet high. This church likewise had eight doors of which Mabillon (De Liturgiâ Gallicanâ, lib. i. cap. 8) concludes that five were in the nave, that is to say, three in the western façade, and one upon each side.

It is stated by Henke that the word Navis was first used to designate a part of a church by the Latin writers of the ninth and tenth centuries. He does not give the passages upon which he relies; but unless he refers to other passages than those which are given by Du Fresne, s. v. 'Navis,' or by Magri (Hierolexicon), it is perhaps open to question whether the date should not be placed still a little later. See his view in Herzog's Real-Encyklopädie, art. 'Baukunst,' p. 731, near the end. [H. T. A.]

NECROLOGIUM. The book in which were entered the names of the dead for whom prayer was made in religious houses. It was a survival of the primitive DIPTYCHS, but admitted generally only the names of members of the house, of its benefactors, and those with whom the community had entered into a compact for mutual intercession.

This book had no settled name within our period, and afterwards it was variously called necrologium, obitarium, obituarium, liber obitarius (all late mediaeval), Kalendarium (as, e.g., in a letter of communion between the monks of St. Remigius and those of St. Benignus, "We do for their dead as for our own; except that briefs are not sent, nor are they put in the kalendar among our own people," Literae ad ineundam Suffragiorum Societatem, v., in Mabill. Anal. Vet. 160, ed. 2; Anselm: "Tell us his name and the day of his death, that it may be written in our Kalendar," Epist. i. 21),—Liber Vitae (e.g., Bertram, bishop of Mans, A.D. 616, made bequests to several churches, on condition that his name and the names of certain others should be "recited in the book of life in the said church," Act. Pontif. Cenom. c. 11, in Mabill. Anal. Vet. 257, 261, 263),—Martyrologium ("anniversario quod in nostro martyrologio scribitur," Litterae, iv. u.s.), which was common,—and Memoriale ("Postquam defuncti fuerint, post patres nostros defunctos in memoriali defunctorum scribantur," Litterae, iii. u.s.; "Fratrum Memoriale," Bernardi Ordo Clun. i. 27 in Vet. Discipl. Mon. Hergott, 208), or Liber Memorialis (in libro memoriali quemcumque vult (prior), facit notari," S. Wilhelmi Constit. Hirsaug. ii. 17, Hergott, u.s. 494).

In the Disciplina Farfarensis of Guido (ad calc.) may be seen formulae, under which names of different classes were entered. One direction runs thus: "In martyrologio taliter scribendi sunt monachi, vel amici. Obierunt Adalgarius, Gerbertus nostrae congregationis monachus, et de- positio Domni Conradi Regis, et Henrici Ducis, amicorum nostrorum. Ihdimus nostrae congr. monachus, et sic de aliis." (Hergott, 132.)

Proofs are numerous of the use of necrologia, though not under a fixed name, within our period. Thus, according to Bede, a boy living in a monastery was told in a vision (about A.D. 686) to direct the monks, "quaerere in suis codicibus in quibus defunctorum annotata est depositio," for the day of St. Oswald's death, 642. The priest to whom he told this accordingly "searched for it in his year-book" (annali; Hist. Eccl. iv. 14.) Bede, who died in 735, to Eadfred, the bishop, and the monks of Lindisfarne: "When I am dead deign to pray and celebrate masses for the redemption of my soul, as for one of your own family and house, and to write my name among your own" (Vita Cuthberti, praef. 2). Boniface, in 752, writing to an abbat: "We pray that you will cause to be celebrated helpful prayers and masses for the souls of our brethren, fellow-labourers in the Lord, who have fallen asleep, whose names the bearer of this letter has made known to you" (Epist. 100, ed. Würdtwein). In 755, king Alhred promises Lullus of Mentz that he will, in return for prayers to be offered in his diocese for the king, his queen, and several of his friends and kin, undertake that prayers shall daily be offered in all the monasteries in his dominions for Lullus, and others whose names he had sent to the king. These names, he says, in general terms, would be committed "perpetuis literarum monumentis," from which we infer that no specific name for the monastic obituary was known to him (Epist. 108 inter Epp. Bonif., see also 115, 121, 127, 160, &c.)

From the expression "year-book," used by Bede, we might infer that generally the name of a deceased person was read out of the necrology once a year, viz., on the anniversary of their death. This is confirmed by documentary evidence; as e.g., by the "Litterae Societatis" between two monasteries in France (Acta O.S.B. saec. II. 1093): "Nomina vero defunctorum fratrum Stabulensis coenobii Martyrologio Solemniacensi per singulos dies cum suorum fratrum anniversariis recitabuntur" (cited by Martene, de Antiq. Monach. Rit. i. v. 27). But other days might be fixed by special covenant or injunction. Thus Bertram of Mans (u. s. 263): "Nomen meum ac sacerdotes illorum (supra-scriptorum locorum) in libro vitae jubeant ascribere, et per singulas festivitates recitari."

The names for the day were read from the necrology in the chapter of the monks after prime. They came after a lesson from the martyrology (properly so-called), and were followed by the psalm De Profundis, with a suitable prayer (Bona, Rer. Liturg. II. xiv. 2). De Moleon (Le Brun Desmarets) found this custom surviving among the canons of Notre Dame at Rouen, in the middle of the last century (Voyages Liturgiques, 282).

When the notice of a death was sent for entry in a necrologium, the document was called Breve or Brevis (Litterae Societatis, i. v. u.s.) or Liber Rotularis (Hariulfus, Chronic. Centulense, iii. 9, in Spicil. Ducher. ii. 316, ed. 2).

A special messenger was sent with the brief. When Rolfe (their abbat) died the monks of Centule are said to have sent a book roll to announce his departure "through the churches and places of the saints with whom he had entered into a fellowship of mutual prayers" (Hariulf, u.s.). The messenger who carried it was called breviger, brevigerulus, rotularius, rotuliger, rotliger, rotlifer, rolliger, rollifer (Ducange in vv.). At each monastery he received a written promise of prayers, which document was called titulus. This was sometimes in verse, an example of which may be seen in Ducange, under Tollifer. At length it was brought back to the house that sent it forth, and there kept. Such a brief, issued by the nuns of Lillechirch at Higham in Kent, accompanied by the tituli of no less than 363 religious houses, is preserved in the Library of St. John's College, Cambridge. The following is one of the tituli:—"Titulus Ecclesiae Sancti Augustini Cant. Anima dominae Amphelisae priorissae de Lillechirch, et Animae omnium fidelium defunctorum per misericordiam Dei requiescant in pace. Amen. Concedimus ei commune beneficium ecclesiae nostrae. Oramus pro vestris: orate pro nostris." The last two clauses, "Oramus," &c., are common to all the tituli. "Haeftenus supplies examples of these briefs in Disquisitionum Monasticarum tom. ii. p. 793" (Mabillon, Observ. in Anal. Vet. 160).

Short notices of this subject may be seen in the Annal. Benedict. (ad ann. 859), iii. 76; Bona, Rer. Liturg. ii. 14, § 2; Martene, de Ant. Monach. Rit. I. v. 22–33; Merati, Novae Observat. ad Gavanti in Lubr. Breviar. V. xxi. 6. Mabillon, Observ. in Analect. Veter., 160; and Salig, de Diptychis, cap. xix., have treated it at somewhat greater length. [W. E. S.]

NECROMANTIA 'Barb. Nigromantia' (νεκρομαντεία, νεκυομαντεία, νεκυία). There are two methods of divination by means of the dead, of which we read within the Christian era. The first was by the inspection of the viscera. Thus, Juvenal (vi. 551):—

> "Pectora pullorum mirabitur, exta catelli > Interdum et pueri."

Dionysius, of Alexandria, affirms that Valerian, at the instance of an Egyptian archimage, "slew miserable boys, sacrificed the children of unhappy parents, and divided the newly born entrails" (Euseb. Hist. vii. 10). Eusebius relates that Maxentius "at one time opened the bodies of pregnant women, at another searched the viscera of newly born infants" (De Vita Const. i. 38; sim. Hist. viii. 14). Theodoret says that after the death of Julian, it was found that he had just before, in a heathen temple, drawn an omen for the battle from the liver of a woman, murdered for that purpose (Hist. Eccl. iii. 26). Socrates also tells us that during the reign of Julian, the heathen at Athens, Alexandria, and in other places "sacrificed children, both male and female, and inspected their entrails" (Hist. Eccl. iii. 13).

The second method was to raise the souls of the dead, and obtain direct answers from them. Of this we read much more frequently. Thus, Justin Martyr, A.D. 140, appeals to "necromancies and inspections of incorrupt boys and the calling of human souls," as a testimony to the consciousness of the soul after death (Apol. i. 18). In the Recognitions of Clement (perhaps about A.D. 180) the writer, who speaks in the first person, represents himself as considering whether, in the search of truth, he shall go to Egypt, the chief seat of such studies, and by gifts induce a priest there "to bring up a soul from the lower regions, by that which they call necromancy" (i. 5; sim. Hom. Clem. i. 4; De Gest. Petri, 5). These "animarum suscitiones" were alleged as a counterpoise to the appearance of angels, as believed by Christians (ibid. viii. 53). Tertullian, citing the Greek historians, says that "the Nasamones endeavoured to obtain oracles of their own, by staying at the sepulchres of their fathers;" and that, "the Celts spend the night with the same object among the tombs of men of valour" (De Anim. 57). Constantius, in a law of 357, denounces those "qui manibus accitis audent ventilare" (Codex Theod. ix. xvi. De Malef. 5), where the last word is understood of the motions and gesticulations (beating the air) with which the necromancer accompanied his incantation. Ammianus relates that Maximin, a high official afterwards put to death by Gratian, was reputed to have in his service (about 368) a Sardinian, who was "exceedingly skilful in bringing up harmful spirits, and obtaining the presages of ghosts" (Hist. xxviii. 1). Prudentius, A.D. 405 (c. Symm. i. p. 249; ed. 1596):

> Vitâ itidem spoliare alios, ars noxia novit."

This kind of Necromancy, which was often called ψυχαγωγία, was thought to be most successful when the answer came from the soul of a person murdered for the purpose. Thus in the Recognitions of Clement already quoted, Simon Magus is made to state that his power depended on the aid he received from the soul of "an uncorrupted boy slain by violence," which he "called up and made to assist him by adjurations unutterable" (ii. 13; sim. iii. 44; Hom. Clem. ii. 26; Gest. Petr. 27). The soul immediately on death was supposed to have many new powers, and among them "prescience, on which account it was called up for the purposes of Necromancy" (Recogn. ii. 13). Tertullian, who recognises the practice (Apol. 23), says that a peculiar malignity, and, therefore, readiness to assist in evil, was ascribed to souls early and violently parted from the body (De Animâ, 57). St. Chrysostom speaks of a popular belief that many of the γόητες took and slew children that they might have their souls to help them afterwards" (Hom. 28, § 2, in S. Matt. viii. 29); and says that "many of the weaker sort thought that the souls of those who had died a violent death became demons" (De Lazaro, Conc. ii. 1). Ammianus says, that one Pollentianus, in the time of Valens (A.D. 371), having cut the foetus from the womb of a pregnant woman yet alive, and "having called up the Manes below, presumed to inquire about a change of government" (Hist. xxix. ii. 2). Here it is probably meant that this dreadful rite gave him power over other departed spirits, or over the infernal gods themselves. See St. Augustine, de Civ. Dei, xviii. 53.

When apparitions and responses were said to be granted to the necromancer, Christian writers were unanimous in replying that, supposing it to be true an evil spirit personated the soul invoked and deceived the magician. So the author of the Recognitions (iii. 49), Tertullian (daemones operantur sub obtentu earum, De An. 57), St. Chrysostom (Hom. 28, in S. Matt. § 2), and others.

From the 6th century downwards, the word necromancy appears to have been used vaguely to denote any pretended exercise of supernatural power. Thus Gregory of Tours, A.D. 575, speaking of one who affected to cure disease, says that he "sought to mock men by the delusion of necromantic device" (Hist. Franc. ix. 6). Adhelm, 709, says that St. Peter went through the provinces extirpating from the root the deadly wild vines of the Simonian Necromancy" (De Laud. Virg. 25). The same writer (ibid. 24) calls the "spirit of divination," of Acts xvi. 16, a "spirit of necromancy," and again (50) applies the term to arts by which the reason of a person was supposed to be affected. NECTARIUS (1) Martyr, commemorated with Nicetus at Alexandria May 5 (Hieron. Mart.), both bishops of Vienne in the fourth century (Boll. Acta SS. Mar. ii. 9). The Bollandists also give Nectarius bishop of Vienne in the fourth century, commemorated Aug. 1 (Aug. i. 51).

(2) Bishop of Autun, confessor, in the third, fourth, or sixth century; commemorated Sept. 13 (Hieron. Mart.; Boll. Acta SS. Sept. iv. 59).

(3) Patriarch of Constantinople, A.D. 397; commemorated Oct. 11 (Boll. Acta SS. Oct. v. 608).

(4) [NECTAVUS.] [C. H.]

NECTAVUS, martyr, commemorated in Pontus Aug. 22 (Hieron. Mart.); Nectavus or Nectarius (Boll. Acta SS. Aug. iv. 536). [C. H.]

NEEDFIRE. [ST. JOHN BAPTIST, FIRE OF, p. 885.]

NEMAUSIACUM CONCILIUM. [NIMES.]

NEMESIANUS, martyr under Valerian, commemorated in Africa Sept. 10 (Usuard. Mart.; Vet. Rom. Mart.; Boll. Acta SS. Sept. iii. 483). [C. H.]

NEMESIUS (1) Martyr, with Potamius in Cyprus; commemorated Feb. 20 (Usuard. Mart.)

(2) One of the seven sons of Symphorosa, martyrs at Tibur; commemorated June 27 (Usuard. Mart.); July 21 (Bed. Mart.).

(3) Confessor, commemorated in Lieuvin, Aug. 1 (Usuard. Mart.; Boll. Acta SS. Aug. i. 46).

(4) Deacon, martyr at Rome, with his daughter Lucilla; commemorated Oct. 31 (Usuard. Mart.; Vet. Rom. Mart.).

(5) Martyr, commemorated at Nicomedia Nov. 9 (Hieron. Mart.).

(6) Martyr, in Egypt, commemorated Dec. 19 (Usuard. Mart.; Vet. Rom. Mart.). [C. H.]

NEO (1) Martyr, with Leonilla and Jonilla at Lingon, commemorated Jan. 17 (Usuard. Mart.).

(2) Martyr, with Zeno, Eusebius, Vitalius; commemorated April 28 (Basil. Menol.).

(3) Martyr with Agia, Claudius, Asterius; commemorated in Cilicia, Aug. 23 (Hieron. Mart.); in the city of Egea in Lycia (Usuard. Mart.); under Lysias praefect of Cilicia in the reign of Diocletian, Oct. 29 (Basil. Menol.).

(4) Martyr, with Nico and Heliodorus; commemorated Sept. 28 (Basil. Menol.). [C. H.]

NEO-CAESAREA, COUNCILS OF (NEO-CAESARIENSIA CONCILIA). Two are recorded. (1) A.D. 315, or some years later, as Hefele thinks (Councils, Eng. Tr. 223) from its fourteen canons, and there is no reason to think it passed more, containing nothing about the lapsed. Yet their case may have been passed over designedly, from having had so much space given to it at Ancyra. This, however, would bring it about midway between the councils of Ancyra and Nicaea, where it has always been placed. If the signatures appended to it in the Latin version of Isidore Mercator may be relied on, the Neo-Caesarea where it was held was in Pontus, and it was attended by several of the bishops who had previously met at Ancyra. By the first of its canons any priest marrying is to forfeit his order. The third is directed against all persons who have been several times married, yet couched in the spirit of the first of Laodicea. The seventh forbids priests attending second marriages. By the eleventh nobody may be ordained priest who is not thirty years old. By the thirteenth country presbyters are restricted in their ministrations, much as country bishops had been by the thirteenth Ancyran. (Mansi, ii. 539–52.)

(2) A.D. 358, or thereabouts, at which Eustathius, bishop of Sebaste, was condemned. Other synods held in his case were Gangra and Melitene (Mansi, iii. 291). [E. S. Ff.]

NEONILLA (1) (NEONILA), grandmother of the martyrs Peusippus, Elasippus, Mesippus, martyr, commemorated Jan. 16 (Cal. Byzant.); Jan. 17 (Basil. Menol.).

(2) Martyr, with Terentius; commemorated Oct. 28 (Cal. Byzant.; Daniel, Cod. Liturg. iv. 272). [C. H.]

NEOPHYTE (νεόφυτος). I. A newly baptized person was so called, as being newly engrafted on Christ (Zonar. Comm. in Can. 10, Conc. Sard.). The usage was suggested by the employment of the word in 1 Tim. iii. 6. St. Augustine, in the same context, says that the gifts and privileges mentioned in Heb. vi. 1, 2 are "eorum qui baptizantur initia" and "initia neophytorum" (De Fide et Oper. xi. § 17). Elsewhere he says that it is sanctioned by the custom of the church that "the eight days of the neophytes be distinguished from the rest; i.e., that the eighth agree with the first" (Epist. 55, ad Januar. xvii. § 32). The eight days were those during which the newly baptized wore their white dress. [BAPTISM, §§ 60–63, vol. i. 163.] St. Augustine's words above cited are thus explained by Amalarius: "The eight offices, which are celebrated on account of the neophytes, are distinguished from the rest that follow down to Pentecost. The first has two lauds, i.e., Alleluia, Confitemini Domino, and the tract, Laudate Dominum, omnes gentes. The eighth has two, Alleluia, Haec dies and Laudate pueri Dominum, which is not the case on any other sabbath from that day to Pentecost" (De Eccl. Off. I. 32; copied by Pseudo-Alcuin, de Div. Off. 21). Pellicia (de Eccles. Politia, I. i. 1, § 6, "Baptizatis τῶν Νεοφύτων nomen per integram Paschatis hebdomadem erat") and others appear to think that the baptized were not called neophytes (except with reference to an early ordination) beyond the first week. This is improbable in itself, and had it been so, it would not have been necessary to distinguish them during that period by the title of albati (Greg. Tur. Hist. Franc. v. 11; Amalar. u.s. 29; Ps.-Alc. u.s.), or as positi in albis (Greg. Tur. de Glor. Mart. 67), or the like. The contrary is also implied in the following canon: "Neophyti aliquamdiu a lautioribus epulis et spectaculis et conjugibus abstineant" (Conc. Carth. iv. A.D. 398, can. 86; Gratian, de Consecr. v. 12).

Neophytes were often called νεοφώτιστοι (recently illuminated). Balsamon explains the former word by the latter (Comm. in Can. 10 Conc. Sard.). The Catecheses Mystagogicae of Cyril of Jerusalem are addressed, πρὸς τοὺς νεοφωτίστους (p. 277, ed. Milles). They were called infantes for an obvious reason, "Infantes appellamini, quoniam regenerati estis, et novam vitam ingressi estis, et ad vitam aeternam renati estis" (August. Serm. 260). "Hodie Octavae dicuntur infantium. . . . Isti senes, juvones, adolescentuli, omnes infantes" (Serm. 376, § 2, Domin. in Oct. Pasch.). In the Mozarabic rite, after the consecration of the water, the priest prays that those washed therewith "may be restored by a new infancy" (Leslie, 189). In the Roman prayer of consecration he says, "Omnes in unam pariat gratia mater infantiam;" after it "In verâ innocentiâ nova infantia renascatur" (Sacram. Gelas. Murat.; Liturg. Rom. Vet. i. 569, 570; Greg. ii. 63–5).

After their baptism the neophytes were conducted in their white dresses to the altar, about which they were stationed during the services o the following week, and where they received daily. Thus in a sermon preached at Easter, 355, (perhaps by St. Hilary), "Novi homines effecti, sanctum altare circumdant" (Vet. Script. Coll. Ampliss. Mart. et Dur. ix. 78, cited by Leslie, Notae ad Miss. Mozar. 533). St. Ambrose reminds a nun who had made her profession on Easter day, that she had "offered herself to be veiled at the altar of God, . . . among the shining lights of the neophytes, among the candidates (an allusion to their dress) of the heavenly kingdom" (De Lapsu Virg. v. § 19). The author De Mysteriis (ascribed to Ambrose): "His abluta plebs dives insignibus ad Christi contendit altare" (viii. § 43). But more fully Paulinus (Epist. xxxii. ad Sever. § 5):

> "Inde parens sacro ducit de fonte sacerdos
> Infantes niveos corpore, corde, habitu;
> Circumstansque rudes festis altaribus agnos
> Cruda salutiferis imbuit ova cibis."

Many epitaphs of persons who died while neophytes are extant, in which the fact is recorded. E.g. "Junius Bassus V.C. qui vixit annis xlii. men. ii. in ipsâ praefectura urbi neofitus iit ad Deum" (A.D. 359; Bottari, Roma Sotterranea, tav. xv.). See other examples of males in Gruter's Corpus Inscript. p. 1051 n. 9 (aged 8 years), p. 1060 n. 3 (aged 11), in Bosio, Roma Sott. p. 433 (aged 6), &c. The following is the epitaph of a married woman, "Hoctavie conjuge neofite bisomus maritus fecit" (Grut. p. 1053 n. 7). Other instances of female neophytes occur in several collections, as, e.g., in Gruter, p. 1054 n. 1 (3 years), p. 1057 n. 6 (a wife). The last is called "legitima neophyta." Does this mean that she died after the eight days, and so had fulfilled all the special observances imposed on neophytes? Sometimes they were said to have died in albis. For example, "Hic jacet puer nomene Valentiano qui vixit anno iii. et me ses et dies xvi. et in albis cum pace recessit" (Le Blant, Inscript. Chrét. de la Gaule, i. 476, who also refers to Fabretti, Inscr. Antiq. Explic. pp. 577, 735). It is reasonably inferred that such persons had, as a rule, received clinic baptism. [SICK, VISITATION OF THE.]

II. It frequently happened in the early ages that the fittest person for the office of bishop or priest in a vacant church was one who had not passed through the lower orders, or at least not through all of them. At first it is probable that laymen and inferior clerks were ordained priests and bishops freely in such cases; but at length the liberty became an occasion of ambition, and was restrained by the canons, in accordance with the injunction of St. Paul (1 Tim. iii. 6), from whom also the name of neophyte (in this use of it a term of reproach) was borrowed to describe the premature ruler of the church. The earliest prohibition occurs in the 80th of the so-called apostolic canons. "It is not right that one who has come out of paganism and been baptized, or who has left a sinful course of life, should forthwith be ordained a bishop. For it is unfit that one who has not yet given proof of himself should be a teacher of others; unless, indeed, this take place through the grace of God." The council of Nicaea, 325, premising that this "rule of the church" had been often broken, "either from necessity or because men urged it, so that they led men but lately come over to the faith from paganism, and in the catechumenate for a short time, to the spiritual laver, and further promoted them as soon as baptized, to the episcopate or presbyterate," decreed that such practices should be tolerated no longer (can. 2). The Arabic canons of Nicaea depose both the ordainer and the ordained in such a case (can. 12, vers. Ecchell. Hard. Conc. i. 480). The council of Sardica, 347, forbade any one to be made a bishop who had not before "served as reader and deacon and presbyter; . . . . for so he would with reason be regarded as a neophyte" (can. 10). The council of Laodicea, of uncertain date, but probably about 365: "Persons lately illuminated (i.e. baptized [BAPTISM, § 5; vol. i. p. 156]) must not be promoted in the hieratic order" (can. 3); which is thus rendered by Dionysius Exiguus, A.D. 533; "Non oportet neophytum promoveri ad ordinem sacerdotalem" (Hard. i. 782).

Gaul seems to have been notorious for offences against this law of the church. Gregory I. in 598 says to queen Brunichilda, "their office has there, as we have understood, come to be such an object of ambition, that bishops (sacerdotes), which is too grievous, are at once ordained out of laymen" (Epist. vii. Ind. ii. 115). Instances of this are found in Gregory of Tours: "Nicetius tamen ex laico, qui prius ab Chilperico rege praeceptum elicuerat, in ipsa urbe (Matiscensi) episcopatum adeptus est" (Hist. Franc. viii. 20). Again: "Laban, bishop of Eause, died this year, whom Desiderius succeeded from a layman, though the king had promised with an oath that he would never ordain a bishop out of the laity. Sed quid pectora humana non cogat auri sacra fames" (ibid. 22)?

The Apostolic canon, it will be observed, makes an exception in favour of those who, like Timothy (1 Tim. i. 18; iv. 14), were supposed to receive some divine attestation to their fitness. Cyprian, Athanasius, Nectarius, and Ambrose are instances. The first named had indeed been baptized and made deacon and priest in succession, but all in so short a time, that his biographer says of him "Judicio Dei et plebis favore ad officium sacerdotii, et episcopatus gradum (A.D. 248), adhuc neophytus, et ut putabatur, novellus electus est" (Vita auct. Pontio, Opp. Cypr. praef. 3, ed. Fell.). The council of Neocaesarea had in 315 forbidden even a priest to be ordained under thirty years of age (can. 11); yet only eleven years after that, the great Athanasius, in obedience, it was believed, to a divine intimation conveyed through his dying predecessor, who called out his name repeatedly with his last breath, was ordained bishop of Alexandria at the age of twenty-eight (Sozom. Hist. Eccl. ii. 17). Nectarius was not baptized when, in 381, he was chosen to succeed Gregory Nazianzen at Constantinople; but was then "initiated by baptism), and while yet clothed in the typical dress (of the neophytes) was declared bishop of Constantinople by the common voice of the synod," then assembled in that city (Sozom. vii. 8). Nor was St. Ambrose more than a catechumen, when (A.D. 574) the people of Milan insisted on his becoming their bishop; but, "being baptized, he is said to have filled all the ecclesiastical offices, and on the eighth day he was ordained with the greatest favour and joy of all" (Vita a Paulino consc. § 9). Some twenty years later, referring to these circumstances and to his great unwillingness to accept the office, he says: "Nevertheless the bishops of the west approved my ordination by their judgment; those of the east by their example also. And yet a neophyte is forbidden to be ordained, lest he should be lifted up with pride;" but (he urges) if there be a suitable humility, the defect is healed, "ubi causa non haeret, vitium non imputatur" (Epist. 73 ad Eccl. Vercell. § 65). [W. E. S.]

NEUMA. [PNEUMA.]

NEW MOON. "Let not any one fear to take up any kind of work at the new moon; for God made the moon to regulate the times, and temper the darkness of the night" (Eligius, de Rect. Cathol. Convers. 5). The superstition to which St. Eloy here refers was extended by some who are condemned by St. Ambrose to the fifth day of the moon ("quintam esse fugiendam, nihilque in eâ inchoandum"; Ambr. Epist. 23, § 4; comp. Virg. Georg. i. 276), and for special purposes to the seventh and the ninth: "Septimâ lunâ instrumenta confici non debent, nonâ iterum lunâ servum emptum, ut puta, domum duci non oportet" (Hilar. Diacon. Comm. in Ep. ad Gal. iv. 10). Such superstitions were of purely pagan origin, Christians after the destruction of Jerusalem being under no temptation to observe the new moons of the Jews. "They are wont to blame us," says Hilary the deacon, A.D. 354, "because we despise their feast days, or because we do not observe the beginnings of the months, which they call neomeniae" (Comm. in Ep. ad Coloss. ii. 17). The observances peculiar to the Kalends of January throughout the Roman world must have been originally connected with the first day of the lunar month. [CIRCUMCISION; NEW YEAR'S DAY.] [W. E. S.]

NEW YEAR'S DAY. It was ruled by the Julian Reformation that the year should begin with the Calends of January, and such was thenceforth the popular usage. But this was not, for long time, accepted by the churches of East and West. The epoch of the ecclesiastical year, it was thought, was prescribed by the requirements of the Easter reckoning, in accordance with the law given by Moses that the Paschal month should be the first month of the year. Thus Anatolius, in the fragment of his Paschal Canon (A.D. 277) ap. Eus. H. E. vii. 32, gives as the epoch of his (Metonic) cycle, "New moon of first month in its first year, which falls on the 26 Phamenoth in the Egyptian reckoning, by Macedonian months is 22 Dystrus, i.e. Roman xi. kal. April" (= 22 March), and adds that "the first month is that of the Hebrews, in which the vernal equinox falls." Hence in Victorius, Dionysius Exiguus, Bede, mensis primus is often synonymous with mensis paschalis. In the East, as the Romanised Syrian Calendar made Xanthicus (= Nisan) identical with the Roman April, this month was taken as the first: and it is in terms of this reckoning that the Constitut. Apost. (v. 13), appoint that the Feast of the Nativity (i.e. 25th December) shall be kept in the ninth month; Epiphany (viz. 6th January) on the sixth of the tenth month; as again, ibid. 14, 17, Xanthicus and Dystrus are respectively first and twelfth month. Epiphanius also seems to follow this reckoning, when he says (Haer. lxx. c. 11) πρὸ ἰσημερίας οὐ πληρωθήσεται τὸ ἔτος. "the year must not end before the (vernal) equinox." But in the West, in accordance with the old Roman practice and the numerical names of the months (Quintilis—December—comp. Ovid, Fasti, ii. 4, 7). March was taken as the first or paschal month; thus St. Leo and Gelasius speak of the ember seasons as fasts of the first, fourth, seventh and tenth months. As late as A.D. 755, a canon of a council in France (Mansi, Coll. Conc.

xii. 550) has, "mense primo, quod est, Martiis kalendis." In Italy this practice seems to have been only ecclesiastical, in France it was also civil; thus Gregory of Tours makes July the fifth, and December the tenth month, and from a contemporary writer de Mirac. S. Marcellini, Mabillon (de Re diplomat. ii. 23) has the words, "Ad mensem Martium qui apud nos primus sine dubio vocitatur." The successive continuators of the history of Gregory of Tours, Fredegar and others, keep to the same reckoning from 1st March. Yet here and there Gregory falls into the popular way of making the year begin with the first of January (Ideler, Hdb. 2, 327).

The Roman New Year's Day, Calends of January, was the one great festival universally kept throughout the empire, as Libanius testifies (Opp. i. 256, iv. 1050, Reiske); μίαν δὲ οἶδα, κοινὴν ἁπάντων ὁπόσοι ζῶσιν ὑπὸ τὴν Ῥωμαίων ἀρχήν· γίγνεται δὲ ἐνιαυτοῦ τοῦ μὲν πεπαυμένου, τοῦ δὲ ἀρχομένου. He, as a moralist, reprobates the riotous excesses and superstitions against which the church long kept up its protest. So early as the end of the 2nd century, Tertullian (de Idololatr. c. 14) has to lament the countenance given by Christians to the old practices at this season (nobis Saturnalia et Januariae et Brumae et Matronales frequentantur, munera commeant, strenae consonant, lusus, convivia constrepunt), which they excused to themselves as merely civil and social observances, nowise pagan superstitions. Petrus Chrysologus (c. 433), Serm. 155, protests similarly: "Dicit aliquis, non sunt haec sacrilegorum studia, vota sunt haec jocorum; et hoc esse novitatis laetitiam non vetustatis errorem, esse hoc anni principium, non gentilitatis offensam. Erras homo! non sunt haec ludicra, sunt crimina." How long and earnestly the protest against this conformity of Christians to these old-established customs was kept up by the church may be seen in Homilies of St. Chrysostom (A.D. 387), in Kalendas, t. i. 697, and de Lazaro, i. ibid. 707, in the opening of which he calls the feast of the Calends ἑορτὴν σατανικήν; Asterius Amasenus (cir. 400) in Kalendas, p. 55; St. Augustin, Serm. 198, de Cal. Jan. (t. v. 907). Maximus of Turin (A.D. 422) Hom. xvi. de Circumcisione Domini, p. 46; Caesarius of Arles (A.D. 502), de Kal. Jan. Serm. 129, 130, ap. St. Augustini, Opp. Append. t. v. 233 sqq.; Eligius of Limoges (A.D. 640), Serm. de Rectitud. Cathol. Conversationes, c. 5, ap. St. Augustini Opp. Append. t. vi. 267, c. (mostly a cento of passages from the homilies of Caesarius). The protest is enforced by the Concilium Quinisextum (Trullanum), A.D. 692, canon 62, τὰς οὕτω λεγομένας Καλάνδας, καὶ τὰ λεγόμενα Βότα (vota), καὶ τὰ καλούμενα Βρουμάλια (Brumalia) . . . . καθάπαξ δὲ τῆς τῶν πιστῶν πολιτείας περιαιρεθῆναι βουλόμεθα, κ.τ.λ. And down to the end of our period, the church (even after that the 1st of January as the Octave of the Nativity was entitled to rank as a festival, viz. of the Circumcision) confronted the heathen festivities with a three days' fast. Thus the second Council of Tours (A.D. 567) can. 17, enacts "triduum illud quo ad calcandam gentilium consuetudinem patres nostri statuerunt privatas in kalendis Januariis fieri litanias, ut in ecclesiis psallatur, et hora viii. in ipsis kalendis circumcisionis missa Deo propitio celebretur"; and Isidore of Seville (A.D. 595) de div. Offic. Eccles. i. 40, says that "jejunium Januariarum kalendarum propter errorem gentilitatis statuit ecclesia . . . per quod agnoscerent homines in tantum se prave agere ut pro eorum peccatis necesse sit omnibus ecclesiis jejunare." (Large extracts from most of the authorities cited may be seen in Rheinwald, Die kirchliche Archäologie, p. 223 sqq.)

When the 25th December had come to be generally received as the day of the Nativity [CHRISTMAS], the Calends of January acquired a Christian character, and Dionysius Exiguus dates the years of his era (our A.D.) a Circumcisione Domini. But the churches long shrank from making the New Year's Day of Christians the same with that of the heathen, and it was deemed preferable to commence the year a Nativitate (25th December), an epoch which continued in use far into the middle ages. Others, however, found it more suitable that the year should begin 25th March, which, if 25th December was the day of Christ's Nativity, would be the day of the Conception, the θεία σάρκωσις, the Incarnation. Hence the epoch ab annunciatione, or a conceptione. These two epochs were further recommended (in the astronomical point of view) by their supposed coincidence with the bruma (25th December) and the vernal equinox (25th March). But, according to an ancient Latin tradition, the Passion befell 25th March. St. Augustin, de Trin. iv. 5: "Octavo Kal. Apr. conceptus creditur Christus quo et passus. Natus traditur octavo kal. Dec." Hence, perhaps, the epoch a resurrectione (or a passione) Christi, was originally intended for the fixed date, 25th March. Bede relates (de Temp. rat. c. 45), that in Gaul, at first, this was kept as the day "quando Christi resurrectio fuisse traditur": and Zeno of Verona, cir. A.D. 360, Serm. 46, speaking of this as the day of the resurrection says, in his mystical way, "idem sui successor itemque decessor, longaeva semper aetate novellus, anni parens annique progenies, antecedit sequiturque tempora et saecula infinita." Certain it is, that the dating of the years of our Lord from Easter—the moveable feast—(inconvenient as it was, as so shifting from year to year, that any Julian day within the paschal limits, say 1st April, might fall twice in the same year or not at all[a]) prevailed far into the middle ages, in France down to the sixteenth century. In this reckoning, the first instant of the New Year was signalised by the consecration of the tapers in the night preceding Easter morning. (Du Cange, s. v. Cereus Paschalis, and Mabillon de Re diplom. ii. 23–6.) In Spain and Portugal the years were dated from the Annunciation down to the fourteenth century, in Germany down to the eleventh, then from the Nativity. Conversely, the English, in Bede's time, began the year with 25th December; after the thirteenth century, with the 25th March, which continued to be the legal civil reckoning down to 1752. In Italy, besides the ecclesiastical epoch, 1st March (see above), 25th March was the customary civil epoch, with this curious variation, viz. that in one reckoning (Calculus Pisanus) a given year of our Lord was made to begin on the 25th March

[a] To meet this inconvenience, it was usual to add to the month-day ante pascha or post pascha. If the date includes the year of the INDICTION, this generally removes all doubt.

preceding, and in the other (C. Florentinus) on the 25th March following the 1st January, from which, in the now received reckoning, the given year bears date.[b] The multiplicity and fluctuation of epochs (against which the Calendar of Charlemagne, commencing the year with 1st January, was an ineffectual protest) was a matter of sore perplexity to later historians: thus Gervase of Canterbury, early in the 13th century (Hist. Anglicanae Script. x. col. 1336) complains, "Chronicae scriptores ipses Domini annos diversis modis et terminis numerant. . . . . Quidam enim annos Domini incipiunt computare ab Annuntiatione, alii a Nativitate, quidam a Circumcisione, quidam vero a Passione. Cui ergo istorum magis credendum est?"

In the East the year, in various forms of the Julianized Macedonian Calendar, began 24th September, but in that "of the Greeks, i.e. Syrians," constantly used for the "year of the Greeks" = era of the Seleucidae, the year begins 1st October. But the "Indictions," from their first commencement at Constantinople, bore date from 1st September, and from the fifth century this came to be received as the first day of the year, not, however, at once superseding the older epoch, 24th September; while in Syria, the old Seleucidian epoch, 1st October, has continued in use to this day, except among Syrian Catholics, who use the 1st September. But the Syrian Evagrius, the historian (A.D. 594), who uses the "era of Antioch," dates its years from 1st September, the use of which epoch by Greek-writing Syrians, in place of the true Syrian epoch, 1st October, is to be explained by the influence of the Indictions in public acts and records (Ideler, i. p. 463 sqq.). The 1st September is the year-epoch of the Constantinopolitan mundane era, and as New Year's Day continued in Russia down to A.D. 1700, in Greece to 1821. For the Copts, Abyssinians, and Armenians using the Alexandrine Calendar, the year begins 29th August.

Year-dating. During the first centuries in the West, the only consecutive ERA [p. 622] was that ab urbe condita; the other notes of the current year were given by the reckoning from the accession of the reigning emperor, or more commonly by the names of the consuls of the 1st January (coss. ordinarii). From the beginning of the fourth century, as may be seen in Clinton, Fasti Romani, the latter note of time began to fail; no consuls being appointed, the year was marked post consulatum of the last named; thus, after A.D. 307, Constantio IX. et Constantino Coss., the notes are (308) Constantio X. et Maximiano VII.; (309) post consul. X. et VII.; (310) anno ii. p. c. X. et VII. If the given year had consuls (or a consul) it was named accordingly. Thus the first council of Toledo bears date Stilicone Consule (A.D.) 400. By a law of Constantine, A.D. 322, no constitution was valid without name of consuls and month-day. In 537, when the consulship was all but extinct, Justinian enlarged this law by prescribing that, in all instruments, first the year of the reigning Caesar, then the names of the consuls, and, lastly, indiction, month and day must be noted (Cod. Theodos. i. Const. 1; Novells xlvii.). [H. B.]

NEW YEAR'S GIFTS. The custom of making gifts on New Year's Day, with an appropriate wish, prevailed extensively in the Roman empire in the early days of Christianity. Many remains, such as medals, lamps, tesserae of metal or of earthenware, bear inscriptions testifying that they were designed for New Year's gifts, generally in some such form as: ANNUM NOVUM FAVSTUM FELICEM TIBI. Gori (Thesaurus Dipt. i. p. 202) figures a tessera of rock-crystal which was, as its inscription testifies (Martigny, Dict. des Antiq. Chrét. p. 280, 2nd edition), a New Year's gift to the emperor Commodus. It does not appear that any of those which have been described bear any words or symbols especially indicative of a Christian origin; there was in fact no reason why Christians should not adopt the simple inscriptions on articles manufactured for the general market.

The Christian fathers, however, censure the giving of strenae, together with other pagan customs which tended to give the kalends of January a licentious character (see Augustine, Sermm. 197, 198, and CIRCUMCISION, p. 394), and a council of Auxerre in A.D. 578 (c. 1) distinctly forbade Christians "strenas diabolicas observare." The objects given were probably sometimes tainted with paganism or indecency.

Another reason for disapproving of strenae is furnished by Maximus of Turin (Hom. v. in Mabillon, Iter Ital. ii. 18), who dwells on the injustice occasioned by the gifts given by the rich to persons in power, such as the poor could not emulate. The giving of New Year's gifts had become, he intimates, an onerous system of bribery and corruption.

Jerome (in Ephes. vi. 4) notices the practice of schoolboys giving strenae to their masters, and begs bishops and priests not to send their children to pagar schools, lest the revenues of the church should be offered to heathen teachers, and so perhaps ultimately aid in heathen worship or licentiousness. NICAEA, COUNCILS OF (NICAENA CONCILIA). There were two councils held at Nicaea, the metropolis of Bithynia, both general; the first and the last to be received as general by the Eastern and Western churches alike; the first under Constantine I., and the second under Constantine VI. (1.) The first met A.D. 325, in the consulship of Paulinus and Julianus, so far all are agreed, and there was a law published by Constantine, dated Nicaea, May 23 (x. Kal. Jun. in I. Cod. Theod. ii. 3, with Godfrey's note), shewing that he was there then. According to Socrates, who professes to have got his information from the chronological notices affixed to it in a work he calls the Synodicon of St. Athanasius, it met three days earlier, or May 20 (i. 13). It was going on when the emperor celebrated his 20th anniversary (July 25) according to Clinton, on which day he invited all the bishops present to a banquet, as we learn from Eusebius (Vit. Const. iii. 15). This covers the date prefixed to its creed in the acts of the fourth council; and it was closed some time subsequently to this—a note to the Cresconian collection says, just a month later, or August 25—by a speech from him (Ib. 21, comp. Pagi ad Baron., A.D. 325, n. 4). All the principal documents relating to it may be seen in Mansi's Concilia or Beveridge's Synodicon, vol. ii. in each case. Of authentic and contemporary documents relating to it, indeed, there are but few; of apocryphal, a bewildering host. As it was the first of its kind, we cannot be surprised that its acts were not written down at the time, as was afterwards customary. There was no book kept of the acts of the first or even of the second council, as there was from the third onwards. Only what was agreed upon in common, was committed to writing, and subscribed to by all, as Eusebius says (Vit. c. iii. 14). In this limited class were comprehended only the creed, canons, and synodical letter. As Valesius well observes, had anything more been extant, St. Athanasius would never have been at the pains of recalling so many particulars of what passed in reply to his friend, but would have told him simply where he could find them recorded. The 'Copies of the Nicene Council' (ἴσα), transmitted A.D. 419 to the African church from Constantinople, contained no more than its creed and canons. Its synodical letter is extant in Socrates and Theodoret (i. 9), as are two letters issued by the emperor at its close. His circulars in convening it have not been preserved; but if we may trust to what Eusebius tells us of their substance (Vit. C. iii. 10; and Vales. ad l.), his own letter to Chrestus, bishop of Syracuse (E. H. x. 5) for assembling the council of Arles, may serve to illustrate their form. The letters of Eusebius to his own diocese, besides his life of the emperor, and of St. Athanasius to his friends and to the African bishops are first-class authorities also for what passed, as far as they go, though from opposite sides. What Socrates calls the 'Synodicon' of St. Athanasius is not now extant, and, being only mentioned and quoted by Socrates, cannot be placed on the same footing with his acknowledged works. For anything like certainty we must be content with what we can glean from these.

The emperor, Eusebius tells us, wrote flattering letters to the bishops everywhere, begging them to meet at Nicaea with all speed (Vit. C. iii. 6). St. Athanasius tells the Africans (l. 2) that bishops to the number of 318 came. The council has gone by the name of the 318 (τῶν) Fathers ever since, though other accounts of its numbers had been current. It met in a church (οἶκος εὐκτήριος), one of the largest then known, and situated in the very midst of the palace (Vit. C. iii. 7 and 10), whither its members could adjourn easily, when the emperor desired their presence. A solitary plane-tree marks its site still; and within the village church of Is-nik is a rude picture commemorative of the event (Stanley's E. C. p. 121). But if we may trust the envoys of Gregory IX., they were received, A.D. 1233, in the actual church in which the event took place (Mansi, xxiii. 280 sq.). The causes which led to it were threefold; the heresy of Arius, the schism of Meletius, and the moot question of keeping Easter. The first of these was the newest and most absorbing of all; but who suggested the novel experiment of a general council for dealing with it? The council of Antioch, A.D. 272, at which its then bishop, Paul of Samosata, was deposed, had been the near approach to a general council in earlier times; and this had been preceded by a number of smaller meetings, as we learn from Eusebius (E. H. vii. 28), and so grew out of them in due course. But that of Nicaea, the same authority tells us (Vit. C. iii. 6), was the act of one man; and "God it was," says the emperor, "on whose suggestion I acted in summoning the bishops to meet in such numbers" (Soc. i. 9). It was "by the grace of God, and the piety of the emperor in assembling us out of different cities and provinces, that the great and holy synod came together," say they in recounting its issues (ib.). No two accounts of the same thing could be more consistent. Later writers insisted on supplementing them with a gloss of their own. Sulpitius Severus, indeed, argued from contemporary facts, when he talked of the council originating with Hosius of Cordova (ii. 40); the fathers of the sixth council argued from the usages of their own times simply, when they talked, in their prosphonetic address, of its having been assembled by pope Silvester and Constantine. Silvester, of course, concurred in assembling it, so far that he sent representatives thither, being unable, through old age, to attend in person. They who "filled his place" were presbyters, according to the same authority; and they subscribed second. Hosius, designating himself merely bishop of Cordova, subscribed first. He subscribed first at Sardica similarly. No less a witness than St. Athanasius attests this last (Apol. c. Arian. 49 sq.); and the 'Prisca versio' makes him head its list of subscribers at both. He was revered on both sides even then; he was in the highest favour of any bishop at court now; he must have been the oldest bishop, by far, present at either, if, as St. Athanasius says, he was 100 years old, and had been bishop more than sixty years, A.D. 357, when his lapse took place. Hence, the order in which bishops should sit at general councils being as yet undetermined by rule, he who was the most ancient would be placed first, as Eusebius expressly says had been done by Palmas (E. H. v. 23), and was a custom in Africa much later (Can. Afric. 86; comp. St. Aug. Ep. lix.); add to which, that Hosius had been a confessor under Maximinian, as he says himself. Persons talked of him, said the Arians — at least this is what St. Athanasius puts into their mouths—as one who presided at synods; whose letters were respected everywhere, who had formulated the Nicene Creed (Ep. ad Sol. § 3–5). Taking all these facts into consideration, it is difficult to conceive that Eusebius can mean any but Hosius when he tells us that the bishop who "sat first in the right row" delivered the opening speech (Vit. C. iii. 11); especially when it is remembered that Hosius had been the only bishop personally noticed by him in enumerating those present, only three chapters earlier, and also that the very next thing we are told, after this notice of him, is that the bishop of the reigning city was not present, but that his place was filled by his presbyters, who were the next to subscribe after Hosius. Again, there is proof positive from Eusebius of Hosius having acted for Constantine several times before (E. H. x. 6; Vit. C. ii. 63; comp. Soc. i. 7), but no contemporary proof whatever of his having ever acted for pope Silvester. If Eusebius had delivered the opening speech himself, he would not have left us to learn this from Sozomen, nor would Socrates have passed it over in silence. Theodoret led the way in attributing it to Eustathius of Antioch, which is not surprising in one who was both a native and a suffragan of that see. In later times, a speech was invented for Eustathius, on his authority, which is still extant.

Up to the last quarter of the 5th century—notwithstanding all that had been written on the council by St. Athanasius, and other fathers, by the one Latin and three Greek ecclesiastical historians who followed Eusebius, all also that had been cited from it by the councils of Ephesus, Chalcedon, and other places—not a word had been said, or a hint dropped, of Hosius having represented anybody there but himself. A.D. 476, or thereabouts, the statement that pope Silvester was represented there by him, as well as by his own true presbyters, was adventured on by Gelasius of Cyzicus, a writer of the poorest credit, who makes Constantinople the seat of empire when the council met, and Rufinus, the historian, one of those present; and to this statement bishop Hefele gravely calls upon us to assent still (Introd. pp. 36–41 and 46).

The emperor, we learn from Eusebius, on entering, took up a central position in front of the first row, and for a time remained standing with the rest, who rose to receive him; afterwards, a chair of gold having been placed before him, he seated himself, at the request of the bishops, when all sat down likewise. The opening speech made to him on their part has not been preserved; his answer has. It was a short exhortation to peace, delivered in Latin, and interpreted into Greek as he spoke. When he had finished, he let the "presidents of the council"—in other words, the bishops—speak. As there were multitudes present besides bishops, there can be no more doubt that this is what Eusebius means here by that phrase, than that bishops frequently went by that name. Endless discussions between them ensued, the emperor acting the part of moderator all through, conversing with them in Greek, to display his familiarity with their own language, though he had previously spoken in Latin, and getting them to be of one mind and opinion on all the disputed points at last. They gave due proof of this in their creed and canons—Eusebius tells the faithful of his diocese—and St. Athanasius vouches for his account (De Dec. Syn. Nic. § 3 and the P.S.) how the creed was formed. First, the creed of his own church of Caesarea, and, therefore, probably that of the church of Jerusalem also, which he had received from his predecessors, had been taught as a catechumen, had taught and professed himself ever since, was recited before the emperor, and found substantially correct; then, some additions to it having been agreed upon, it was published in the name of the council. Both forms are given; but as all creeds had been oral, and not written hitherto, we must not suppose that the original form had never varied or received additions before. Besides, being about to be committed to writing for the first time, and used as a public document from that time forth, the natural thing would be that it should be revised previously. The only question in revising it that seems to have created any difficulty, was the introduction of the word 'Homoousios,' and this the emperor at length succeeded in getting accepted. No doubt it was on this point that Hosius and Eusebius measured influences with him, and the former prevailed, which no one else could have done, though the latter was too politic to resent his defeat. The emperor, he tells his people, put a sense on this word which he could admit; and it was, no doubt, for having got this word inserted that St. Athanasius credits his rival with having formulated the creed itself. The new and the old creed agreed in this: that they commenced "We (not I) believe," and ended with a simple profession of belief in the Holy Ghost. To this, in the new one, was subjoined an anathema; but, instead of being commensurate with the creed, it was confined, as all subsequent anathemas of general councils were, to the maintainers of the particular heresy then condemned, in this case the Arian. All the bishops present subscribed to the new formula, says Socrates, except five; says Theodoret, except two; and these failing under the anathema subjoined to it, and refusing to condemn Arius, shared his exile, decreed by the emperor. The names of those who subscribed are not extant in Greek, except in the short list of Gelasius (Mansi, ii. 927), which is purely fictitious. No more than 228 names are preserved in any of the Latin lists, which also have an artificial appearance, being grouped in provinces, a classification which is at variance with all the Greek lists of every general council extant, whatever cardinal Pitra (Spic. Sol. i. 511) or bishop Hefele (p. 296) may say. The leading bishops known from other sources to have been present were Hosius of Cordova, Alexander of Alexandria, Eustathius of Antioch, Alexander of Constantinople, Macarius of Jerusalem, Eusebius of Nicomedia, and Eusebius of Caesarea, the historian; St. Athanasius, though one of the foremost there, was a deacon only.

After the creed had been agreed upon, twenty canons on discipline were passed. Of their number there can be no dispute, founded, at least, on any document that is both ancient and authentic. The pretended letter of St. Athanasius to pope Mark, and the pretended eighty or eighty-four canons in Arabic, therefore, proclaim their fictitious character. But we must not conclude from the mere existence of the latter, and without further proof, with bishop Hefele, that the "Greek church" ever attributed "more than twenty canons" to this council, still less ever quoted other canons as Nicene, "by mistake," which were not Nicene, as popes Zosimus, Innocent, and Leo did (ib. 360–372).

The canon meriting attention most is the sixth, being the principal of those framed with reference to Meletius, whose case, the bishops in their synodical letter may be supposed to say, engaged them next after Arius. Meletius had ordained priests and deacons in dioceses outside his own, and consecrated bishops at his sole discretion (Hefele, § 40). The council deprived him of all power in consequence, but dealt more leniently with his followers; and to prevent any similar irregularities in future, passed its fourth, fifth, and sixth canons. Of these, the fourth orders that the consecration of a bishop should, in general, be the act of all (the bishops) of the province (in which the vacant see was situate); or, if that could not be, that the absent (bishops) should express their assent in writing, and three (bishops), not of the province necessarily, come together in every case to lay hands on him; yet so that the ratification of all that took place should, in every province, be given to the metropolitan. In other words, so long as the bishops of the province were consenting parties, the consecrators no fewer than three, and the metropolitan confirmed their act, it was not indispensable that the consecrators, when circumstances would have made this inconvenient, should be of the same province. Such, at least, was the interpretation put upon it by the fathers of the second general council (Theodoret, E. H. v. 9, near the end). This canon, again, it will be seen at a glance, must refer to the same act throughout; that one act, namely, which bishops alone, who are the only persons mentioned here, could perform. Consequently, the interpretation given to it by the fathers of the second Nicene council, in their third canon, is irrelevant, and need not be noticed, except so far as this—viz. that the provincial bishops in consecrating a new bishop, confirmed his election, and their metropolitan, in approving of his consecration, confirmed both. But this is the only reference to his election which this canon contains. The fifth canon, similarly concerns another episcopal act relevant to this case. Meletius having been for his offences excommunicated by the bishops of his province, it is ordered that the canon interdicting any that have been excommunicated by some from being received by others (Can. Apost. 10), should rule cases of this kind; but that enquiry might always be made whether any persons had been excommunicated unfairly by their bishop, synods of all the bishops in each province are directed to be held twice a year, in the spring and autumn, for that purpose. The sixth canon is not merely concerned with episcopal acts alone, but with episcopal acts only between bishops and their metropolitan, in other words, with episcopal jurisdiction. Had it, therefore, been always designated by its proper title "bishops and their metropolitans"—the only persons named in it, and the latter the highest dignitaries known to the church as yet—its meaning would have remained clear. As it is, few subjects have provoked a wider or a wilder literature. Moreover, the first half of the canon enacts merely that what had long been customary with respect to such persons in every province, should become law, beginning with the province where this principle had been infringed; while the second half declares what was in future to be received as law on two points, which custom had not as yet expressly ruled. "This is plain to all, that if any become bishop without consent of his metropolitan, the great synod has defined that he ought not to be bishop. But should two or three, from simple contentiousness, oppose what has been agreed upon in common by all, and is in accordance with ecclesiastical law, and reasonable, let the vote of the majority prevail," that is, become law. Nobody disputes the meaning of this last half; nor, in fact, would the meaning of the first half have been questioned, had it not included Rome. "Let ancient customs prevail"—or become law—"in Egypt, Libya, and Pentapolis"—provinces then subject to the Augustal prefect, and in which Meletius had been creating disturbances—"so that the bishop of Alexandria should have the power (which he has by custom) over all these . . . and in like manner at Antioch, and in all other provinces, let the churches be maintained in their privileges." Nobody can dispute the meaning of this either, as it stands. Nobody can maintain that the bishops of Antioch and Alexandria were called patriarchs then, or that the jurisdiction they had then was co-extensive with what they had afterwards, when they were so called. "Since this is usual also for the bishop in the (capital) city, Rome." It is on this clause, standing parenthetically between what is decreed for the particular cases of Egypt and Antioch, and in consequence of the interpretation given to it by Rufinus, more particularly, that so much strife has been raised. Rufinus may rank low as a translator, yet, being a native of Aquileia, he cannot have been ignorant of Roman ways, nor, on the other hand, had he greatly misrepresented them, would his version have waited till the seventeenth century to be impeached. What is called the "Prisca versio Latina" cannot dispute, though it tries to disarm his paraphrase by a gloss of its own, his being "Ut apud Alexandriam et in urbe Roma vetusta consuetudo servetur, ut vel ille Aegypti, vel hic suburbicariarum ecclesiarum sollicitudinem gerat;" that of the "Prisca versio," which is undoubtedly the later of the two, by some fifty years according to Gieseler, § 91: "Antiqui moris est, ut urbis Romae episcopus habeat principatum, et suburbicaria loca, et omnem provinciam suam (al. sua) sollicitudine gubernet?" Moreover, the title given to it in this version runs as follows: "De primatu ecclesiae Romanae vel aliarum civitatum episcopis." "Suburbicary churches" were the churches of the suburban or "suburbicary places," or "regions," over which the jurisdiction of the city praefect extended (Cave, Ch. Gort. iii. 2–3), embracing a circuit in every direction to the hundredth milestone. The bishop of Rome, therefore, stood at the head of the bishops of those churches in heathen times, and before the regular institution of metropolitans. This was one fact; afterwards it was a fact no less, that his jurisdiction became commensurate with that of the city vicar, and was spread over ten provinces: 1. Campania; 2 Tuscany, with Umbria; 3. Picenum; 4. Sicily, 5. Calabria, with Apulia; 6. Lucania, with the Bruttians; 7. Samnium; 8. Sardinia; 9. Corsica; 10. Valeria. These ten provinces the 'Prisca versio' calls "omnem provinciam suam;" which, accordingly, went no farther northwards than the gulf of Spezzia on the west coast, and the mouth of the Rubicon on the east, leaving the sees of Aquileia, Milan, and Ravenna, similar centres in their own neighbourhood of the seven northern provinces to which the jurisdiction of the vicar of Italy was then confined (Pancirol, Notit. Dign. ii. 2). The composition of the Roman synod at one time bore testimony to its original, at another to its extended limits; and now and then its dimensions were enlarged exceptionally, as will be pointed out under that head. [POPE; ROME, COUNCILS OF.]

The remaining canons need not occupy much space. Canons eight to fifteen relate to the lapsed principally—those that had concealed or abjured their faith to escape persecution. The Novatians, or Puritans, as they styled themselves, had incurred censure for refusing to communicate with those who had been twice married and also with the lapsed, even after they had performed their penance. The manner of restoring all such was now settled; but the ordination of any whose crimes should have debarred them from the priesthood was declared invalid. To the dying, indeed, according to the old rule of the church, the Eucharist, or "last and most necessary viaticum," is not to be denied under any circumstances; but they are not to take rank with communicants proper should they recover. By the sixteenth, translations of the clergy from one diocese to another are forbidden. By the seventeenth, lenders on usury are to be struck off the rolls of the clergy. By the eighteenth, deacons are forbidden to usurp any functions that belong to priests, especially that of giving the Eucharist. By the nineteenth, it is decreed that all the clerical followers of Paul of Samosata, deaconesses included, must be re-baptized before they can be re-ordained. Deaconesses indeed, never having received imposition of hands, can only be treated as lay personages. That this is the true meaning of the phrase ὅρος ἐκτέθειται, viz. 'a decree has now been made,' is clear from the application of the words ὅρος, in canon seventeen, and ὥρισεν, in canon six. It has been a pure mistake, therefore, which bishop Hefele blindly follows, to understand it of some canon previously passed, whether at Arles or elsewhere. In the 'Prisca Versio' this enactment about deaconesses is reckoned a separate canon, making twenty-one in all. By the twentieth, all are directed to pray standing on Sundays, and the whole time between Easter and Pentecost.

The three first canons, having nothing to do with the causes which led to the council, may be considered here more conveniently than where they stand. The first decrees that such as have made themselves eunuchs may not be ordained, or, if ordained, must resign their post. The second that none should be raised to the office of priest or bishop, who had not been long baptized, or after full instruction; and even after ordination, should any crime be proved against a person, he must forfeit his place among the clergy. By the third, no bishop, priest or deacon, or clerk of any sort, may have living with him—συνείσακτον—as an inmate of his house, any woman less nearly related to him than a mother, sister, or aunt; or, in any case, such persons as are quite beyond suspicion. It used to be maintained that clerical celibacy was imposed by this canon; and in the same breath, that the story told by Socrates and Sozomen of the venerable bishop Paphnutius was a fiction. In fact, the marked omission in this canon of all reference to the wife amongst the female relatives of the clergy, is explained at once by his protest against any separation of man and wife.

On the Easter question there was no canon passed, but only the understanding entered into, which the bishops in their synodical letter, and the emperor in his circular, record—viz. "that all the brethren in the East, who formerly celebrated Easter with the Jews, will henceforth keep it agreeably with the Romans and ourselves, and all who from ancient time have kept Easter as we" (Soc. i. 9). In other words, that they would all celebrate the festival of the resurrection of our Lord always on the first day of the week, though never on the 14th day of the month Nisan, even when that day fell on a Sunday, but the Sunday after. [EASTER.]

The authority which this council obtained everywhere gave rise to continual tamperings with its decrees, or with its history from interested motives. Nine-tenths of such tamperings, at least, have been in the Latin interest; and if their origin cannot be brought home positively to the popes themselves, it cannot be denied that they have been foremost in using them. The interpolation of the sixth canon, as has been said, began with the legates of the first Leo. He himself originated another gloss upon it—viz. that it decided that of the three sees mentioned in it Rome had the first place, Alexandria the second, and Antioch the third. The Sardican canons were first cited as Nicene by popes Zosimus, Innocent, and the same Leo. The preface to the Nicene council in the Pseudo-Isidorian collection was penned in their interest. The seventy-first of the Arabian canons, according to one version of them (Mansi, ii. 1005), was framed in their interest. Pope Silvester, of course, learnt from his presbyters all to which his assent had been given through them, and received from them a copy of the synodical letter addressed to the church of Alexandria, for whose special benefit the council had met. But the council addressed no letter to him, nor received any letter from him in particular. Later ages invented three such letters, in which his confirmation of the acts of the council is asked and imparted, and they are still extant (ib. 719–22). As if this was not enough, a third Roman synod, in addition to a first and second, of still more ambitious purpose (ib. 551 and 615-32) was feigned to have been held, in which he anathematised all who dared to contravene the Nicene definition (ib. 1081). Pope Adrian I. is the first who quotes or refers to these documents. One more point may be mentioned, in conclusion, as having an interest for English readers—viz. that probably the earliest MS. of its kind extant ("cui nullum aliud simile invenire uspiam licuit," say the Ballerini themselves of it) is one preserved in the Bodleian archives (Justellus, 100-2), being a fine and nearly complete transcript of the old Latin, or pre-Dionysian, version of the Nicene and other canons, in three parts. It may be seen printed, but unfaithfully printed, in the Bibl. Jur. Can. Vet. i. 277 sq., by Voel and H. Justellus, or reprinted by the Ballerini, in their edition of St. Leo, iii. 478–583.

That this version was the 'Prisca translatio,' which, Dionysius Exiguus tells us, he had been asked to improve upon, is clear enough from internal evidence; and has long been accepted as such by the learned. But, according to Dr. Maassen (Can. Recht, § 8–11) this was by no means the earliest version of the Nicene decrees then extant in Latin: as he assumes there were Latin translations of them sent by St. Cyril of Alexandria and Atticus of Constantinople respectively to the African bishops in the 5th century, when appeals were being argued between them and Rome, and that even a contemporary translation of them was brought home by Cæcilian, bishop of Carthage, from the Nicene council. It is true that we have Latin versions of them given in the Isidorian collection, and several MSS. of uncertain date, which are so headed: but even so, the statements made respecting them are vague and conflicting: and it might be shewn on similar evidence, that a Latin translation of these canons was supplied by the Nicene Fathers to Pope Silvester himself. Again, how comes it, if so many cut and dried versions of the Nicene canons were thus early made, that not one is ever cited at length, either in these versions or any other, by members of the African or of the Roman Church, or by any Western synod, in pre-Dionysian times: to say nothing of these versions being unknown to Dionysius himself, by whom the African code was first brought into notice? The fact is, Dionysius is an inconvenient authority for modern theories respecting the Sardican canons, which the Popes endeavoured to pass as Nicene, till the appearance of his collection, as will be shewn further on. [SARDICA, COUNCIL OF; comp. DICT. CHRIST. BIOG. art. 'Dionysius Exiguus.'] [E. S. Ff.]

NICAEA (2) the 2nd council of, the 7th and last general; being the last to be received as such finally by the Western churches in communion with Rome, and the Eastern churches in communion with Constantinople; as well as the only general council which has at times been condemned by both, exclusive of Rome. (Palmer, On the Church, iv. 10. 4.) Met in the 8th year of the empress Irene and her son Constantine, A.D. 787. It contrasts with the first council in that its acts are extant and fill a volume, to say nothing of their having been translated by Anastasius, the Roman librarian, and dedicated by him in a preface of singular interest to pope John VIII.; while those of the first were not even committed to writing.

To understand its decrees, some previous phases of the contest about images must be recalled. The emperor Leo III., surnamed the Isaurian, had taken a violent part against images and their defenders, which had been bitterly resented in his own capital, and still more by pope Gregory II., who challenged him in two fiery letters to attempt similar measures in Italy. The emperor replied by confiscating all the papal domains in Apulia, Calabria, and Sicily. His son and grandson following in his steps retained them. But his great-grandson was a minor, in dependence upon his mother, and she, yielding to the instances of the retiring patriarch Paul, and of the new patriarch Tarasius, took steps for reversing all that had been decreed against images in a council held under his grandfather Constantine, surnamed Copronymus, A.D. 754, and which then passed for the 7th council. She wrote, therefore, to pope Adrian I. in their joint names A.D. 784, inviting him to a council which she proposed assembling at Constantinople for that purpose; but her letter remained unanswered for two years. At length, A.D. 786, two presbyters arrived from Rome to be present at it on behalf of the pope. Even then, the council had no sooner met than it had to be closed on account of the disturbances to which it gave rise. The year following it was transferred to Nicaea, where its proceedings occupied no more than a month, as has been said. According to the lists given in Mansi, 260 bishops or their representatives attended its first action or session, and 310 subscribed to what was defined at its 7th and last. The first place was assigned to the legates of the pope, though presbyters. Tarasius, who had just been appointed patriarch, while yet a layman, by the civil power, sat second, and was the chief speaker throughout. Two presbyters, representing the patriarchs of Antioch and Alexandria, who were kept away by the Saracens, sat next. The see of Jerusalem, being vacant, was not represented. The rest, with very few exceptions—and none farther west than Italy—came from the east. At the request of the bishops of Sicily, Tarasius opened proceedings in a short speech. The imperial letter, or Sacra, was then read, in which reference was made to his consecration, to the petition that had been made by him for a council, and to the steps which had been taken for assembling this. Lastly, several bishops who had attended the iconoclastic council under Copronymus, or been consecrated by those that had, on confessing their errors, and professing the faith of the six previous councils, were received.

At the second action, two letters from pope Adrian were read; one to the empress and her son, the other to Tarasius. The first begins with a faltering reference to the exaltation of the Roman see by the first emperor Constantine and his mother, together with his recovery from leprosy through pope Silvester, whose acts are then quoted in favour of images, supplemented by other authorities. Afterwards, if Anastasius, or rather the anonymous somebody who professes to record his words, is to be trusted, the pope commented on the consecration of Tarasius, and on his being styled oecumenical patriarch in passages which the Greeks suppressed, and concluded by protesting against the detention of his rights and patrimony, contrasting with it all the provinces and cities and provinces which he had just received in perpetuity from Charlemagne, besides what he had regained through him from the Lombards. But all this is suspicious, being only preserved in a Latin version, and in any case should be compared with a letter written to Charlemagne by the same pope nine years before (Cod. Carol. Ep. lx.), for the marked abstention from any reference to the contents of the papal archives in one, and the palmary reference to the donation of Constantine preserved there in the other. Even if genuine, the Greeks might well have suppressed this passage, no general council having ever been asked before to occupy itself with such subjects. The letter to Tarasius is said to have been similarly mutilated; but in this case the Latin version contains nothing of any sort which is not found in the Greek. The pope merely speaks in it of the synodical epistle received from Tarasius announcing his election and containing his profession. As this last was in entire harmony with the faith of the six previous councils, and had taken the right view of images, he would not insist on the twofold blots of his election—at least, if the patriarch will engage to do three things: (1) to get the pseudo-synod against images condemned; (2) to seek union with the Roman see to that extent as to make profession of his devotion to it as head of all the churches of God; (3) to get images restored by an imperial edict to their accustomed places in all the churches of the capital and throughout the East, conformably with the tradition of the Roman church. Both letters were accepted enthusiastically by the council, and the bishops, in subscribing to them, declared them a standard of orthodoxy for what they contained.

In the third action, Gregory, bishop of Neo-Caesarea, recanted his former opinions, and was received. Then a copy of the synodical letter sent by Tarasius to his brother patriarchs having been read out, it was pronounced identical with what had been sent to the pope, whose answer to it they had just heard and accepted accordingly. Two points in it deserve some notice—1. It asserted procession of the Holy Ghost from the Father, through or by the Son. 2. It anathematised pope Honorius with other monotheïte leaders by name, and their dogmas, as well as their followers. The reply to this letter from the patriarchs of Antioch and Alexandria, and with it the synodical letter they had themselves received from the late patriarch of Jerusalem, on his election, followed. In the latter of these the Holy Ghost is said to proceed eternally from the Father: the teaching of the six previous councils is epitomised and professed: while pope Honorius is distinctly said to have been anathematised by the sixth. Both letters were declared in accordance with the profession of Tarasius, and subscribed to by all.

With the fourth action commenced the real work of the council. Passages from the Old and New Testament were read out favourable to visible representations of things absent or unseen. Passages from the fathers, mentioning images or pictures with approval followed. Several of these passages, indeed, were drawn from works of no credit; some from confessedly spurious works, as Cave points out (i. 650) forcibly. Still, the eighty-second Trullan canon, which they considered oecumenical, alone covers their decision in principle; and this again had been acted upon in the preceding century, when a picture of our Lord was borne before the apostle of England, as he entered Canterbury. Art, in general, might have been lost to the church had they decided otherwise. Finally, where they state their inferences (Mansi, xiii. 131) and say that they "honour such representations of holy persons and holy things, as leading to the perpetual remembrance of their prototypes," they assert nothing irrational; and even when they add, "as likewise making us sharers of their holiness," they may mean no more than "as exciting people to endeavour to be as good as they were."

The fifth action was occupied with details in the proceedings of the council against images under Copronymus, A.D. 754. First, the worthlessness of its authorities was exposed, and counter-authorities cited in condemnation of them. Next, volumes from which passages in favour of images had been torn out were displayed. Lastly, the reaction against images was traced back to the Saracens. At the 6th action, the refutation of the same council assumed a more formal shape. It was subdivided into six tomes or parts so arranged that in each of them Gregory, bishop of Neo-Caesarea, one of the recanting prelates, reads out portions of the acts of the pseudo-synod, and one of the deacons of the church of Constantinople their refutation.

The council met for its seventh action on Oct. 13, when Theodore, bishop of Taormina in Sicily, read out its definition. This, after a short preface, commenced with the creed, in the Constantinopolitan form only, and without the canon enforcing its exclusive use, which we find appended to it at the fourth, fifth, and sixth councils. Long afterwards it was pretended on the Latin side that the insertion of the "Filioque" was decreed at this council; the very thing it was blamed by the council of Frankfort for not having done. Next, it anathematised all the heretics by name, whom the six previous councils had condemned, including pope Honorius. Next, it declared for preserving all ecclesiastical traditions intact, one of which was the employment of symbolical representations. And thereupon it decreed, lastly, that images of our Lord, His mother and His saints, in colours, mosaic, or other material, might, like the cross, be freely placed on church walls and in tablets; on vessels and vestments used at divine service; in private houses or by the roadside, and have candles or incense burnt, according to custom before them, and be kissed and saluted with all reverence, saving only the worship (latria) which is due to God alone, deposing all bishops and clergy, and excommunicating all monks and laymen who maintained the contrary. [IMAGES.]

This, followed by corresponding acclamations and anathemas, a joint letter to the empress and her son Constantine, Tarasius and the assembled bishops, and a synodical letter to the faithful, terminated the [illegible] work of the council. Its members met for a supplemental or eighth session at the palace called Magnaura in the capital, Oct. 23, when the definition was again read out, this time in the hearing of the empress and her son, who were present, and twenty-two canons passed. Of these the first insists on the observance of the canons by all, but seems to point rather to dogma than discipline. If it is held to confirm all the canons of the six previous councils, it must, of course, be understood to confirm the Trullan or Quini-sext canons. The second ordains that no bishop shall be consecrated who has not a thorough knowledge of the Psalter, the canons, and Holy Scripture in general. The third declares all appointments of bishops by the civil power void, as being contrary to the canons. Thus Tarasius effectually barred his own case from becoming a precedent. The fourth and fifth are strong against simony. The sixth renews the rule that a provincial synod shall be held at least once a year. The seventh ordains that any bishop consecrating a church in future without relics of the saints shall be deposed. The eighth decrees against receiving any Jews who are not sincere converts. The ninth orders that all books against images should be brought to the residence of the patriarch at Constantinople, and there stowed away with all other heretical works. Any bishop, priest, or deacon concealing such books is to be deposed, and any monk or layman anathematised. The remaining thirteen, being of less consequence, may be passed over.

Anastasius is allowed to have translated these canons, whether he translated the proceedings of the eighth session or not, which some deny. The Latin version, which used to be thought anterior to his, omits them certainly. But if the titles given at the end of his preface are his, it is plain that he looked upon the eighth session as one with the seventh, and such is, apparently, the view which Theophanes, who was present, takes of it in his Chronographia. The other pieces in connection with it, also given in Latin and Greek, are: 1. A complimentary speech addressed to the council by Epiphanius, deacon of the church of Catana, in Sicily. 2. A letter from Tarasius to pope Adrian, tersely describing the council, which "by placing a copy of the Gospels in its midst, constituted Christ its head, and by causing the letters of the pope to be read first in order, constituted him its eye." 3. A second, and still more remarkable letter from the same to the same, bristles with denunciations from Scripture, the canons, and the fathers, against simony, thus not merely throwing light upon the fourth and fifth canons passed at this council, but suggesting that they may have been as much needed just now for the West as the East. 4. A letter from the same to an anchoret dignitary, named John, announcing and expounding to him the decrees of the Council. The latter standing last in Mansi, which purports to have been addressed to the church of Alexandria by this council, was probably written to bring about its commemoration in a later age. It now stands for commemoration in the Greek Menology on Oct. 12, and is there said to have been attended by 367 fathers. For the letter written in defence of it by pope Adrian to Charlemague, which Mansi prints last but one, see 'Council of Frankfort.' (Soc. ii. 37.) Instead of which it was condemned in the West, as soon as known. It betrayed its character by condemning the use of the word 'Homoousios'; besides which it contained "the descent into hell," which had not as yet appeared in any church creed. It is extant in Theodoret (H. E. ii. 21), and was repeated almost word for word at Constantinople the year following (Soc. ii. 41.) St. Hilary (Fragm. viii.) gives the fullest account of what took place. The sentence passed on Valens and Ursacius at Rimini was rescinded at the same time. (Mansi, iii. 309–314.) [E. S. Ff.]

NIMBUS (IN CHRISTIAN ART), a disc or plate, commonly golden, sometimes red, blue, or green, or banded like a rainbow, placed vertically behind the heads of persons of special dignity or sanctity as a symbol of honour. This disc is sometimes reduced to a mere ring, single or double, showing the background through. It is, as a rule, perfectly plain, except in the case of our Saviour, whose nimbus is commonly distinguished by a cross. The cross is sometimes, but rarely, depicted immediately above the Sacred Head, either just without or just within the circumference of the disc (as in the mosaics of the arch of the tribune at St. Maria Maggiore), but it is almost universally inscribed within the circle. After the eighth century living persons were, in Italy, distinguished by a square nimbus, which sometimes assumed the form of a scroll, partly unrolled.

The nimbus is undoubtedly of ethnic origin. It is the visible expression of part of the luminous nebula supposed to emanate from and to clothe a Divine Being. It originally invested the whole body. Thus Virgil describes Juno as "nimbo succincta" (Aen. x. 634). By degrees, however, it was restricted to the head, which was naturally regarded as the chief seat of this divine radiance. The heads of the statues of the gods (Lucian, de Dea Syr. 675; Timon, c. 51, 154), and of the emperors, after they began to claim divine honours, were decorated with a crown of rays, or brilliant circlet. Servius (ad Aen. ii. 615) defines the nimbus with which Pallas was distinguished at the destruction of Troy, as "fulgidum lumen, quo deorum capita cinguntur: sic enim pingi solent;" and again (ibid. iii. 587), "proprie nimbus est qui deorum vel imperantium capita quasi clara nebula ambire fingitur." We also find in the 'Panegyricus Maximiani,' which passes under the name of Mamertinus, "lux divinum verticem claro orbe complectens," associated with the trabeae and the fasces and the curule chair as symbols of imperial dignity. From the resemblance of the nimbus as commonly depicted to a circular plate of metal, it has been derived by some from the μηνίσκος of the Greeks, a metal disk placed above the heads of statues to prevent birds from settling on them, and polluting them (cf. interpr. ad Aristoph. Aves, v. 1114); but though similar in form and position the connection is probably only apparent, not real (Ciampini Vet. Mon. i. 112). Buonarruoti (Osservaz. p. 60) is of opinion that the nimbus was borrowed from the Egyptians, which is also the view of Pignorius (Ciampini, u.s. i. 112). Others hold that it was of Etruscan origin, and others again derive it from India, where it was certainly used to encircle the deities of the Hindu mythology (Didron, Iconogr. Chrét. pp. 43, 136); but from whatever quarter it was derived, the nimbus was regarded in the early ages of Christianity as a mere symbol of honour and dignity, and was not at all associated with divinity or special sanctity. In the East especially it was considered as an attribute of mere power, whether good or evil, and was used much more prodigally than in the West. Thus we find it assigned in Byzantine art to Satan (Didron, p. 163, fig. 46), and to the beast in the Apocalypse (ib. p. 165, fig. 47). In the West it may be seen encircling the bust of the emperor Claudius (Montfaucon, Antiquité expliquée, v. 162); the head of Trajan, and several medallions on the arch of Constantine, and of Antoninus Pius on the reverse of one of his medals (Oiselt. Thes. Numism. tab. lxvii. 1). Herod is distinguished by the nimbus in the mosaics of St. Mary Major's at Rome, as are Justinian and Theodora in those of St. Vitalis, and Constantine Pogonatus, Heraclius and Tiberius at St. Apollinaris in Classe, and Justinian at St. Apollinaris in Urbe, at Ravenna; and Constantine and Charles the Great in those of the Lateran Triclinium (Agincourt, Peinture, xvi. 18). On medals the nimbus is frequently found surrounding the heads of the Christian emperors. We may instance Constantine the Great on the reverse of a great bronze of Crispus (Sanclemente, Numm. Select. iii. p. 182, fig. 1), the obverse of a gold coin of Constantine (Morelli, Nov. Spec. tab. vii. No. 1); and one of Fausta (Ibid. tab. iv. No. 4); Cavedoni, Ricerche, p. 53). Constans, Constantius and the later emperors are similarly distinguished. On the great shield of Theodosius he and his two sons have the nimbus. (Buonarruoti, Osservazioni, pp. 60 sq.). A silver shield discovered in the ancient bed of the Arve, near Geneva in 1721, figured by Montfaucon (Antiq. Expliq. xiv. p. xxviii. p. 51), representing Valentinian making gifts to his soldiers after a victory, shews the emperor with his head surrounded by a plain nimbus. The statues of the Merovingian kings which formerly decorated the chief portal of the abbey of St. Germain des Prés at Paris are also described as having their heads surmounted with this symbol of royal dignity (Mabillon, Annal. Ord. Bened. ann. 557, tom. i. p. 169).

In illuminated MSS. after the sixth century, the secular use of the nimbus is very frequent. It does not appear in a MS. of Genesis of the fourth or fifth century, in the Library at Vienna (Agincourt, Peinture, pl. xix.); but Priam and Cassandra have it in the Vatican Virgil (Ciampini, u. s. 1, tab. xxxvi. 16, 17), and in a MS. of the book of Joshua of the seventh or eighth century from the same collection (No. 405), Joshua himself, as well as the cities of Jericho, Gibeon, &c., represented as females, is thus decorated. In the Alexandrine MS. and in a MS. Bible of St. Paul's at Rome, of the 8th or 9th century (Agincourt, Peinture, xxviii.–xxx.), not only sacred and quasi-sacred personages, e.g. Moses, Joshua, Eli, Samuel, Balaam, &c., but kings, such as Pharaoh and Ahab, bear it (Buonarruoti, u. s. p. 62). The case is the same in the Menologium of Basil of the tenth century, where the nimbus is given without distinction to the saints, and to the emperors, to Herod and other potentates. Medea is nimbed

Mercury with Circular Nimbus. (Didron.)

Familiar as the use of the nimbus was as a symbol of dignity or power, especially in the East, it was unknown as a distinctive mark of divinity or sanctity to the earlier ages of Christian art. As Didron remarks (Iconogr. Chrét. p. 100), "the most ancient monuments in France and Italy present divine and sacred personages without the nimbus." The first five centuries offer few, if any, genuine examples. Didron indeed asserts (ib. p. 101), that "before the sixth century the Christian nimbus is not to be seen on authentic monuments." It is of the extremest rarity on Christian sarcophagi, and in the frescoes of the catacombs, excepting those of later date, and such (unfortunately a numerous class), as have been subjected to modern restoration. As there is no class of christian monuments which have come down to us in such unaltered state, there is none whose authority is so weighty as the sarcophagi. From these the nimbus is almost universally totally absent. There is not a single example of this symbol on any of the sarcophagi engraved by Bosio and Aringhi, or in those of the Lateran Museum. Not only the angels and holy personages, but Christ Himself is devoid of it. It is equally absent from the sarcophagi of Arles, Saint Maximin, and Marseilles. At Ravenna, however, there are two sarcophagi, both of the seventh century, which present our Lord nimbed; that of the exarch Isaac at St. Vitalis, A.D. 644, representing the adoration of the Magi (Appell. Monuments of early Christian Art, p. 27, No. 9), and one in the basilica of St. Apollinaris in Classe, on which we see a youthful, beardless figure of Christ enthroned between the apostles. He has a plain nimbus, but they are without any (ibid. p. 28, No. 10).

The testimony of the glass vessels discovered in the catacomb belonging probably to the fourth century, is equally decisive as to the late introduction of the nimbus. There are a few examples in Garrucci's great collection in which Christ is nimbed (Vetri Ornati, tav. viii. 7, tav. xvi. 5, tav. xvii. 6, tav. xxiii. 7), but in the vast majority of instances He is destitute of it. Buonarruoti gives a very curious glass (Osservaz. xvii. 1), on which St. Stephen is represented sitting listening to the teaching of Christ, also seated, neither of them wearing the nimbus; but between them is a small figure of Christ in the act of benediction, which is nimbed. The reason of the distinction between these two figures of our Lord is evidently that the one is intended for Christ as a Teacher on earth, the other shews Him as seen by St. Stephen in vision from heaven. Other saintly personages are still less frequently thus distinguished. The apostles St. Peter and St. Paul are constantly without it in Garrucci's collection, and only once with it (tav. xiv. 6), where the character of the art is late. Among the multitudinous glasses on which female figures are depicted, that inscribed "Mara," which may perhaps be intended for the Blessed Virgin, has it (tav. ix. 11), and St. Agnes is also once nimbed (tav. xxii. 3).

Turning to another department of Christian art, the nimbus is found on Christian ivories of the sixth and subsequent centuries. Martigny refers to a diptych of the sixth century, in the treasury of the cathedral of Milan, on which various scenes of the gospel history are carved, our Lord always wearing the nimbus. The same ornament is also given to the Holy Lamb, and to the evangelistic symbols. (Bugati, Memorie di San Celso, in fin.)

The same distinction holds good in the catacomb frescoes. The immense majority of them do not exhibit the nimbus, even in the case of our Lord and His apostles. When found, the character of the painting points to a date subsequent to the fifth century, often to a considerably later period. In some cases, where it does appear, it is certainly due to the modern restorations by which the value of the evidence of the catacomb pictures has been so seriously damaged. To instance some of the more remarkable examples. The beautiful youthful head of Christ from the cemetery of St. Callistus is destitute of the nimbus (Aringhi, i. 561; JESUS CHRIST, REPRESENTATIONS OF, p. 875). The same is the case with all the figures in the fresco of Christ in the midst of His apostles with the scrinium before them (Aringhi, 529), and with the famous Virgin and Child from St. Agnes (Ibid. ii. 208). [See MARY, VIRGIN, IN ART, p. 1150.] To discover a nimbed figure in the catacombs we must descend to a comparatively late date. It appears abundantly in the frescoes assigned to the second half of the ninth century which decorate the baptistery in the catacomb of St. Pontianus and the adjacent parts. In the fresco of the Baptism of Christ our Lord, the Baptist and the attendant angels have the entire nimbus (ibid. i. 381; DOVE, p. 576), which also encircles the heads of the saints Abdon and Sennen and their companions in the adjacent fresco, where Christ has the cruciform nimbus (see ABDON and SENNEN, p. 8; Aringhi, i. 383, 385). The fine head of Christ from the same catacomb (ibid. 379) is distinguished by a cruciform nimbus formed of pearls. A late fresco from St. Agnes shews us Christ seated between two apostles (Perret, tom. ii. pl. 4), and St. Peter between St. Praxedes and St. Pudentiana (ib. tom. iii. pl. xii.), and St. Pudentiana and her saints (ib. pl. xiii.) are similarly nimbed. Perret's plates present the Blessed Virgin twice with the nimbus (ibid. tom. iv. pl. xxi. 1, 17). No reliance can be placed on the appearance of the nimbus surrounding the head of our Lord in the famous early picture preserved in the Vatican Library, or in that in the Pudenzia beneath St. Sebastian. They are in both cases modern additions. This unauthorised tampering with early monuments is severely condemned by Perret (tom. vi. p. 32).

Turning to the mosaics we find the nimbus equally rare in all the earlier examples. Where it does appear in works before the sixth century, it may usually be considered an unauthorised addition ("On a tant retouché les mosaïques," Didron, p. 33, note 2). As a token of sanctity it is at first generally limited to our Lord, and, somewhat later, to His attendant angels, though it still continues to be given to kings as a mark of secular power. Our Lord wears the cruciform nimbus on the arch of St. Sabina in Rome, A.D. 424, and on that of St. Paul, A.D. 441, where the nimbus is surrounded with rays. In the important mosaic pictures which decorate the arch of the tribune of St. Mary Major's, A.D. 440, Christ and the attendant angels, and, as has been already remarked, King Herod, are the only figures that wear the nimbus. The Virgin Mary is always without it. In the Ravenna baptistery, A.D. 430, our Lord and perhaps the Baptist are alone furnished with the nimbus. The case is the same in the mausoleum of Galla Placidia, A.D. 450. The vaulted ceilings of the chapels of the Lateran Baptistery, A.D. 462, exhibit the Holy Lamb with the cruciform nimbus.

In the earliest mosaic pictures of the next century at Rome, those of the church of St. Cosmas and St. Damian, the only heads distinguished with the nimbus are those of Christ and the angels and the Holy Lamb. The church of St. Vitalis at Ravenna, A.D. 547, shews the gradual extension of the employment of the nimbus. It is given not merely to our Lord (Whose nimbus is cruciform) and the angels, but also to St. Vitalis, and to the evangelists and prophets on the walls of the sacrarium. Melchizedek as a priest wears the nimbus, but not Abel or Abraham. The nimb surrounding the heads of Justinian and Theodora has already been noticed (see for these the article CROWN, vol. i. p. 306 b). In the Arian baptistery at Ravenna, where the mosaics are a close copy of those in the orthodox baptistery, the later date is indicated by the nimbus being assigned to the apostles, as well as to Christ. In St. Apollinaris in Urbe, A.D. 566, every individual of the long procession of male and female saints on either side of the nave is thus distinguished. From this time onwards the use of the nimbus for holy personages became universal, the only distinction being that the nimbus of Christ was usually cruciform, that of other individuals plain.

The result of our examination of dated examples is that, as Didron has laid down, the nimbus, however frequent previously as a token of dignity, does not appear as a Christian emblem before the sixth century. That during and after the sixth century the nimbus was gradually adopted as a mark of sanctity, though not by any invariable law. That the seventh and two succeeding centuries witnessed the transition from the complete absence to the constant presence of the nimbus, the same monument presenting personages sometimes with and sometimes without it. (Didron, Iconogr. Chrét. pp. 101–102.) We see also that (setting aside the secular use of the nimbus) the image of our Lord was the first to be thus distinguished; that those of the angels attending upon Him were the next in succession ("lumen quod circa angelorum capita pingitur nimbus vocatur," Isidor. Hispal. Orig. lib. xix. c. 31); and that these were followed by the evangelists and their symbolical animals, then by the apostles, and that ultimately, towards the end of the seventh or beginning of the eighth century, this honour was extended to all saints. No superior dignity in this respect was originally accorded to the Virgin Mary, nor does any definite rule seem to have been followed. She is not marked by the nimbus in the fifth-century mosaics at St. Mary Major's, nor commonly in the representations of the adoration of the Magi. On the tomb of the exarch Isaac at Ravenna, A.D. 644, she is unnimbed, while the Holy Child has the nimbus, while in the mosaics of St. Apollinaris in Urbe of the preceding century, A.D. 566, both are thus distinguished. In the mosaics of the chapel of St. Venantius at the Lateran, A.D. 642, the Virgin as well as the sixteen apostles and saintly personages who stand on either side of her wear the nimbus. In some examples of Byzantine Art, however, the growth of the cultus of the Virgin is indicated by the nimbus being assigned to her while the apostles are without it. As examples of this distinction we may refer to the mosaic representing the Ascension on the cupola of St. Sophia at Salonica, of the 6th century; and an illumination of the same scene from the Zagba MS. of the Syrian Gospels in the Medicean Library at Florence, of which a cut is given, article ANGELS, I. 85. the others to whom it was assigned. In each case it was a simple disk, or a ring surrounding the head, allowing the ground to be seen through. Subsequently the Saviour was always distinguished by a cruciform nimbus, the field of the disk being divided into four quadrants by a cross, the sides of which are often concave. This cross, as well as the circumference of the disk, is not unfrequently formed of round beads or pearls, as in the annexed example from the catacomb of St. Pontianus. A further development was the inserting the letters A and Ω on the disk, with the addition sometimes of the Christian monogram. We give an example from the fifth-century mosaics of the chapel of St. Aquilinus, at Milan (No. 3). A later Greek development inscribed the three arms of the cross with the three letters forming ὁ ὤν (No. 4).

No. 4. Fresco; Thessaly; 14th cent. (From Didron.)

A nimbus of a triangular form, in allusion to the Trinity, was constantly given in later works of art to the Divine Being; this, however, is not found during the first ten centuries. In the mosaics of the cathedral of Capua, where the head of the Holy Dove is surrounded by a triangular nimbus, it is almost undoubtedly a modern alteration. (Ciampini, Vet. Mon. ii. p. 168; Didron, p. 33, note 2.)

A nimbus of a square or rectangular shape, from the 9th century onwards, was the mark of a living person. Ciampini (u. s. ii. 14 b) expresses some doubts on this point, but the following passage from Paulus Diaconus in the life of St. Gregory is decisive, "circa verticem vero tabulae similitudinem, quod viventis insigne est, praeferentis, non coronam." Durandus also writes, "cum aliquis praelatus aut sanctus vivus pingitur, non in forma scuti rotundi, sed quadrati, corona ipsa depingitur." (Div. Off. lib. i. c. 3). This, instead of a thin tablet, sometimes assumes the form of a block of very substantial thickness. As examples we may cite the head of pope John I., A.D. 705–708 (Agincourt, Peinture, pl. xvii. No. 6) and those of pope Paschal I., A.D. 807–824, on the mosaics of St. Maria in Dominica and St. Praxedes. [See MOSAICS, fig. 14.] On the celebrated palliotto of the church of St. Ambrose, archbishop Agilbert, the donor, is represented with the quadrangular nimbus, offering the altar to St. Ambrose, whose nimbus is circular. (Ferrario, Memorie di Sant' Ambrogio; Agincourt, Sculpt. pl. xxvi. c. 15.) We find the square nimbus surrounding the heads of pope Leo III. and the emperors Charles the Great, and Constantine, in the mosaics of the Lateran Triclinium. Charles the Great also had a nimbus of the same form in a mosaic now destroyed at St. Susanna (Alemanni, de Lateranensibus parietinis, p. 12: Didron, pp. 34–83). Didron asserts that the square nimbus is not found anywhere save in Italy, and expresses his regret at its absence, as depriving works of art of this evidence of their date. Another singular variety of the nimbus is that which presents it in the form of a scroll partially unrolled at either end. Examples of this remarkable configuration, which seems only to be found in MSS. or in painted glass, are given by Agincourt from a Latin Pontificale of the 9th century in the Library of the Minerva at Rome (Peinture, pl. xxxvii., xxxviii). In each of the twelve compartments depicting various episcopal acts the bishop is distinguished by a nimbus of this form. (See cut No. 5.)

No. 5. Nimbus. Latin MSS. 9th century. (From Didron.)

The nimbus is given not only to divine and sacred personages, but also to allegorical animals. We may instance the Holy Lamb in the two chapels of the Lateran Baptistery, the apse of St. Cosmas and St. Damian, and the vaulted roof of St. Vitalis; the holy dove on the dossier of an episcopal throne (Bosio, p. 327); and the evangelistic symbols, as at St. Paul's and the chapel of St. John the Baptist at the Lateran. The phoenix, a favourite emblem of immortal life through death, has a stellate nimbus in the apses of St. Cosmas and St. Damian, and those of St. Praxedes and St. Cecilia, and on a coin of Faustina (Ciampini, tab. xxxvi. fig. 14). De Rossi furnishes other examples (Rom. Sotter. ii. p. 313).

The aureole (aureola, the golden reward of special holiness) may be defined as the nimb of the body, as the ordinary nimbus is that of the head. To adapt it to the shape of the body, the aureole is usually of an oval form, and often pointed at each end, of the shape known as the Vesica piscis. Its duration in Christian art was but brief. It appeared after the nimbus, and disappeared before it. A singular example is found in one of the wall mosaics of St. Mary Major's at Rome, where it assumes the character of a solid shield protecting the persons of Moses and Aaron from the stones hurled at them by the adherents of Korah and his companions. It is very often found encircling the form of the Deity, or of our Lord.

NINNOCA, virgin in Lesser Britain, in the eighth century; commemorated June 4 (Boll. Acta SS. Jun. i. 407). [C. H.]

NISMES, COUNCIL OF (Nemausense Concilium). Held at Nismes in the lifetime of St. Martin, who declined attending it, but is said to have been informed by revelation of what passed there. Mansi makes a strange guess at its date (iii. 685, note). [E. S. Ff.]

NIVARDUS, archbishop of Rheims, cir. A.D. 273; commemorated Sept. 1 (Boll. Acta SS. Sept. i. 267). [C. H.]

NOAH, patriarch; commemorated Jan. 1 and Ap. 1 (Cal. Ethiop.). [C. H.]

NOBILIS (1), Ap. 25. [Nubilis.]

(2) Martyr; commemorated Sept. 24 (Hieron. Mart.). [C. H.]

NOCTURN (Nocturnum officium, nocturnae vigiliae, nocturnus). Each of the three divisions of the matin office is called a nocturn. Anciently in religious houses the night was divided into three portions, in each of which psalms were said, lauds following at dawn. Jerome (Epist. 22 ad Eustochium) laments that even in his time the zeal of religious persons had so far cooled that monks recited the three nocturns and lauds continuously. [Hours of Prayer, p. 798; Psalmody; Vigil.] (Martene, de Rit. Antiq. iv. c. 7.) [C.]

NÓDDER, COUNCIL OF, A.D. 705; on the river Nodder, in Wilts, at which a charter, exhibited by Adhelm, the newly appointed bishop of Sherborne, was confirmed. (Haddan and Stubbs, iii. 276; Mansi, ib. 175.) [E. S. Ff.]

NOEACIS, NONANNEANE. Artificial words to fix the tonality of the respective notes of the chants or their endings in the memory of the chanter. The first of these belong to the Plagal modes, the other to the Authentic. The words themselves appear with some variations of form. [See Music and Evovae.] [J. R. L.]

NOEL. A word formed from Natalis, the common French name for Christmas Day [p. 356]. [C.]

NOITBURGA, virgin, in France, A.D. 690; commemorated Oct. 31 (Surius, de Prob. Sanct. Hist. Oct. p. 415, ed. Colon. 1618). [C. H.]

NOLA. [Bell.]

NOMOCANON. A Greek code of ecclesiastical laws. See Canon Law, p. 266; Codex Canonum, p. 400. [C.]

NONES. [Hours of Prayer, p. 797.]

NONNA (1), martyr; commemorated at Rome Ap. 23 (Hieron. Mart.).

(2) Martyr; commemorated in Africa May 23 (Hieron. Mart.).

(3) Martyr; commemorated in Africa July 20 (Hieron. Mart.). [C. H.]

(4) Mother of St. Gregory Nazianzen, cir. A.D. 374; commemorated Aug. 5 (Boll. Acta SS. Aug. ii. 78). [C. H.]

NONNA. [Nun.]

NONNUS (1), Martyr; commemorated at Nicomedia Mar. 16 (Hieron. Mart.).

(2) Martyr; commemorated at Alexandria Mar. 21 (Hieron. Mart.).

(3) Martyr; commemorated in Pamphylia May 28 (Hieron. Mart.).

(4) Martyr; commemorated at Milan July 17 (Hieron. Mart.).

(5) Martyr; commemorated in portu urbis Romae July 25 (Hieron. Mart.). [C. H.]

NOONDAY SERVICE. [Hours of Prayer.]

NORUNT FIDELES, or INITIATI, Ἰσασιν οἱ μεμυημένοι, a formula of repeated recurrence in the writings of the Fathers to indicate the sacred mysteries of the faith which were not to be openly published before the uninitiated. The frequency of the phrase is a valuable evidence of the "reserve" in religious teaching practised by the early Church, which indicated a doctrine of the faith with sufficient clearness to be intelligible to their Christian hearers without exposing it to the irreverent handling of those who were not yet admitted within the Christian pale. Casaubon writes of it (Exercit. ad Baron. xvi. No. 43, p. 490): "Quis ita hospes in patrum lectione cui sit ignota formula in mentione sacramentorum potissimum usitata, ἰσασιν οἱ μεμυημένοι, norunt initiati?" It is of repeated occurrence in the writings of Chrysostom, and is found, though less often, in St. Augustine. (Cf. Chrysost. Homil. in Genes. xlix. 11; Ps. cxl.; Homil. in Matt. lxxii.; in Joann. xv. xlvi. lxxxv.)

NOSOCOMIUM. [HOSPITALS.]

NOSTRIANUS, bishop and confessor at Naples; commemorated in the fifth century, Aug. 16 (Boll. Acta SS. Aug. iii. 294). [C. H.]

NOTARY. I. Originally a shorthand writer. Isidore Hispalensis (Etymol. i. 22) says that Ennius invented 1100 characters (notas) for the purpose of abbreviating, so that they could readily be recorded, that the system was improved and added to by others, and that Seneca extended the number of characters to 5000. Socrates (H. E. vi. 4) says that the sermons of St. Chrysostom were preserved by such shorthand writers (ὀξύγραφοι). Augustine (De Doct. Christ. ii. 26) says that those who have learned short-hand (notae) are called "notarii." Again (Epist. 21, Class. iii. Migne, Patrol.) he says that the notaries of the church take down what is said, so that neither his own speech nor the acclamations of the people were lost. He also (Epist. 172, Class. iii.) complains of a great dearth of notaries who could write the Latin language, and (Epist. 152) speaks of four notaries being appointed on either side, in one of his conferences with the Donatists.

In this capacity they were officially employed in courts of justice. Augustine (In Collat. Donat. die ii, c. 3) represents the Donatists as pleading that they were ignorant of short-hand writing—'notas ignorare'—and the president of the court commanding that what the official notaries had taken down should be read to them. Sometimes also they appear to have been sent in a judicial capacity to take evidence or make a report. Thus Augustine (Epist. 128, Class. iii.) calls one Marcellinus a tribune and notary, and (Epist. 134, Class. iii.) speaks of certain Donatist clergy and fanatics being brought to trial after an official report previously made (praemissa notaria). In the acts of the council of Chalcedon (Act 9) mention is made of one Damascius, tribune and notary.

And also in the councils of the church. The 4th council of Toledo, A.D. 633 (c. 4), in ordering the proceedings to be observed at councils, mentions, amongst other officials, the notaries, whose duty it was to take down the proceedings and read them aloud if required. Archbishop Theodore, in his account of the council at Hertford, A.D. 670 (Bede, H. E. iv. 5) says that the decisions of the councils were written down from his dictation by the notary Titillus. Eusebius (H. E. vii. 29) speaks of the ready-writers (ταχύγραφοι), who took down the controversy between Paul of Samosata, at the council of Antioch, A.D. 269, and Socrates (H. E. ii. 30) also mentions them as being present at the controversy between Basil and Photinus, at the council of Sirmium, A.D. 351.

II. But notaries were often simple secretaries. In this capacity they were attached to courts. Thus Socrates (H. E. vii. 23) says that John, who attempted to seize the empire after the death of Honorius, was previously the chief of the royal secretaries, πρωτοστάτης ὑπογραφέων τῶν βασιλικῶν. Charles the Great (Capitul. i. c. 3) provided that every bishop and abbat should have his own notary. In the life of John Damascene, by John the patriarch of Jerusalem, it is said that some of the royal notaries (ὑπογραφέων) were employed to forge the false accusation brought against him. Thus Procius was notary (ὑπογράφευς) to Atticus (Soc. H. E. vii. 41), and Athanasius to Alexander of Alexandria (Soz. H. E. ii. 17). Part of their duty appears to have been to act as readers to their masters, and they seem to have entered on their office at a very early age. Ennodius says that Epiphanius of Ticino became a lector at eight years of age, and from that time discharged also the duties of a notary till his 16th year (Vita Epiph. Ticin. Migne, Patrol. vol. 62, p. 208). Evodius, writing to Augustine (August. Epist. 158, Class. iii.), speaking of a youth whom he had employed as reader and notary, says that he was indefatigable in note-taking, and was accustomed to read to him even during the hours of the night, adding that so diligent and careful was he that he begun to regard him rather as a familiar friend than as merely a youth and a notary. The notaries belonging to the see of Rome appear to have held a more important position, and to have been sent on important missions, sometimes with extensive powers entrusted to them. Instances of this will be found in the letters of Gregory the Great; thus (Epist. viii. 26, Migne, Patrol.) we find him sending Pantaleon, the notary, to Apulia to inquire into an accusation brought against a bishop of Sipontum, with power to inflict punishment in case the accusation was proved. The first council of Braga, A.D. 563 (Praefat.), speaks of Juribius, a notary of the see of Rome, by whom Leo sent certain rescripts against the Priscillianists to the synod of Galicia. Sometimes, too, they seemed to have signed the letters of the bishop of Rome (Greg. Mag. Epist. Appendix, Migne, Patrol. vol. 77, p. 11,345, § 1299).

III. In Rome were certain notaries called "notarii regionarii," to whom peculiar duties were allotted. Anastasius the librarian (Vita S. Clementis) speaks of seven notaries appointed to the seven regiones, whose office it was to collect and register the deeds of the martyrs, and (Vit. S. Anteros) says that the acts of the martyrs were diligently collected by notaries. Again (Vita S. Fabiani) he says that the districts were divided among the deacons, and that seven subdeacons were appointed to superintend the seven notaries, and (Vita S. Julii) that Julius I. ordered that the registers belonging to each church, "notitia quae pro fide ecclesiastica est," should be collected for safe custody by the notaries, and that all deeds and records should be in the custody of the chief "Primicerius" of the notaries. They also discharged certain functions in connexion with the services of the church. Gregory the Great (Liber Sacrament. § 70) speaks of the lighting of two candles held by two notaries. Messianus Presbyter (Vita Cæsarii Arelat. ii. c. 2, § 18, Migne, Patrol. v. 67 p. 1034) says that it was the duty of the notary to precede the bishop, carrying his pastoral staff.

IV. They do not appear to have been reckoned among the clergy. Socrates (H. E. vii. 41) narrates that Atticus made Proclus his notary, and, after he had made great progress, promoted him to the diaconate. Gregory the Great (Epist. iii. 34) speaks of a subdeacon who could not keep his vow of continency and therefore retired from his monastery, gave up his office as subdeacon, and performed the duties of a notary for the rest of his life. But it was reckoned one of the steps to the clerical office. Gelasius (Decret. c. 2) says that a monk, who wished to enter holy orders, should serve for three months as a lector, or notary, or defensor, after that he might be made an acolyte. But they seem occasionally to have retained their title, and probably their office, after ordination. In the acts of the council of Antioch, read out at the council of Chalcedon (Act 14) mention is made of one Tarianus, deacon and notary. The chapter of Sozomen (H. E. iv. 3) which relates the martyrdom of Martyrius, the subdeacon, and Marcian, the lector, is headed 'The Martyrdom of the Notaries,' and Nicephorus (H. E. ix. 30) distinctly says that they were notaries of Paul, the bishop of Constantinople. It is alleged, on the authority of a letter of Julius, that Martyrius was a deacon (Vales, Not. in Soz., H. E. iv. 3; Thomassin. Ecclesiæ Disciplina). [P. O.]

NOTHELMUS, archbishop of Canterbury; commemorated Oct. 17 (Boll. Acta SS. Oct. viii. 117). [C. H.]

NOTITIA. The word notitia is technically used for a sort of list or court-almanac of places and officials, and the earliest and most famous notitiæ are of a purely civil character. The most famous of all is, of course, the Notitia Dignitatum, compiled in the time of Arcadius or Honorius, circa 400 A.D. (see Gibbon, ii. 303, note 72. Pancirolus and Böcking), which is a complete list of the provinces with their subdivisions, and of the whole official staff of the empire. This has been edited by Pancirolus, whose work has, however, been quite superseded by the editions of Böcking (2 vols. Bonn, 1839–1853) and Seeck (Berlin, 1876). This great notitia is of a purely civil character, and its interest for the student of Christian antiquities lies solely in its giving him a ready means of testing the closeness with which the local divisions and gradations of power in the church were modelled on those of the state. It is well known how the ecclesiastical archbishoprics and bishoprics followed the limits of the greater and lesser provincial governorships—the archbishop whose seat was at Narbonne for instance exercising spiritual jurisdiction exactly over the country which had formed the province of Gallia Narbonensis. [Orders, Holy, III.] So towns in Asia Minor which had been metropoles in the old sense (for the civil sense of the word, cf. Marquardt, Römische Staatsverwaltung, i. 185) became metropoles in the new sense. Bingham has a lengthy discussion of this point. There is a good deal also to be gleaned from Marquardt's first volume; see especially pp. 216, 269. Boissière in his L'Afrique Romaine (Paris, 1878), p. 424, has some interesting remarks on the subject of the civil and ecclesiastical dioceses, from an unpublished lecture of Léon Renier. Besides the Notitia Dignitatum there is the important Notitia Provinciarum et Civitatum Galliæ, compiled about the same time as the Notitia Dignitatum during the reign of Honorius (Marquardt, i. 129, note 3), or at all events some time between 386 and 450 A.D. (Brambach in Rheinisches Museum, xxiii. p. 282 sqq.; Riese, Geographi Latini Minores, p. xxxiii.). This notitia is also of a purely civil character. It is edited in Seeck's edition of the Notitia Dignitatum, and in Riese's Geog. Lat. Min. (Heilbronn, 1878). The Notitia Urbis Constantinopolitanæ, also edited by Seeck and Riese, gives the positions of the fourteen ecclesiæ in Constantinople, but is otherwise purely civil.

The earliest undoubted ecclesiastical notitia that we possess is that of Leo Sapiens, A.D. 891. But there can be little doubt that such notitiæ existed at a much earlier date, and the Hieroclis Synecdemus, or Hierocles' Travelling Companion, has distinct traces of an ecclesiastical character in it. This work was shewn by Wesseling to have been written before A.D. 535. The genitives of places which occur six times in the lists, and the genitive δῆμον which occurs nine times, look as if they should be preceded by the word ἐπίσκοπος, as in an ordinary notitia. This is further confirmed by the occurrence of the definite article in one instance, ὁ Τιμβριάδων (Parthey, Hieroclis Synecdemus et notitiæ Græcæ Episcopatuum, Berlin, 1866, p. v. Hierocles is also edited in Fortia d'Urban's Recueil des Itinéraires Anciens, Paris, 1845, with the modern names subjoined. For some remarks on the personality of Hierocles, see Schelstrate's Antiquitas Ecclesiæ, ii. 720). The notitia of Leo Sapiens is full for the East, but not equally perfect for the West. It has been edited many times. Carolus a S. Paulo for instance, in his Geographia Sacra (Amsterdam, 1704), prints it, in an imperfect form, along with other notitiæ in an appendix; Beveridge prints it on p. 135 of his annotationes in canones at the end of the second volume of his Synodikon; Goar in his edition of Codinus (Venice, 1729), p. 287, foll., gives the notitiæ from that of Leo to that of Andronicus Palaeologus; Schelstrate, ii. 632 (Rome, 1697), prints the chief civil and ecclesiastical notitiæ; Bingham gives the notitia of Leo in the third volume of his Christian Antiquities; unfortunately he is extremely inaccurate (see Neale, Holy Eastern Church, vol. i. p. xii. of the preface). The critical edition, however, which so far will supersede all others, as well of Leo's notitia as of the other Eastern notitiæ, is that in the work of Parthey above-mentioned. The later notitiæ hardly come within the scope of this dictionary, but may be found in any of the works mentioned above, and best of all in Parthey. A useful introduction to the study of the notitiæ would be to read the account which Fabricius (Salutaris Lux Evangelii, p. 342, foll. Hamburg, 1731) gives of the contents and bibliography of each of the more important of them.

It is obvious that the notitiae are not the only sources from which a list of bishoprics could be compiled. The subscriptions to the councils are at least of equal importance. These can be obtained from any of the ordinary editions of the councils, such as that of Harduin or Mansi. The modern comprehensive book on the subject is Gams's Series Episcoporum (Ratisbon, 1873), a work of learning, but to be used with caution on account of a tendency to antedate the first establishments of bishoprics, and now and then to interpose a conjectural bishop. An attempt is made to give a complete notitia of the Christian world in Migne's Premiere Encyclopédie Théologique (Paris, 1862), vol. xxviii. p. 759. Other sources will be referred to in the following brief notes on the different parts of the Christian world taken separately.

1. Spain. All the old books bearing upon the subject, e.g. the editions of councils, &c., go upon the forged list of Wamba, which is greatly antedated, being put in the 7th, while it really belongs to the 12th century. A new critical edition of this list is shortly to be expected from the distinguished Spanish scholar Aureliano Fernandez Guerra. Meanwhile the materials for a judgment are to be found in Florez's admirable fourth volume which "contiene el origen y progreso de los obispados . . . . y divisiones antiguas de sus Sillas." Florez was the first to throw doubt upon the supposed date of Wamba's list, and his opinion is now universally accepted. Gams's Kirchengeschichte Spaniens (Ratisbon, 1864) is the modern work on Spanish ecclesiastical history, written, however, it must be remembered, from the ultramontane point of view. Cortez y Lopez's Diccionario geográfico-histórico de la España antigua contains many facts, but should be read critically. Tejada y Ramiro's Coleccion de Canones de la Iglesia Española (Madrid, 1850), and Hübner's Inscriptiones Hispaniae Christianae (Berlin, 1871), should be referred to.

2. France. The great authority is Sammarthan's Gallia Christiana, a huge work in many folios (Paris, 1715), a revised and enlarged edition of which is now being published by Piolin. The first volume appeared at Paris in 1870, and vols. 1–5, and 11–13 have so far appeared. Piolin's Origines chrétiennes de la Gaule (Paris, 1855) will be found valuable. Longnon's Géographie de la Gaule au VI^e siècle (Paris, 1878) would be useful in attempting to fix the localities and circumscriptions of doubtful sees. See also Le Blant's Inscriptions chrétiennes de la Gaule, 2 vols. (Paris, 1856).

3. England. See Stubbs's Registrum Sacrum Anglicanum (Oxford, 1858). Reference may also be made to Haddan and Stubbs's Councils and Ecclesiastical Documents relating to Great Britain and Ireland (Oxford, 1869). Three volumes of this work have so far appeared. It will not be completed on the original plan, owing to Mr. Haddan's death.

4. Italy. Ughelli's Italia Sacra is the great authority. The second edition of this work, by Colet (Venice, 1717–1722) is a great improvement on the first. Cappelletti, Le Chiese d'Italia (Venice, 1844–1871), corrects Ughelli in many places, and adds later and more trustworthy information. But the work is very unequally done, and some of it must be accepted with caution.

5. Asia Minor and the East generally. Neale's History of the Holy Eastern Church contains a great deal of matter. See especially p. 72 of the first introductory volume, where a notitia of Constantinople, including the dioceses of Caesarea, Ephesus, Thrace, and Illyricum Orientale is given. On p. 115 of the same volume there is a list of the sees of Egypt, and on p. 131 another of the ancient and modern sees of the diocese of Antioch. Le Quien's Oriens Christianus (Paris, 1740) is still however the great source of authority, except so far as he has in some points been superseded by Parthey's edition of the notitiae. Le Quien's conscientious accuracy in these matters is both rare and admirable. See an account of his life and labours by Neale in the preface to his Introduction, p. xii. The great work of Le Bas and Waddington, Voyage archéologique en Asie Mineure, would have to be used if it was desired to compile a complete notitia. The Synecdemus of Hierocles, and the notitia of Leo Sapiens, will be found, as already mentioned, best edited in Parthey. Kuhn, Die städtische und bürgerliche Verfassung des Römischen Reichs (Leipsic, 1865), is full of matter. See especially his section on Egypt, ii. 454 foll., and the section on Syria, passim.

6. Africa. Schelstrate, ii. 652, makes out a notitia of Africa from the council of Carthage in 411. Sirmond in his Opuscula (Paris, 1675), vol. i. p. 207, gives a late notitia of Africa, which may be of service, if critically used. There is a study entitled L'Afrique chrétienne by Yanoski, in a volume of L'Univers (Paris, 1844) containing other studies by French writers on the history and antiquities of Africa. Léon Renier's Inscriptions Romaines de l'Algérie (Paris, 1855) contains a certain amount of Christian inscriptions, and would repay examination. Dupin's Geographia Sacra Africae, seu Notitia Omnium Episcopatuum Ecclesiae Africanae, is printed in the eleventh volume of Migne's Patrologiae Cursus Completus (Paris, 1845), p. 823. Kuhn, ii. 431 foll., collects a great deal of valuable material for Africa. [W. T. A.]

NOVATUS, brother of Timotheus presbyter; commemorated at Rome, June 20 (Usuard. Mart.; Vet. Rom. Mart.; Boll. Acta SS. June iv. 4). [C. H.]

NOVENDIALE. [MOURNING; OBSEQUIES.]

NOVICE.

1. Introduction; 2. Reception of Novices; 3. Duration and Discipline of the Noviciate; 4. Rite of Admission; 5. Renunciation of Property; 6. Limitation of Age; 7. Disqualifications; 8. Cases of Retrogression, &c.; 9. Summary.

1. As soon as the monastic life began to assume its coenobitic form, all persons desirous of admission into the community had to undergo a period of probation. During this time they were called "novitii," less commonly "incipientes," "ἀρχάριοι," "νεοπαγεῖς" (Alteserrae Asceticon, iv. 1), or "novelli" (Reg. Mag. c. 90; cf. Athanas. Exhort. ad Spons. Christi, where Adam is called "rudis et novellus"), all terms expresing inexperience in a vocation. They were called also "pulsantes" (Mabillon, Praef. saec. iii. i. 21), as knocking at the door to be let in; and sometimes in the East, βασσάροι, a semi-barbarous word of the later empire, curiously descriptive of the intermediate state which they occupied, wearing the monk's tunic, by way of trial, under their ordinary outer robe, which they retained till formally admitted. They were also called "conversi" or converts. The "conversi" were distinct from those who were received into a monastery under age, "pueri oblati" or "nutriti." This use of "conversi" and "oblati" must not be confounded with the use of these words to designate lay-brothers (Mabillon, Praef. iii. i. 21; iv. iv. 59).

2. In instituting a noviciate for all who wished to become monks, the founders of monasticism followed, as usual, the precedent set by some ancient schools of philosophy. The Pythagoreans required a noviciate of five years (Maury, Histoire des Religions de la Grèce antique); the Druids, in some cases, one of twenty years (Thierry, Histoire des Gaulois). It was necessary as a safeguard for stability of purpose. On the one hand, none were to be rejected except for some insuperable impediment; on the other hand, none were to be lightly accepted, lest the community should be disgraced by the inconsistencies of its members. On the one side there was the gracious invitation of Him who says, "Come unto me all that labour and are heavy laden," and on the other there was the Psalmist's anxious misgiving, "Who shall ascend into the hill of the Lord?" (Basil, Reg. c. 6). Thus Benedict of Monte Casino wisely orders that ingress into the monastery must not be too easy (Bened. Reg. c. 58), and three centuries later the great Frankish legislator repeats the injunction, adding that no one is to be forced to become a monk against his will (Car. Mag. Capitular. Monast. A.D. 789, c. 11). It was difficult to gain admittance into the monastery, because it was still more difficult, once there, to leave it. "Vestigia nulla retrorsum."

The would-be monk had to wait as a suppliant at the door of the monastery—by the rule of Pachomius of Tabennae and of other Egyptian ascetics of his age—seven days (Reg. c. 49; Pallad. Hist. Laus. c. 28; Reg. Serap. Macar. etc. c. 7): according to Cassian, ten days (Instit. iv. 3, 36; Collat. xx. 1); by the rule of Fructuosus (bishop of Bracara [Braga], in Portugal, in the 8th century), ten days (Reg. c. 21), afterwards modified to three days and nights (2da Reg. c. 4). He was to lie there prostrate, by the rules of Pachomius and Fructuosus, and, by the latter rule, fasting and praying, and the porter was to test his sincerity and patience by insults and revilings (Fruct. ib. cc. 4, 21). If ignorant of it, he was to be taught the Lord's Prayer (Pachom. ib.). He was also to be questioned about his motive for seeking admission, and in particular, lest he should prove to be a fugitive from justice, whether he had committed any crime which had made him liable to punishment (Pachom. ib.; Ferreoli Reg. c. 5; Fruct. Reg. cc. 4, 21). In course of time a less austere reception was accorded to postulants. Mabillon explains the passage in the Benedictine rule which orders them to wait a few days (five days, in his interpretation) at the gate ("ad portam," Bened. Reg. c. 34) to mean not outside the monastery, but in a cell specially set apart for this purpose within the cloister (Mabill. Praef. i. saec. iv. vii. 150).

3. Though allowed to enter the monastery, the postulant was still an alien there. At first he was placed in the strangers' cell or guest-chamber, "cella hospitum," near the gateway (Cass. Inst. iv. 7) for a year (Cass. ib.; Fruct. Reg. c. 21), or, according to the rule of Isidorus (bishop of Seville in the 7th century), for three months (Isid. Reg. c. 5). In Mabillon's exposition of the Benedictine rule, the postulant was to stay only two months in the strangers' cell before being transferred to the cell of the novices (Mabill. Praef. i. v. s.). Under the orders of the superintendent of the strangers, "custos hospitum," he was to be busily employed in menial offices for their comfort (Bened. Reg. c. 58; Fruct. Reg. c. 21). Thence he passed, after a shorter or longer sojourn according to the rules of the monastery, to the cell of the novices, sometimes called the "pulsatorium," or chamber of those who were still, as it were, knocking to be let in (Bened. Reg. v. s.; Capitul. Aquisgr. A.D. 780).

The period of probation varied in its duration and the severity of its discipline. It lasted three years by the rule of Pachomius (Pallad. Hist. Laus.) and by the code of Justinian (Novell. v. 2); but a latter decree makes this term of three years necessary for strangers only, that is, persons coming from a distance; only one year by the rules of Ferreolus (bishop of Uceta [Uzès], in Southern France in the 6th century) (Reg. c. 5), of Fructuosus (Reg. c. 21), and by the so-called rule of Magister (Reg. Mag. c. 90). The former allowed even a shorter term, five months, at the abbat's discretion (v. s.); and the latter even permitted the novice to reside in a cell not within but near the monastery (v. s.). Gregory the Great found some abbats in his time too facile in the admission of novices; to correct this laxity, he insisted on a probation of two years at least (Epp. x. 24), and in the case of men that had been soldiers, three (ib. viii. 5). Benedict had been content with a noviciate of one year (Reg. c. 58), of which, according to Mabillon, two months were to be passed in the "cella hospitum," and the remaining ten in the "cella novitiorum" (Praef. iv. vii. 150), but, according to Martene, all the year in the novices' chamber (Reg. Comment. c. 58). This was usually, but not always, on the east side of the cloister or quadrangle, between the gateway and the east end of the chapel, next to the room of correction, and facing the scholars' chamber, and the "scriptorium" or copyists' room on the west (Altes. Ascet. iv. 3, ix. 7). In some of the larger monasteries the novices had their own quadrangle, almost like a separate monastery, with their own refectory, dormitory, infirmary, and even, in rare instances, their own chapel; but this ceased with the decrease in the number of candidates for admission (Reg. Bened. Comment. c. 58).

All the time of his noviciate the aspirant for the cowl was under very strict tutelage. On entering the monastery, he was assigned to the guardianship of one of the older and more experienced of the brethren, who was to report of his behaviour to the abbat (Bened. Reg. c. 58; Basil. Reg. c. 15; Isidor. Reg. c. 4; Fruct. Reg. c. 21; Reg. Magist. c. 87; Gregor. Magn. Epp.

v. 49). As it would be hardly possible for each novice to have his own senior, it has been supposed that the older monk, spoken of in the rules, was either one of the decani or deans (Fruct. Reg. v. s.), or, more probably, the "master of the novices" [MAGISTER NOVITIORUM], whose special task it was to look after them (Reg. Bened. Comment. v. s.). They were never to stir out of their chamber without leave (Cass. Inst. iv. 10) They were never, on any pretext whatever, to go about the monastery at night without a light or without the "master" (Reg. Bened. Comment. c. 22). Even so trivial a fault as walking with the head up, instead of bent forward, was to be marked and corrected by "the master" (ib. c. 7). Slight allowance was made for their not being as yet inured to the severe discipline of the cloister. From "lauds" to "prime," when the older monks retired to their cells, the novices, with those monks who had not completed five years in the monastery, were to wait in their dormitory, learning psalms under the eye of the official for the week, or "hebdomadarius" (ib. c. 8). "Leave your bodies outside the gate all ye who enter the monastery" was the stern welcome of Bernard of Clairvaux to postulants (Altes. Ascet. iv. 1). In the same spirit one of the founders of monachism in the East enjoined on novices ignominious hardships of every kind, and the necessity of very frequent confessions to test their perseverance (Basil. Reg. c. 6). In the 11th century the docility and constancy of novices in England were sometimes tested by floggings (Hospinian, Hist. Monach. iii. c. 23).
